SUNDAY MORNING.

BY L. ALMA-TADEMA, A.R.A.

FINISH OF THE GREAT WALKING-MATCH ON SATURDAY AT THE AGRICULTURAL HALL, ISLINGTON.

THE STEAM-SHIP SARMATIAN, WHICH CONVEYS THE MARQUIS OF LORNE AND PRINCESS LOUISE TO CANADA.

THE SIX-DAYS' PEDESTRIAN CONTEST.

This competition at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, terminated on Saturday last. The accidents which happened to Vaughan, Crossland, and Weston, and necessitated their retirement at various stages of this long race, left the result entirely in the hands of W. Corkey and "Blower" Brown, and on the evening of the fourth day it was pretty apparent that, bar accidents, the first and second prizes must fall to them. All interest was therefore centred in the struggle between them, and a more protracted and grandly fought one has never been witnessed. For hour after hour—indeed, one might almost say for day after day, they stuck resolutely together, neither ever allowing the other to have the track to himself for more than a few minutes at a time. Three times in the course of the week did each wrest the lead from the other; but at length, at the sixty-eighth hour, Corkey got in front for the fifth time since the start, and was never caught again. On Saturday morning, as a last resource, Brown's trainer took him away for a Turkish bath; but it did not seem to exercise any beneficial effect upon his speed, and he could never regain any of the ground that he lost during his absence from the Hall.

Shortly after seven o'clock on Saturday evening Corkey had covered 520 miles 2 laps, which was a greater distance than O'Leary had accomplished in March last, and occupied less time by more than an hour. As Brown was then about nineteen miles behind, it was clear that he could not possibly catch Corkey, so the little man retired to his tent for a brief rest. Our Illustration shows the scene at the end of the contest, with Corkey in front of the competing pedestrians on the course. In about an hour he emerged again, fearfully and wonderfully arrayed in a jockey's cap of green silk, and a canary silk jersey and knickerbockers—Sir John Astley's racing colours—and carrying in his hand a little white flag, covered with small union jacks. In this solemn state he headed a procession of the pedestrians round the track, the rear being brought up by Mrs. Corkey, resplendent in a new bonnet. After completing the 521 miles in this fashion he finally retired, and the others soon followed his example. There must have been fully 20,000 spectators present at the close of the contest. We append a table of the distance accomplished by each of the men during the six days, omitting the five who retired:—

	Miles.	Laps.		Miles.	Laps.
Corkey	521	0	Croft	369	4
Brown	506	1	Ide	355	5
Rowell	470	1	Clarkson	351	0
Hibbert	440	0	Pellett	340	4
Ennis	410	2	Crossland	335	0½
Courtney	404	2	Hancock	324	0
Day	400	1	Higgins	302	0
Richardson	380	0	Barnett	255	0½
Howes	370	5	Smythe...	223	3

We cannot take leave of the subject without expressing an earnest hope that we have seen the last of these painful struggles against nature. It may be an advantage to know that a man can travel 520 miles in 138 hours, and manage to live through a week with an infinitesimal amount of rest, though we fail to perceive that anyone could possibly be placed in a position where his ability in this respect would be of real use to him. Still, assuming the knowledge to be useful, we have now seen five or six different men cover upwards of 500 miles in less than six days; so, what is to be gained by a constant repetition of the feat? As long, however, as prizes are offered, so long will men come forward to compete for them; and we suppose the public will continue to flock to these races until a man dies upon the track. Then there will be a sudden revulsion of feeling, a howl of virtuous indignation, and such exhibitions will be sternly repressed. But why not repress them before anything so serious has occurred? We have no hesitation in stating that prize-fighting is mild and humane, compared with such sport (!) as six-day races; and that the one should be rigidly put down and the other encouraged, in the same country, is a gross and glaring inconsistency.

THE SARMATIAN STEAM-SHIP.

The voyage of the Marquis of Lorne and her Royal Highness Princess Louise, Marchioness of Lorne, from England to Canada, where his Excellency will henceforth reside as Governor-General for her Majesty the Queen, is an occasion of peculiar interest. It had been arranged that the Marquis and his Royal spouse should be conveyed across the Atlantic in H.M.S. Black Prince, the ship of the Mediterranean squadron, under command of his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh. The Black Prince had left Malta to come home for this dignified service, but an accidental break-down of her engines has required some repairs to be made, which could not be completed in time. Her Majesty's Government have therefore engaged the well-known fine steam-ship Sarmatian, of the line belonging to the Montreal Steam-Ship Company, Messrs. Allan, Brothers, and Co., of Liverpool, to convey the new Governor-General and her Royal Highness, with their suite, from that port to Montreal. The Sarmatian, of which we present an Illustration, is a magnificent vessel of 4000 tons, with splendid internal fittings and luxurious accommodation for high-class passengers. The Marquis of Lorne and the Princess will embark on board this ship at Liverpool on Thursday next, at an early hour of the morning. We feel sure that all her Majesty's subjects on both sides of the Atlantic heartily wish them a comfortable voyage and a prosperous entrance upon the new career of public life opened to them in the foremost of British colonies in North America.

Professor Huxley gave the first of a series of science lectures for the people in the Manchester Free-Trade Hall last Saturday night, the subject being Harvey, and his Discovery of the Circulation of the Blood.

At the meeting of the Wolverhampton School Board on the 1st inst. Mr. Hawksford, the chairman of the finance committee, reported that the board's liabilities were increasing fast. The sum of £6000 would be required to clear off the past year's debts, which was equal to a rate of 8d. in the pound. He said that was "so outrageous and enormous" that it was absolutely necessary that the board should begin to practise economy. He opposed the creating of new expenses, and urged that the head teachers of the board schools were paid far too highly. The question of expenditure is to be considered by a committee.

Three men, named Burrows, Wilson, and Fell, were convicted at Leeds last Saturday of stealing gold and securities to the value of £14,000 from the bed-room of a publican and bill-discounter named Sowden, who lived at Stanningley, and made no secret of his possessions. The first two named were severally sentenced to five years' penal servitude, and Fell, as an old offender, to seven years'.—At Chelmsford on Saturday Frost and Smith were found guilty of breaking into the premises of a watchmaker at Colchester and stealing six hundred pounds' worth of jewellery. Frost, an old offender, was sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude, and Smith to twelve.

ART.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

The National Gallery reopened to the public on Monday last. During the month of October—when, as usual, the gallery was closed—nothing appears to have been done beyond cleansing the rooms, a slight rearrangement of a few works, and the withdrawal of certain English pictures. Among those we miss from the walls are Benjamin West's "Healing the Sick" and Robert Smirke's twelve small illustrations of "Don Quixote." We know of no sufficient reason for the removal of these pictures: there is ample bare wall-space to receive them and many more. They were certainly among the most popular works in the collection with the masses: though they are of little artistic value, they could hardly do any harm to public taste, and they have a place in the history of the British school.

The fourteen pictures acquired during the current year had been (with the exception of a small "Snow Piece" by W. Mulready, which is not yet hung) placed in the rooms before the closing; but the reopening of the gallery seems to be a fitting opportunity for noticing the whole together. Of the new acquisitions the most important in relation to the history of art, as an authenticated picture, is the example of Gheeraert or Gerard David, representing Bernardino de Salviatis, the donor, and his patron, St. Bernardino of Siena, St. Martin, and St. Donatian, with a landscape background probably painted by Joachim Patenier. It originally formed the right wing of the reredos of the altar of St. John the Baptist and St. Magdalene in the collegiate church of St. Donatian at Bruges. The left wing has disappeared. The donor in this picture was executor to the will of Richard de Visch van der Capelle, another Canon of the same church, for whom David executed a picture which has lately been exhibited at the Loan Exhibition in the Pavilion de Flore of the Tuileries, for the benefit of the recently founded Museum of Decorative Art at Paris. The last-named picture was catalogued as by Hugo Van der Goes, but has been identified with much learned acumen as the joint performance of David and Patenier, by Mr. W. H. James Weale, to whom also we owe the correct ascription of this picture in our National Gallery, as well as of several other works which formerly were attributed to Memling and other painters. Nothing in contemporary art-criticism—which has rectified the ascriptions of so many works by the old masters—is more remarkable than the researches in early Flemish art of Mr. Weale published in "Le Beffroi" and the Gazette des Beaux Arts. In this instance he has given us a painter of the first rank, whose name was forgotten and unknown, and whose works were confounded with those of others. Especially interesting is it to trace the steps by which, in a series of years, Mr. Weale arrived at the opinion, first, that Patenier was the pupil of David before the master's name was known; secondly, that the landscapes in David's pictures were not by his hand; thirdly, that the landscapes were in all probability by Patenier; and finally arriving at the confirmatory discovery of documentary evidence which showed that David went from Bruges (where he had settled) to Antwerp in 1515, and was inscribed as master-painter in the register of St. Luke's guild, the next name on the roll being that of Joachim Patenier; but that the latter painter stayed at Antwerp whilst David returned to Bruges, the separation of the two painters being synchronous with an altogether different character in the backgrounds of David's pictures till his death, in 1523. We need not dwell on the truthful character of the heads, and the beautiful execution of the rich vestments and other details in the well-preserved picture in Trafalgar-square. The influence of David's predecessor, Memling, is apparent; but the handling of the gold embroidery and metal-work is less rigidly mechanical. The nation is indebted to the late Mr. W. Benoni White for this highly interesting and valuable picture.

The principal purchases made during the year were from the collection of Mr. W. Fuller Maitland, M.P. The titles and prices of the foreign pictures from this collection are as follow:—"The Agony in the Garden," Umbrian School, £2000; "The Adoration of the Magi," by Filippino Lippi, £800; "The Nativity of the Saviour," by Botticelli, £1500; "Portrait of a Young Man," by Francia Bigio, £500; and "A Man's Portrait," unknown, £350. The more important of these pictures are so well known from having been exhibited successively at the Royal Academy and elsewhere, that description and criticism are superfluous, especially in view of the information procurable in the catalogue. We may remark, however, that "The Agony in the Garden" was attributed to Raphael when in Mr. Maitland's collection, and as such has been accepted by many critics; but the authorities of the gallery have acted with discretion in not retaining that attribution. It is a picture in the best manner of the Peruginesque school, with apparently some of Raphael's early characteristics; but more than this cannot be asserted positively. "The Adoration of the Magi" is assigned to Filippino Lippi, "or Botticelli"—on the strength, apparently, of the resemblance of some of the heads to the peculiar thin, square-jawed type of face invariably found in the works of the latter. On careful comparison, however, we think it will be evident that the draughtsmanship is superior to, and the touch and other technical qualities are different from, those of Botticelli; whilst, on the other hand, there is no trace of the mystical imaginativeness which elevates into poetic art the Nativity and its symbolical embracing of men and angels, its heavenly choir and circlet of dancing angels. The affinity of the dark-toned expressive head by Bigio to the characteristics of his friend Andrea del Sarto will be readily recognised. The small portrait by a painter "unknown" was formerly attributed to Holbein. It has very delicate physiognomical truth, but does not quite realise the vicelike grasp of the individuality and the warm, full colouring of the German master.

From the Novar collection was purchased for £3465 the lifesize figure of "St. Helena" seeing in vision "the Invention of the Cross"—i.e., two cherubs bearing a cross through the air, by Paul Veronese. It is a fine work, in rather a golden than his so-called "silvery" tone, but belongs to a phase of Veronese's art already represented. We have not yet acquired, pace Rumohr, an example of the master's full strength and brilliancy of colour as displayed in some of the galleries and churches of Venice and in one or two churches in Verona. "Mary Magdalene approaching the Sepulchre," by the rare painter Savoldo of Brescia, with its twilight sky and sheeny drapery, but wholly unpathetic face, though apparently perfectly genuine, strikes us as unworthy of the painter of the fine altar-piece of the Virgin and Child with saints—Savoldo's masterpiece—in the Brera. It was bought from Signor Giuseppe Baslini, of Milan, for £350. The small portrait, by Catharina van Hemessen, bought from Mr. James C. Wallace, is of the slenderest artistic interest, and was purchased, it may be presumed, for the reason that our national collection not only labours under the reproach of not possessing a single undoubted Holbein, and only one François Clouet, but is generally curiously deficient in examples of the cabinet portraiture of the sixteenth century.

The most important English picture acquired during the year is James Ward's large and powerful "Gordale Scar, Yorkshire," with cattle and deer gathered for shelter from a passing storm on the level at the bottom of the scar, and a white bull conspicuous in the foreground. Despite considerable mannerism of execution, the effect is very telling: the gloom of the gorge, deepened by the storm, is only rendered more weird by the silvery torrent that tumbles sparkling down the head of the ravine, and the giant limestone cliffs rear themselves sheer, stark, and black against a band of yellow light thrown by the declining sun athwart the rolling cumuli. This picture was bought from Lord Ribblesdale for £1500. The other English additions are a "Landscape" by Thomas Barker, of Bath; "Slate Quarries," by Old Crome; "Landscape: a River Scene," by W. J. Müller; and a small "Snow Scene" (not yet hung) by W. Mulready—all purchased from the Fuller-Maitland collection, the two former out of the pecuniary bequest by the late Mr. Richard Charles Wheeler, and all, we submit—like two or three of the foreign pictures—scarcely of sufficiently relative importance for a National Gallery. A vast number of more or less insignificant pictures must be offered to the gallery authorities for sale by private individuals or in public auctions, and the constant temptation must be to purchase works that would vary the contents of the collection, though not increase its instructiveness. A better policy, however, we think, it would be—especially now that the collection is so widely representative—to resolutely resist buying second-rate examples of second-rate men and unimportant school pictures; but to reserve, if necessary, the annual Parliamentary supply (which would doubtless be voted anew) for the purchase of works illustrative of the great capi-scuole (which are still procurable in Italy, and the North, and occasionally present themselves for sale) or chefs-d'œuvre only, by second-rate masters.

New editions of the official catalogues, both of the Foreign and British schools, have been prepared for the reopening. The fresh acquisitions are included, and the accompanying information, biographical, descriptive, and critical, is conveyed in a manner so free from the dryness of the ordinary catalogue raisonné, that it is evident the new Director and Secretary aim at rendering, by this means, the national collection as popularly interesting as possible.

Of all the schemes of destruction, under the pretence of "restoration," which have been carried out to the ruin of so many historical buildings at home and abroad, there has been, perhaps, none more daring than one which at this moment threatens to wholly transform the interior of Wren's famous church of Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside, in order to suit the prevalent Ritualistic fashion. According to the notice for a faculty, it is intended "to rearrange the east end of the church by forming stalls for the clergy and choir; to remodel the reredos or replace it by a new one; to improve the interior aspect by coloured decoration; to lower the floor of the main body of the church so as to form a raised chancel, and to inclose the chancel by a dwarf wall or railing; to remove the whole of the present seats, and replace them by others; and to remove and re-erect in a more convenient place certain monuments, &c." If these sweeping alterations are effected it is obvious that the church will lose nearly all trace of its native and historic character, both as regards architecture and worship. What renders the project more startling is the fact that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are actually contributing £2000 from the proceeds of the sale of the site of Allhallows, Bread-street (the church of Milton's monument) towards the cost of this falsification of architecture and history—this mere freak of meddling ecclesiastical dilettanteism. An outcry is, however, being raised against the scheme, and we trust it will prove a timely one.

Mr. H. Herkomer was entertained on Monday evening last to dinner by the Liverpool Art-Club—Mr. P. H. Rathbone presiding. At a conversazione afterwards Mr. Herkomer proposed that, with a view to make Liverpool an art-centre, a Painters' Festival should be held in that town once a year; that eminent painters should be invited to spend eight or ten days in the town, and that they should during that time paint in public from living models in the presence of advanced art-students; the pictures so produced to be afterwards deposited in the Liverpool Art-Gallery. Mr. Herkomer thought that by such a conference both artists and students would greatly gain. The proposal was well received, and Mr. Severn, Mr. John Collier, Mr. Samuelson, Mr. Bowes, and others spoke upon the advantage to students of seeing the actual method of painters.

The same Art-Club has invited a competition for amateur painting on porcelain and pottery, not confined to members of the club or residents in Liverpool, but open to all amateurs. Two prizes will be given—a Venetian glass mirror and a jar, probably of Hungarian manufacture.

Lord Wrottesley, the Lord Lieutenant of Staffordshire, opened at Stafford on Monday last an exhibition of pictures, pottery, statuary, articles of virtù, and other works of art, in aid of the Schools of Art and Science. The exhibition contains more than 300 paintings, including many by the old masters, contributed by noblemen and gentlemen of the county. The Staffordshire fine-art pottery is well represented, as is also that of Worcester and Lambeth.

At a meeting at Brighton on Monday last, presided over by the Mayor, it was resolved to establish a memorial fund for the benefit of the family of the late Mr. T. W. Wonfor, Curator of the Public Library and Museum. The matter was warmly taken up, and subscriptions to the amount of £190 were announced in the room. The Mayor stated that Mr. Wonfor's exertions had developed an art and science gallery in Brighton which perhaps was unequalled out of London.

It is proposed to publish a series of about twelve reproductions, by the photo-mezzotint process, of characteristic specimens of the landscape work of Mr. Henry Dawson, who, after long years of comparative neglect, has risen of late into such deservedly high repute. The examples are to be taken from the recent remarkable exhibition of the artist's works at the Art-Museum, Nottingham Castle. The process of reproduction to be employed is the invention of the painter's son, Mr. Alfred Dawson, and, judging by a small specimen issued with a prospectus of the proposed publication, leaves nothing to desire. The plates will be accompanied by a biographical notice and critical review. The publishers are Messrs. Deighton and Dunthorne, 320, High Holborn, to whom subscribers' names should be forwarded.

The same publishers have lately issued an excellent etching by Mr. C. P. Slocombe, after the recently-discovered "Portrait of a Man," by Rembrandt, which has recently been added to the South Kensington collection.

The British Museum has lately acquired a small fragment of a terra-cotta tablet containing part of the annals of Nebuchadnezzar—namely, the portion relating to his thirty-seventh year and a war with Egypt.

A small leaden bowl, filled with gold and silver coins dating about the time of Nero, Claudius, and Vespasian, has been found at Aurons, near Aix (Bouches du Rhône).

The Reform Club is at present completing the scheme of decoration for its house which was proposed by Sir Charles Barry, and has not been fully carried out till now.

An addition has been made to the exhibition of the Photographic Society of Great Britain, which is now on view in Pall-mall East, of a fine series of photographs, illustrative of the scenery and natives of Cyprus, the work of Mr. John Thompson, F.R.G.S., and the exhibition, which was to have closed on the 9th, will now remain open until the 16th inst.

An exhibition of drawings by scholars and pupil-teachers attending the Board Schools in London was opened on Wednesday at the Saffron-hill Board School, Cross-street, Farringdon-road, E.C., and continued open during the week.

On Tuesday the new session of the Society of Biblical Archæology was opened at its rooms, 9, Conduit-street, Regent-street—the President, Dr. Samuel Birch, in the chair—when Mr. Theophilus G. Pinches, the late George Smith's successor as assistant to Dr. Birch, Keeper of the Oriental Antiquities in the British Museum, read a paper upon the Bronze Gates of Shalmaneser III., lately discovered by Mr. Rassam at Balawat.

THEATRES.

ROYAL AQUARIUM.

The autumnal morning season, devoted to the performances of specially selected artistes, begun at this house on Tuesday, and was numerously attended. The revivals consisted of "Grandfather Whitehead" and "The Liar." The former was produced in 1842 at the Haymarket, a drama adapted from the French by the late Mr. Mark Lemon, in which Mr. William Farren the elder acquired great distinction. This reproduction at the Aquarium has the advantage of being able to command the services of his son, who reproduces all the specialities of his father's method of acting the part. The resemblance almost amounts to an identification, and is a kind of marvel in its minuteness and closeness. In other respects the performance was excellently supported. Mr. E. F. Edgar, as Langley, was exactly the right man in the right place; and the other characters were very ably impersonated, particularly Louise Drayton by Miss Kate Corday, and Edward Drayton by Miss M. Brunton. Equally satisfactory was the cast of "The Liar." Here we had again Mr. W. Farren as Young Wilding, as true to the exuberances of youth as in the former character he had been to the infirmities of senility. Papillion, too, was well interpreted by Mr. Charles Collette. New scenery has been provided for these revivals, which are likely to retain possession of the boards for a considerable period.

ST. GEORGE'S HALL.

Mr. and Mrs. German Reed are again happy in their selection of Mr. F. C. Burnand for a dramatic entertainment full of humour and character. In the latter the new piece, entitled "A Tremendous Mystery," is so abundant that the elegant performers employed in its development have to double their parts, and do so with their usual success. The little drama (for a drama it is, and one exceedingly well constructed), deals with an old topic, a foolish domestic trouble viewed from the ridiculous side, which, while it defies narration, is so contrived as to amuse fashionable spectators. The artists engaged are all up to their work. Mr. Alfred Reed as a French count, and Miss Rosa Leo deserve particular appreciation. Mr. King Hall has contributed some charming music to the action and dialogue. We lose, however, Mr. Corney Grain, whose place is ably supplied by Mr. Arthur Sketchley, who gives us an account of Mrs. Brown's disasters at the Paris Exhibition. The whole performance is singularly successful.

Miss Marion Terry and Mr. Henry Neville will sustain the leading rôles in the new play, "A Republican Marriage," to be produced at the Olympic Matinée this morning. The authoress is said to be a member of the aristocracy.

The council of the Shakspeare Memorial Association held a meeting on Monday at Stratford-on-Avon, when arrangements were made for an inaugural festival on the next anniversary of the poet's birthday. The festival will extend over ten days, and will include performances of Shakspeare's finest plays, concerts, and other entertainments, so as to show the suitability of the theatre portion of the memorial to each of the purposes to which it is intended to be applied. The general arrangements are to be under the direction of Mr. Chatterton, who is one of the governors of the association.

Major-General A. Brown, C.B., late of the 44th Regiment, has been awarded the distinguished service reward vacant by the death of Lieutenant-General John Simpson, C.B.

Mr. Peake, the new representative of the London and City Bank, at Oxford, has been elected treasurer of the city, in the place of Mr. Rutherford Smith, deceased.

Her Majesty's troop-ship Malabar, which left Portsmouth on the 1st inst. for Plymouth en route to India, was towed into Plymouth on the following day, having been found some miles off Start Point, with her machinery broken down. She had troops on board for conveyance to India.

The Duke of Cambridge, accompanied by several members of the Horse Guards' staff, visited Aldershott on Monday and saw the infantry battalions perform the new system of field firing with ball ammunition. The enemy was represented by "dummies" in a sheltered trench with supports of reserve and artillery. General Steele and the Aldershott staff were present.

A meeting of millers and corn-merchants was held at the Corn Exchange on Monday, when it was resolved, in connection with the new Weights and Measures Act, henceforth to sell grain and the dry products thereof by weight only, and that one hundred Imperial pounds should be the selling standard. A large minority preferred to retain the present hundredweight. The meeting resolved to submit their decisions by a deputation to the Board of Trade.

Under the title of the Alexandra Album a handsomely-bound quarto portrait-album is in course of publication by Messrs. Marion and Co., of Soho-square. Its distinctive features are a series of thirteen designs, faithfully copied, in colours, from drawings by Mr. Henry Bright. The pictorial frontispiece shows a numerous group of birds; and the twelve succeeding illustrations, representing bird-life, together with different forms of botanical beauty, relate to the several months of the year. The album, which is of high finish, is adapted in the usual manner for the insertion of portraits.

Yesterday week the yearly municipal elections were held throughout England and Wales, and in most of the Parliamentary boroughs the contests were fought out on political rather than on local issues. Particularly was this the case in Birmingham, Liverpool, Sheffield, and other large towns in the Midlands and North.—On Tuesday last the annual municipal elections were held in most of the burghs in Scotland. In Edinburgh, although there were two or three changes on account of councillors retiring, yet there was no contest, a circumstance said to be unparalleled in the history of the city since the present election arrangements came into force.

THE FRENCH DELUGE.

Under the familiar title of The Revolution, by H. A. Taine, D.C.L., Oxon (Daldy, Isbister, and Co.), translated, as well, apparently, as could be reasonably desired, by John Durand, we have the first of the two volumes which will complete the second part of the author's "Origines de la France Contemporaine." The theme of the volume now under consideration is thus stated:—"Popular insurrections and the laws of the Constituent Assembly end in destroying all government in France." In other words, the volume contains a picture of that deluge which was to come after Louis XV., together with a sketch of the various causes which led to it, and of some striking scenes to which it gave rise. The volume is divided into three "books," whereof the first is entitled "Spontaneous Anarchy;" the second, "The Constituent Assembly, and the results of its labours;" the third, "The Application of the Constitution." Spontaneous seems a curious epithet to apply to an anarchy whereof the causes are investigated and traced in elaborate detail through a variety of channels. But let that pass: it is the anarchy itself, rather than the quality of it, with which we are chiefly concerned. The advent of that anarchy was foreshadowed, towards the end of 1788, in the correspondence of various civil and military authorities — correspondence in which we detect "the dull universal muttering of coming wrath." A general dearth sets the ball rolling; dearth is naturally followed by famine, by that hunger which Homer calls shameless, which urges the starving lion to pursue his prey to the very door of the homestead, the castle, the palace; the state of tension thus produced is increased by a whisper of better times coming, of relief to be extended by the hand of power; there is a determination to help on that time, to hasten that blessed hour; popular gatherings and riots ensue; then "the dregs of society at once come to the surface;" the Bastille is surrendered, not taken; Paris is in the hands of the mob, and, in the words of Malouet, "the Terror dates from the 14th of July," 1789. At any rate, anarchy has set in; and the first "book" closes with the spectacle of "the Government and the nation in the hands of the revolutionary party." As for the leaders of that party, this is the strain in which their antecedents and qualifications are described:—"Desmoulins, a briefless barrister, living in furnished lodgings, with petty debts, and on a few louis extracted from his relations. Loustalot, still more unknown, was admitted the previous year to the Parliament of Bordeaux, and has landed at Paris in search of a career. Danton, another second-rate lawyer, coming out of a hovel in Champagne, borrowed the money to pay his expenses, while his stinted household is kept up only by means of a louis which is given to him weekly by his father-in-law, who is a coffee-house-keeper. Brissot, a strolling Bohemian, formerly employé of literary pirates, has roamed over the world for fifteen years, without bringing back with him either from England or America anything but a coat out at elbows and false ideas; and, finally, Marat—a writer that has been hissed, an abortive scholar and philosopher, a misrepresenter of his own experiences, caught by the natural philosopher Charles in the act of committing a scientific fraud, and fallen from the top of his inordinate ambition to the subordinate post of doctor in the stables of the Comte d'Artois." This tone of scorn is all very well, but it is somewhat gratuitous, and of no argumentative force; many instances might be given of men who, with unpromising antecedents, have become shining lights when opportunity offered. However, to proceed to the second "book." It is a critical monograph, an exhaustive essay upon the Constituent Assembly and the Constitution of 1791; and of the work performed by that body a brief summary is expressed in the following words:—"In several of its laws, especially those which relate to private interests, in the institution of civil regulations, in the penal and rural codes, in the first attempts at, and the promise of, a uniform civil code, in the enunciation of a few simple regulations regarding taxation, procedure, and administration, it planted good seed. But in all that relates to political institutions and social organisation its proceedings are those of an academy of Utopians, and not those of practical legislators." The third "book," in which "the application of the Constitution" forms the titular subject of discussion, is little more or less than a somewhat bewildering collection of short narratives illustrating the general disorderly and sanguinary condition of France, before as well as after the date of the Constitution, but intended, no doubt, to confirm a statement, which is made in the preceding "book," and which is to the following effect:—"We see approaching the revolt of the peasantry, the insurrections of Nismes, Franche-Comté, La Vendée and Brittany, emigration, transportation, imprisonment, the guillotine or drowning for two thirds of the clergy of France, and likewise for myriads of the loyal, for husbandmen, artisans, day labourers, sempstresses, and servants, and the humblest among the lower class of the people. This is what the laws of the Constituent Assembly are leading to." No doubt all these horrors followed the promulgation of the laws mentioned, but it is sometimes difficult to distinguish between the "post hoc" and the "propter hoc;" it is quite true that "as the effects of the Constitution are developed, successive administrations become feebler and more partial; the unbridled populace has become more excitable and more violent; the enthroned club has become more suspicious and more despotic. Henceforth the club, through or in opposition to the administrative bodies, leads the populace, and the nobles will find it as hostile as the peasants;" but we know that effects are not always such as might reasonably have been expected, and that it is easy, with the wisdom which comes after the event, to show that what was meant to heal acted only as an aggravation. Nothing can stop the inevitable; and before the prophetic soul of a conscience-stricken king the French deluge loomed huge and inevitable, and it is extremely doubtful whether any measures whatever would have been more successful than the "Utopian" Constitution. The whole question had already been discussed to an almost wearisome extent before M. Taine took it in hand; but such a writer as he must needs command respectful attention. His method, too, has peculiar characteristics; he has relied, almost exclusively, upon the testimony of trustworthy eye-witnesses, he tells us, and "the footnotes at the bottom of the pages indicate the condition, office, name, and dwelling-place of those decisive witnesses," so that "the reader, confronting the texts, can interpret them for himself, and form his own opinions." Moreover, M. Taine repudiates anything like personal bias, any concern "with the discussions of the day;" he has written as if his "subject were the revolutions of Florence or Athens," esteeming his "vocation of historian too highly to make a cloak of it for the concealment of another."

The relief afforded by the Leicester-square Soup Kitchen and Refuge during the past year amounted to 102,595 meals, with 2600 nights' lodgings in the refuge. The Christmas dinner reached 1030 families; and 15½ tons of coals were distributed to the aged and sick. In the fourth week of January 3359 meals were given; in the fourth week of August 687. The institution is supported by voluntary contributions.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

"I like you not at all" is a sprightly song, the words and music both by Percy Fitzgerald, published by Messrs. Duff and Stewart; who have also issued some pleasing pianoforte pieces, among which are, "La Joie d'Amour," romance, and "Dewdrops on the Roses," rondo giojoso, both by W. F. Taylor; the Welsh air "Jenny Jones," effectively transcribed and varied by John Cheshire; "Invitation à la Polka," "Polonia" (mazurka), and "Galop de concert," three bright movements in dance style, by M. Bergson; "Les Filles de la Cour" (schottische), by F. St. George; and "Zart und Treue" ("Tender and True"), and "Verlobt" ("Betrothed"), two spirited sets of waltzes, as pianoforte duets, by Otto Müller.

"Reminiscence du Freischütz" and "Le Nozze di Figaro Reminiscence," both by Alexandre Billet (Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co.), are two short fantasias for the pianoforte in which well-known themes from the operas named are varied in a brilliant and showy manner, devoid of difficulty. The same publishers also issue three short pieces for the pianoforte, by G. J. Van Eyken. These are entitled respectively "Sarabande," "Intermezzo," and "Echo Song," and each is extremely pleasing in style and distinct in character.

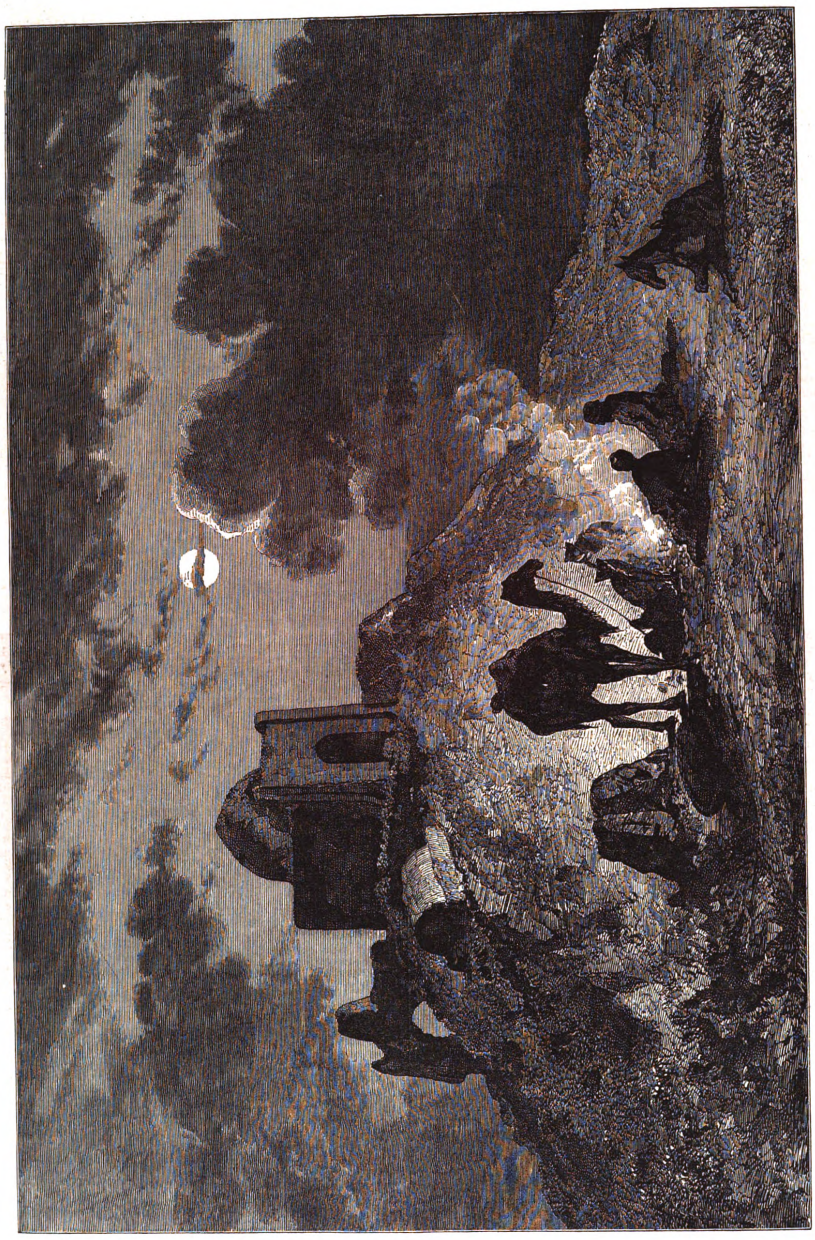
"Songs for Children," by George B. Lissant (Nelson and Sons), consists of twelve pieces, for voice with pianoforte accompaniment, the words and music being in a simple style, calculated to enlist the sympathy and attention of very young people. — This collection of songs is also issued, in small size, as portions of the "Royal School Series," with words and melody only, both in the prevailing notation and that of the Tonic Sol-Fa system, at a penny each.

We have heretofore called attention to the very characteristic music of Heinrich Hofman, whose compositions have recently found great favour in Germany. Since our previous notice several works have reached us from his English publishers, Messrs. Witt and Co., of Conduit-street, and these likewise possess a more than common interest. They consist of the following pianoforte pieces:—"Two Valse Caprices" (op. 2), "Album Leaves" (op. 11), "New Hungarian Dances" (arranged by F. Brissler)—all for piano solo—"Italian Love Tale," six duets (op. 19); "Albion," eight national airs transcribed (also duets), and "Silhouettes from Hungary, seven pianoforte pieces on original Hungarian melodies" (transcribed for violin and piano by F. Struss). All these are full of strongly-marked character. Messrs. Witt and Co. also publish a charming "Mai-lied," by Carl Reinecke, for voice, with pianoforte accompaniment. This is given in two editions, one for soprano or tenor, the other for contralto or baritone.

"Merrily oh!" (words by Thomas Moore) and "Country, Home, and King," are two very characteristic songs by Stephen Jarvis—published by B. Williams, who also issues two effective vocal pieces by H. Pontet, "Bring back my Flowers," and "The Fog Bell" (descriptive song); and a very spirited "Caprice à la Bourrée," and a capital "Giga," in old style, for the pianoforte, by Stephen Jarvis.

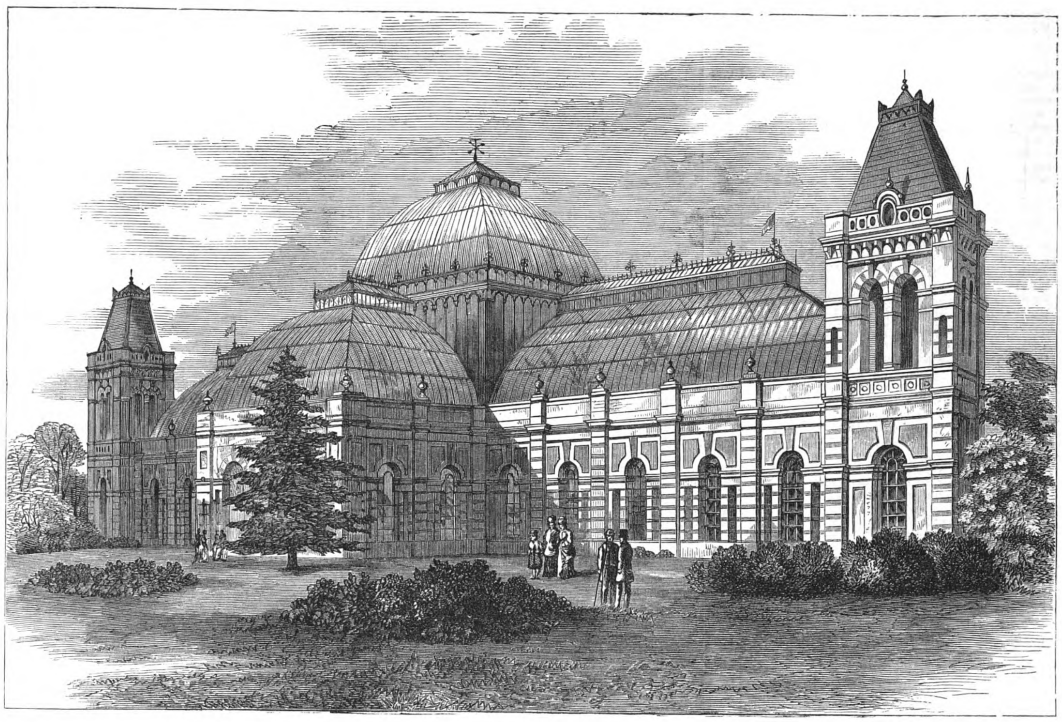
"Howard's Harmonium Library" (Howard and Co.) is a series of shilling numbers containing movements well adapted for the instrument named, edited, and partly composed, by F. Scarsbrook.

"The Imperial Grand Polonaise" by Madame Oury (Cuningham Boosey and Co) is a brilliant pianoforte piece, in the dance style indicated, by a lady well known as a pianiste.



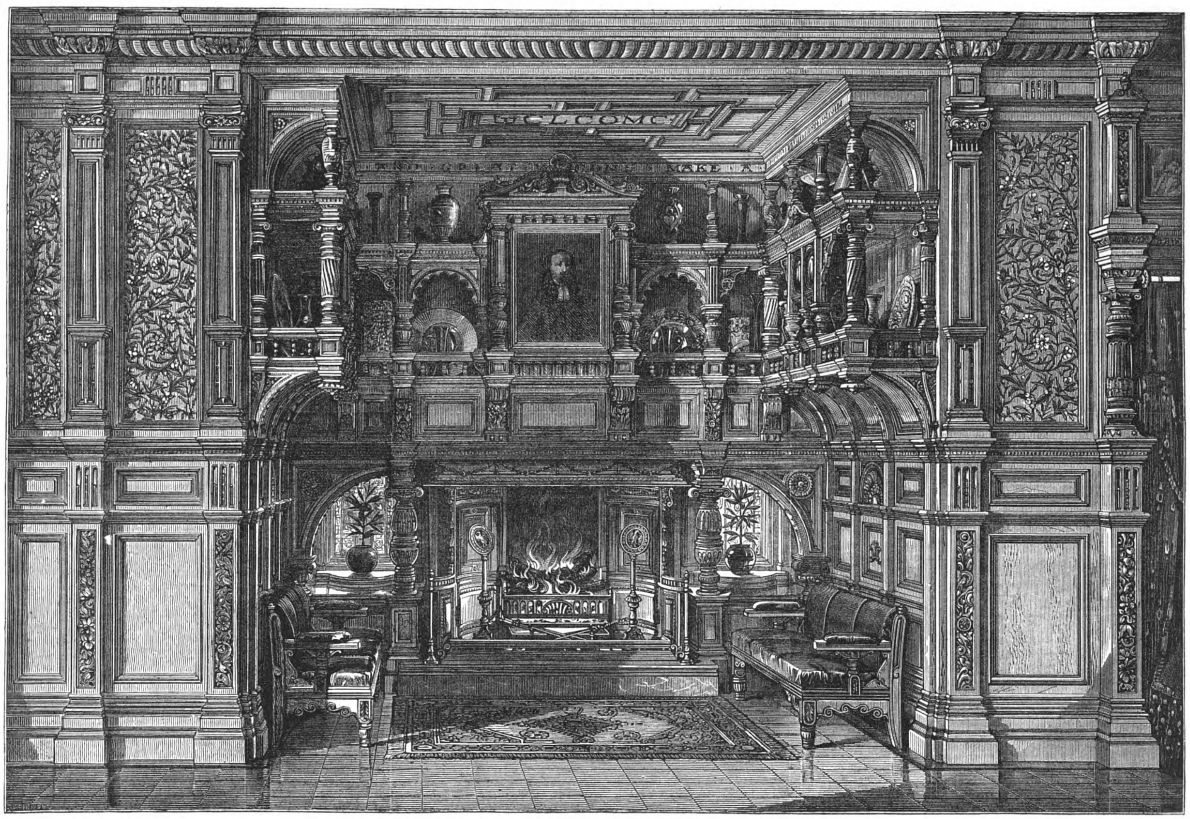
THE SHORES OF LAKE ARAL.

We present a view of a scene in the desert of Kara Koom, or "Black Sand," north-west of the Sea of Aral. It is one of a series of pictures, by a Russian artist, Mr. N. V. Karajin, of St. Petersburg, several of whose works have appeared in our Journal. The vast territories of the Russian Empire in Central Asia, recently much enlarged by the conquest of the Turcoman Principalities on the Syr Daria (Jaxartes) and the Amu Daria (Oxus) rivers, east of the Caspian and south-east of the Aral Seas, consist in great part of uninhabitable plains, though fertile and populous districts are situated on the banks of those rivers and their tributaries, about Khiva, Bokhara, Samarcand, Khokand, and Tashkend, which is the Russian capital. The Oxus, as students of ancient geography know, formerly took its course westward to the Caspian, instead of northward to the Aral Sea; and we now hear a startling rumour that it has been restored, possibly by some artificial cutting or clearing of the old channel to its former course. This lies through another Kara Koom desert, extending from Khiva nearly six hundred miles to the eastern shore of the Caspian, where the traces of the former bed of the Oxus may still be discerned. The whole region is depressed much below the ocean level, and there can be little doubt that the Aral and the Caspian are but the remnants of a far more extensive inland freshwater sea, which may have discharged the bulk of the waters into the Euxine at some prehistoric time. This immense emptied basin, as it may be considered, is a barren tract of sand, interspersed with tracts of clay, beds of gypsum and selenite, and layers of sea shells, with scanty vegetation, only a few stunted bushes here and there, and with little of higher animal life than insects and reptiles, or wildfowl in the shallow lagoons. Post stations have been constructed along the routes of travel, and wells of brackish water, at intervals of twelve or fifteen miles, but the men and horses there stationed are fed, in many instances, with grain, meat, and forage brought them from a great distance. We have no cause to envy the Russians their possession of such a dreary and forbidding country, or even that of the Turcoman and Tartar Khanates, inhabited by a barbarous race, the government of whose territory costs Russia more than it is worth.



Mr. Barnaby, Director of Naval Construction, upon the occasion of presenting prizes to the successful students of science classes in Sheerness on Saturday, dwelt with some degree of severity upon the want of artistic and scientific enterprise on the part of our private shipbuilders.

The Emperor of Germany has forwarded to the Rev. M. Woodward, Vicar of Folkestone, a beautiful Bible, bearing the following inscription on the cover:—"William, Emperor of Germany, to the Rev. Matthew Woodward, in recognition of his valuable services, assistance, and sympathy shown on the occasion of the loss of H.M.S. Grosser Kurfürst."



At Bath on Monday Mr. Murch, the Mayor, was presented with a testimonial, consisting of a salver, together with a marble bust and a bronze copy of the Warwick Vase, in token of the untiring zeal and great ability with which during a long period of years he has striven to promote the best interests of the city of Bath and county of Somerset.—Councillor S. W. Wearing, of Lancaster, has presented to the Corporation of that town, in token of his pleasant connection with that body in 1878, a handsome badge and collar for the use of the Mayor. Messrs. Bell and Atkinson, of Lancaster, furnished the design, and intrusted the work to Messrs. Williams, of Hatton-garden.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION: CHIMNEY FITTINGS IN RECESS AND PART OF DINING-ROOM SHOWN BY MESSRS. HOWARD AND SONS, OF LONDON.

"HORACE IN LONDON."

The other day, on a little bookstall in Westminster, among cheap oleographs of actresses, old hymn-books, back numbers of Cassell's Magazine, and odd volumes of novels once fashionable, I saw a copy of a book hardly known to the present generation except by name; though once it was among the most popular works of two authors whose fame even now is great—the brothers Smith, whose "Rejected Addresses" remain at the head of all poetical parody. But their "Horace in London"—which I had now the chance of buying for fourpence—cannot be said to have lived; indeed, but for the "Rejected Addresses" its very name would most likely be forgotten.

But I paid my fourpence and took it home, feeling that at such a price 173 pages of the gossip of nearly seventy years ago could not be dear; and very interesting reading it proved to be, full of reminders of "Vanity Fair," whose early chapters are concerned with exactly the period at which this book was published—it is dated 1813, and its contents had most of them recently appeared in the magazines of the day. Jos Sedley (had he been a reading man) would have found in them many a mention of Vauxhall; Osborne was, no doubt, pretty familiar with the regions of Drury-lane, Hart-street, Soho, which are quoted in the Bacchic odes where to-day St. John's-wood, Brompton, Pimlico would be named.

The object of the book is rather ambitious: it is, to imitate in English—freely, of course, and in the lightest burlesque spirit, with constant allusion to London people and modern fashions—the Odes of Horace; and though these imitations were executed in no order, but merely as passing events suggested reference to the different odes, the first and second Books are here completely represented, with only one omission (Bk. I. od. xxi). Of the merits and faults of these satires of a day one can, of course, hardly judge now that that day is so long passed. To really understand the book every page would need copious annotation, and one loses the spirit of fun that has to be thus laboriously thought out. Yet one may say that, while the literary level is throughout not a high one—the general workmanship being decidedly inferior to that of the better vers de société of to-day—some of the odes are rendered with a good deal of grace and spirit, and throughout the book there occur constantly lines and couplets of real wit.

The first line of all—of course, a parody of Mœcenas atavis edite regibus—is very happy; it begins the dedication of the the volume "To John Bull, Esq." —

> Dread Sir! half human, half divine!

And there is more than one couplet which ought to have become proverbial. The sense of the end of Ode xv. Book II. is capitally caught in—

> Our charity begins at home,
> And mostly ends where it begins.

The ode to Iccius (I. xxix.) is changed to an address to a wife, who had turned out a termagant; and it concludes—

> I took you for better as well as for worse,
> But find you are wholly the latter.

And it was really an exceedingly happy idea (pace Mr. Kegan Paul) to turn the cruel Ode to Lydia grown old—Parcias junctas quatiunt fenestras—into an address to Godwin, then a long way past the prime of his reputation.

Many of these so-called Imitations are merely modern satires suggested by the general bearing of some particular Ode; in some, indeed, the likeness would hardly occur to one without the prefixed first line of the original. Others, however, are closer. The very best of the whole collection, a charming little poem of society, renders exactly the spirit of the ode Tu ne quæsieris (I. xi.), and is, indeed, perhaps the happiest version of it that we know. It is rechristened "Fortune Telling," and shows the brothers Smith at their best. At their worst they give us some sad examples of the clumsy, forced, and commonplace handling of difficult trochaic and anapæstic metres, at that time so frequent. Distinction and grace of metre and finish of workmanship were not, in fact, the characteristics of any of the poets then most popular—Byron, Scott, and Moore are (I think) the only names mentioned in this volume; it is the influence of Shelley and Keats which has made it impossible for the writers of our time to crowd their lines with false emphasis, to roll into one nominal dactyl three words of equal importance and eight or nine heavy consonants—the perfect and unhesitating flow of Mr. Swinburne's melody would, in 1813, have been almost as great a novelty as the vagueness of his meanings, or the eccentricity of his morals.

In their subjects vers de société can never, in the nature of things, vary very much: a dash of politics, a good many dashes of personality and scandal, a fair amount of flattery, and a great deal of lovemaking, with constant hits at the fashions of the day in dress, in amusements, even in religion: these matters always were and always will be the staple of such poetry as that of which Mr. Frederick Locker just now is Laureate. But for this very reason the lighter verse of a period is always interesting, as it reflects (and faithfully enough) those minor features which express character so faithfully, and which, nevertheless, the Muse of History is too great a lady to notice.

To the Londoner, for example, who loves and studies his city, how pleasant it is to mark the growth and decay of its various quarters, as in the allusions and descriptions in these verses he may. Hyde Park, to be sure, was as fashionable in 1813 as it is in 1878; but one is amused to find the parvenu citizen, as he grows in wealth, moving from his modest house in Laurence Pountney-lane to a grander one in Russell-square—next door, it may be, to the Sedleys'. Clapham-common, too, seems to have been a haven much desired by the ambitious merchant—who, it may be noted, if he did not spend his holiday at Brighton (then in the flush of its first fame) went more often to a literal "watering-place,' with a spa (as Bath or Cheltenham), than to the seaside. Of the reputation of Drury-lane and Hart-street at this period I have spoken—there are constant allusions to them—and to Vauxhall, with its wherries, whose "jolly young watermen," in these days of penny steamers, find their occupation almost entirely gone.

Of course, the great historical event of the day, which threw its shadow over even the lightest verse, was the French Revolution, with Napoleon's subsequent career. In the "Stock-Jobber's Lament" (II. xiii. Ille et nefasto te posuit die) we find, in less artistic form, exactly the furious denunciations of old Sedley at the coffee-house, in that wonderful twentieth chapter of "Vanity Fair;" and Napoleon's second marriage is alluded to satirically in Ode xxvi., "The Straw Bonnet." Of the dreaded invasion there are several hints, and in the second ode we even find the question—

> What power can awe the impending Gaul,
> What psalm avert Britannia's fall?

The nature of the allusions to the Revolution may be easily imagined; if any Englishman of the day saw the necessity of, the good hidden in, that vast evil, we may be sure that such a man was no comic poetaster. The Jacobins are spoken of with the unmixed horror with which a Scotch Presbyterian would speak of the Catholics; and in a mood not much less savage are Cobbett and perhaps even Burdett attacked.

Many difficulties must, of course, occur, when one reads a work of this class more than sixty years after its publication. In some of the odes line after line has its allusion, and each needs an explanatory note. Take the second poem in the volume (Jam satis terris)—what reader can offhand explain this single verse?

> Come, Winsor's lamp, Polito's apes,
> Come, Hawke, thou peer of many capes,
> Pearl-button'd and drab-coated spark!
> And thou, the dame of wicked wit,
> Round whom the infant hoaxes flit,
> Come, mighty Mistress Clarke.

Winsor, we are reminded in the next ode, introduced gas about this time; and the infamous lady mentioned in the last line is perhaps not quite forgotten yet; but who was Polito, and who was Hawke? Again, what percentage of existing Englishmen can give the full name of the unvenerable nobleman alluded to in the lines—

> 'Tis folly yourself and your readers to vex
> With verses as feeble and bald as old Q.?

Sixty years ago this title was as familiar as the name of George III.; now, we question whether one person in ten thousand would be able to ascribe it to its rightful owner—the Duke of Queensberry, a favourite object of the caricature of the time. And we must confess ourselves entirely puzzled by the nickname bestowed by our authors on Cobbett—"Botley Bifrons;" though there is perhaps a sort of general appropriateness about its sound.

But one might consider for hours the past allusions of this fourpennyworth of forgotten literature; let me summarise in a few lines some of their leading features. In religion, the "sensations" of the day were Huntingdon, of the "new light," and—as one is rather surprised to learn—Swedenborg. Boxing and driving tandems seem to have been the principal amusements of the young "bloods;" and Romeo Coates their favourite butt. Garnerin, with his balloon, represented the popular scientific plaything; and the folly of the moment was the "great O. P. riots." George Colman the younger seems to have been looked up to as the leader of the English wits—who could now read Broad Grins?—as Kemble headed the tragedians, and the great Grimaldi the mimes. The Edinburgh Reviewers, Townsend (the celebrated Bow-street runner), Count Rumford, Dr. Busby, these names, now for the most part sinking to oblivion, meet us on every page; and we cannot help making our own imaginary list of the heroes of to-day who in another half-century will have joined them.

If such reading as this is pleasant, it is yet sad; we all know Thackeray's wonderful comparison between the creations of Fielding and the real people of their time—how these have disappeared, those live for ever—and we must be sorry for the real people. And there is, among the minor renowns at all events, a capriciousness in the doings of fate which is exceedingly annoying. Why should the name of Joanna Southcott be still recollected, while that of Whitbread has so nearly disappeared? In what way was Mendoza more worthy of fame than Garnerin—was not Garnerin, rather, the more deserving of the two? Is it not irritating that Romeo Coates should still be a name, if nothing more, while a generation has arisen which knows not Count Rumford?

It is only when we come to the mighty reputations that "the justice of it" pleases us. Napoleon fills the world of his time as fully as ever; Wellington is only remembered because he beat Napoleon. Scott's poetry has gone the way of such-like things; Wordsworth's fame has hardly yet ceased growing. The genius of Byron is recognised now as then; the smallness of Moore has become evident to all men. The "Ancient Mariner" has lost absolutely nothing; but where is the "Curse of Kehama"? And, to return to our immediate subject, has not time very satisfactorily settled the relative values of "Rejected Addresses" and "Horace in London"?

Enough; there is but little to be said upon a theme so old. We have known, these many years, that fashion is fashion and satire—only satire. Neither is a particularly good thing, yet each has some virtue—is some proof of movement, of thought, of a desire for higher things. If life were absolutely stagnant there could be no change of fashion; if men were absolutely bad, there would be no hope of satire. Both appertain, in a way, to life and manliness; though it is possible that those periods are best when their influence is least felt—because they are likely then to be least needed. Such periods are those of enthusiasm and of progress; such a period was not the year 1813—such, alas! is not 1878.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

Among the British exhibitors in the Champ de Mars, at Paris, we must notice with approval Messrs. Howard and Sons, of Berners-street, London. The object of these manufacturers has been to show that labour-saving machines may be employed in the production of decorative house fittings, whether as forming integral portions of the building, or detached articles of furniture. This is performed without sacrificing artistic effect and excellence to the all-debasing endeavour to produce the "cheap" or, more correctly speaking, worthless article, which too frequently would appear to be the main object aimed at by many manufacturers of household goods of the present time. The articles shown by Messrs. Howard and Sons display work of considerable artistic merit, designed by their artist, Mr. Randall, and produced at a cost not beyond the reach of the many, but manufactured with the greatest care, and certainly of thoroughly seasoned materials. A close inspection of the work will not discover a single open joint or split in the wood, and this after the ordeal of a French summer. We now proceed to mention some of the articles exhibited. In many old English houses the "chimney corner" is still to be met with, one which had evidently been designed for grandeur of effect, while those of the present day too often bear evidence of the cost being limited at the expense of all true art-principles. The chimney corner exhibited at Paris by Messrs. Howard and Sons, the manufacturers, may be classed as belonging to the English Renaissance in style. Their arrangement at the Exhibition shows part of a dining-room or hall in a large country house, having a recess, at the back of which is a fireplace extending its whole width, with hobs at each side; in the centre is a dog-stove, placed upon a raised hearth, and inside a screen with a brass hood over it, panelled and ornamented with repoussé work, concave on plan, and designed to concentrate and throw forward the heat, while at the same time protecting the surrounding woodwork from its dangerous influence. We refer to our Illustration of this arrangement. The prevailing taste for china and bric-à-brac has evidently suggested the gallery over and round the sides, and provision has been made in the centre, or place of honour, for some family or historical picture. Over each hob in the lower part is a window, affording an outlook across the country, having in the centre a panel of stained glass, its subject illustrative of the true spirit of old English hospitality. The whole arrangement appears as though suggested by the song of "the old English Gentleman." The entire arrangement is expressive of comfort and hospitality; and, although of elaborate workmanship and design, it has a pleasing effect of harmony and repose, which reflects great credit on the designer; while the manufacturers have carried out his ideas in a thoroughly honest and truthful manner, the whole being of solid oak without any "shams" or veneering. The carving of natural foliage, strongly conventionalised, is well and vigorously cut, producing at once a pleasing effect, not weakened by evidence of mechanical labour employed in scraping and sand-papering. On each side of the recess is a settle, standing upon a parquet floor made of teak, and entirely produced by machinery, every joint being made by the saw, and unplaned; notwithstanding which, in the hundreds of joints, not one would admit of the insertion of a piece of writing-paper edgeways. The ceiling, which cannot be well shown in our illustration, is panelled and ornamented with old English mottoes. The remaining portion of the room has a dado in corresponding style, panelled and moulded, with pilasters dividing the upper walls into compartments, and supporting an enriched cornice surmounting panels of needlework embroidered on blue cloth. A few months hence will see this work re-erected in the dining-room of the purchaser, who is M.P. for Hull.

OBITUARY.

THE DOWAGER LADY ARUNDELL.

The Right Hon. Theresa, Dowager Lady Arundell, died at Northcourt, Abingdon, on the 26th ult. Her Ladyship was born March 21, 1812, the fifth daughter of William, seventeenth; Lord Stourton was married June 19, 1838, as his third wife, to Henry Benedict, eleventh Baron Arundell of Wardour (father, by his second wife, of the present Lord Arundell of Wardour), and had two sons and three daughters. Her eldest daughter, the Hon. Theresa Mary, married, first, April 17, 1861, Sir Alfred Joseph Doughty Tichborne, Bart., brother of Roger, who was lost at sea in 1854, and had a son, who died an infant, and a posthumous son, the present Sir Henry Alfred Doughty Tichborne, born May 28, 1866, three months after his father's death. Lady Tichborne is now the wife of Captain Henry Wickham, late Rifle Brigade.

SIR T. S. DYER, BART.

Sir Thomas Swinnerton Dyer, ninth Baronet, late Captain Royal Artillery, died at 14, Redcliffe-square, on the 31st ult., aged seventy-nine. He was only son of Sir John Dyer, K.C.B., by Jane, his wife, daughter of Simon Halliday, Esq., of Westcombe Park, Kent. He was educated at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, and served in the R.A. from 1825—1832. He succeeded to the baronetcy at the decease of his uncle, Sir Thomas Swinnerton Dyer, in 1854. He married, Feb. 7, 1832, Mary Anne, daughter of Colonel J. A. Clement, R.A., and had four sons, of whom the eldest inherits the title, and is the present Sir Swinnerton Halliday Dyer, tenth Bart. The Baronetcy of Dyer was conferred in 1678 on Sir William Dyer, who married Thomasine, daughter and heiress of Thomas Swinnerton, Esq., of Stanwey Hall, Essex.

SIR G. G. SUTTIE, BART.

Sir George Grant Suttie, fifth Bart., of Belgone, in the county of Haddington, who died on the 30th ult., was born Aug. 1, 1797, the only son of Sir James Grant Suttie, fourth Baronet, by Katherine Isabella, his wife, second daughter of James Hamilton, Esq., of Bangour, and served, in 1817 and 1818, in the Scots Fusilier Guards. He was a J.P. and D.L. for Haddingtonshire and a magistrate for the counties of Aberdeen and Berwick. Sir George married, Sept. 3, 1829, Lady Harriet, daughter of Francis, seventh Earl of Wemyss, and by her (who died May 30, 1858) leaves three sons and two daughters. Of the former, the eldest, now Sir James Grant Suttie, sixth Baronet, D.L., born 1830; married, 1857, Lady Susan Harriet Innes Ker, elder daughter of James Henry Robert, sixth Duke of Roxburghe, and has one son and three daughters.

THE REV. G. LONGFIELD.

The Rev. George Longfield, D.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, died suddenly on the 3rd inst. He was eldest son of the Rev. Mountifort Longfield, Vicar of Dersertserges, in the diocese of Cork, J.P., by Mary Anne, his second wife, daughter of Colonel William Conner, and was consequently grandson of John Longfield, Esq., of Longueville, M.P. for Mallow, who died in 1815. Dr. Longfield's elder and half-brother is the Right Hon. Mountifort Longfield, Q.C., LL.D., formerly Judge of the Landed Estates Court in Ireland. Dr. Longfield gained his Fellowship in 1842, and since then devoted himself chiefly to classics and Oriental languages. In 1864 he was appointed the Erasmus Smith Lecturer in Hebrew, and five years later succeeded Dr. Todd in the Hebrew Regius Professorship. In his knowledge of Chaldee, Syriac, and the obscurer Semitic tongues he was pre-eminently distinguished, and as a Hebraist his attainments were of a very high order. He married, July 28, 1859, Mary Webb, eldest daughter of Nathaniel Webb Ware, Esq.

MR. FOOTT, OF CARRIGACUNNA CASTLE.

Henry Baldwin Foott, Esq., of Carrigacunna Castle, in the county of Cork, J.P., died on the 2nd inst., in his 101st year. But a few weeks since he was presented by his brother magistrates with an address on the completion of his one hundredth year. He was born Sept. 11, 1778, the second son of Richard Foott, Esq., of Millford, Colonel of the North Cork Militia, by Mary, his wife, daughter of Henry Baldwin, Esq., of Curryoody. He married, March 6, 1823, Jane, eldest daughter of the Rev. Edward Mitchell Carleton, and by her, who died in 1873, leaves, with other issue, a son, the present George Carleton Foott, Esq., of Carrigacunna Castle. As to the fact of Mr. Foott having passed his hundredth year there can be no controversy. The evidence is clear and decisive. What a wondrous century of events did not his long life embrace—the American War of Independence, the great French Revolution, Napoleon's whole career, the discovery of the steam-engine, the railway, and the electric wire.

The deaths have also been announced of—

William Dunbar Sinclair, Esq., on the 27th ult., at Forss House, Caithness.

Major John Bellamy, 17th Regiment, on the 19th ult., at the camp, Shorncliffe.

Major-General John Wray Mitchell, R.A., on the 30th ult., at his seat, Castle Strange, in the county of Roscommon, in his seventieth year. He was the only surviving son of the late Edward Mitchell, Esq., of Castle Strange, by Mary Ann, his wife, daughter of the late John Wray, Esq., of Hull. He married, in 1838, his cousin, Anne Sarah, daughter of John Wray, Esq., and by her, who died in 1852, leaves, with other issue, a son, Major Edward Mitchell, R.E.

The Rev. John Nutcombe Gould, for thirty years Rector of Stokeinteignhead, on the 19th ult., aged seventy-three.

Colonel Andrew Simpson Smith, Bengal Infantry, on the 27th ult., at Norwood-terrace, Southsea.

Captain Hugh Alexander Kennedy, late Forfar and Kincardine Militia, and Lieutenant Retired List Madras Army, on the 22nd ult., at Ailsa House, Reading, aged sixty-nine.

The Hon. Mrs. Wrottesley (Ellen Charlotte), wife of the Hon. Edward Bennet Wrottesley, to whom she was married in 1846, and daughter of George Rush, Esq., of Elsenham Hall.

Mrs. Frances Freeland Broderip, relict of the Rev. John Somerville Broderip, M.A., Rector of Cossington, Somerset, and only daughter of the late Thomas Hood, poet, on Nov. 3, at Clevedon, aged forty-eight.

The Hon. Anne Elizabeth Lady Williamson, on the 4th inst., at her residence in Lower Belgrave-street. She was the third daughter of Thomas Henry first Lord Ravensworth, was born in 1801, and married on April 18, 1826, Sir Hedworth Williamson, Bart., who died in April, 1861.

John William Miles, Esq., who formerly represented Bristol in the Conservative interest in the House of Commons, on the 5th inst., aged sixty-one, at his residence near Bristol. He was a director of the Great Western Railway, and a member of the banking firm of Sir William Miles and Co.

General David Birrell, late of the Bengal Infantry, in his seventy-ninth year. He obtained his commission as Ensign on Aug. 30, 1818; served in the Burmese war, with the army of the Indus in Afghanistan in 1839-40, and in the Sutlej campaign of 1845-6, having a horse killed under him at the battle of Ferozeshah. He afterwards commanded a brigade at the battle of Sobraon.

Lieutenant-Colonel Frederick Nassau Dore, late staff-officer of pensioners at Tower-hill. He joined the service in 1841, served with the Buffs at the Battle of Punniar, and with the 20th Regiment in the second portion of the Crimean campaign. He was wounded before Sebastopol, and took part in the expedition to Kinburn. Colonel Dore was subsequently employed as staff-officer of pensioners at Derby, and afterwards in the London district. He retired from the service last year by the sale of his commission.

Mr. Kenneth Macleay, R.S.A., in Edinburgh, on Saturday last, aged seventy-six. Before the introduction of photography he was in repute as a miniature painter. About 1873 he received a commission from the Queen to paint sketch portraits of several of her servants at Balmoral, and also a series of representative men of the clans in their distinctive tartans. Mr. Macleay was the last of the original members of the Royal Scottish Academy established in 1826.

Charles John Sidebottom, Esq., of Elm Bank, in the county of Worcester, J.P. for the counties of Hereford and Worcester, Barrister-at-Law, on the 26th ult., at Elm Bank, in his eighty-ninth year. He was the third son of the late Radclyffe Sidebottom, Esq., of Middleton, in the county of Lancaster, Barrister-at-Law, by Anne, his wife, daughter and heir of Kingsford Venner, Esq., of Cosenden, Kent, and leaves, with other issue, a son, Colonel Francis John Sidebottom Venner, married to Flora Jane, daughter of the late Right Hon. William Yates Peel, of Bagginton Hall, in the county of Warwick.

Nearly the whole of the western wing of Maynooth College was destroyed by fire yesterday week. The library was saved, but many books were injured. All the effects of the students residing in the western wing were burned.

On Monday evening the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress entertained the General Purposes Committee of the Corporation, and the Master, Wardens, and Court of the Tin-Plate Workers' Company, of which the Lord Mayor is a member, at dinner in the Egyptian Hall of the Mansion House.

Mr. J. G. Edwards, at a meeting of the Farmers' Club, held at the Caledonian Hotel on Monday evening, read a paper on the necessity of greater unity of action in the agricultural interest. Having pointed out the power which union gave, he mentioned, among grievances which required to be remedied, the restriction on the method of cultivation, the undue preservation of game, and the want of greater representation in the House of Commons. A discussion followed.

According to the quarterly report of the Registrar General, in the United Kingdom the births of 285,506 children, and the deaths of 167,084 persons of both sexes, were registered in the three months ending Sept. 30. The recorded natural increase of population was thus 118,422. The registered number of persons married in the quarter ending June 30 was 118,484. The resident population of the United Kingdom in the middle of 1878 is estimated at 33,881,966; that of England and Wales at 24,854,397, of Scotland 3,593,929, and of Ireland 5,433,640.

The Agent-General for New South Wales has been informed by telegram of the arrival in Sydney of the ship La Hogue, which sailed from Plymouth with emigrants in July last.—The barque Carnatic, of 871 tons, Captain Rhind, sailed from Gravesend on the 25th ult., and had on board the following number of emigrants for Rockhampton, viz.:—38 married people, 101 single men, 123 single women, 33 children between the ages of twelve and one, and 7 infants.—A Reuter's telegram from New Zealand states that the City of Auckland, a Government emigrant-ship, with 245 emigrants for Hawke's Bay, has been wrecked on Otaki Beach. The emigrants and crew have all been saved, as well as most of the luggage.

The reference in our "Echoes" of Oct. 19 to "the time of day being laid on by wire to all our clocks" was, it seems, the echo of a true report, such a system being an accomplished fact, both as regards London and several of the larger provincial towns. In London ten miles of such "time wires" have been laid down, serving over eighty establishments, including the Bank of England, Lloyd's, &c., and keeping over 108 clocks to "true time." The system is that of "synchronisation," invented and worked by Messrs. Barraud and Lunds, of Cornhill. One of its many advantages is the impossibility of any such result as that anticipated in the paragraph referred to of "severed connections" leaving "so many dials without knowing what o'clock it is," the little "synchronizer" being applied to any existing clocks of any size or kind, the severance of its connecting wire simply leaves the clock to return to the old error of its ways, without in any way stopping or interfering with it.

White to play, and mate in three moves.

CHESS IN LONDON.

A Game played recently between two Metropolitan Amateurs.

(Philidor's Defence.)

WHITE (Mr. M.)	BLACK (Mr. E.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. Kt to K B 3rd	P to Q 3rd
3. B to B 4th	Kt to Q B 3rd

Inferior to 3. P to Q B 3rd or 3. B to K 2nd, as it allows White to convert the opening into a variation of the Giuoco Piano favourable to the first player.

4. P to Q B 3rd	B to K 3rd

25. B to Q 4th	K to B sq
26. Kt to Q 2nd

WHITE (Mr. M.)	BLACK (Mr. E.)
Leading to a very ingenious combination; but, to our thinking, unnecessarily perilous to the position.
26.	Kt takes Kt
27. B takes Kt P (ch)	Q takes B
28. R to K 8th (ch)	K to B 2nd

This produces an easier game for Black to play than that springing from 28. K takes R; although, in the latter case, he remains with a Rook and two minor pieces for the Queen.

29. Q to Q 7th (ch)	K to Kt 3rd
30. Q takes B (ch)	K to R 2nd
31. Q takes Kt	R takes R
32. Q takes R	Q to K R 2nd (ch)

White's manœuvres to shut out the adverse Queen and get his Knight into play again have been extremely well judged.

CHESS AT THE DIVAN.

The following Game occurred a few days ago between two amateurs, White yielding the odds of the Queen's Knight.

(Evans's Gambit.)

WHITE (Mr. A.)	BLACK (Mr. Y.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt to Q B 3rd
3. B to B 4th	B to B 4th
4. P to Q Kt 4th	B takes P
5. P to B 3rd	B to B 4th
6. Castles	P to Q 3rd
7. P to Q 4th	P takes P
8. P takes P	B to Kt 3rd
9. B to Kt 2nd	Kt to Q R 4th

A player giving the odds of a Knight cannot be blamed for following the best-known variations of an opening; but the move in the text is inferior to 9. Kt to K B 3rd, as a reply to 9. B to Kt 2nd.

10. R to Q B sq	Kt to K 2nd
11. B takes K B P (ch)

The success that follows this alarming sacrifice is its only justification.

11.	K takes B
12. Kt to Kt 5th (ch)	K to K sq
13. Q to R 5th (ch)	Kt to K 3rd
14. P to Q 5th	Q to K 2nd
15. K R to K sq	K to B sq
16. P to K 5th	Kt takes K P

This affords White an opportunity for a pretty finish, whereas 16. Kt to K B 8th would have given him some trouble.

17. R takes Kt	P takes R
18. B to B 3rd, and wins.

DEATH OF CAPTAIN KENNEDY.

It is with great regret that we record the death of Captain Hugh Kennedy, a frequent contributor to this column during the past thirty years, and one of the most pleasing writers upon the subject of chess. Captain Kennedy had achieved a high reputation as a chessplayer so far back as 1844, and, in 1851, he was the most energetic supporter of the International Chess Tournament held in London during the summer of that year. To that undertaking he devoted a liberal purse, and to the unfortunate controversy he attended its opening and followed its close, in facile and powerful pen. He was a competitor in the lists of the tourney as well, and carried off the sixth prize, a fine performance for any amateur when pitted against such adversaries as St-unton, Wyvill, Williams, Andersen, Szen, Kieseritzky, and Löwenthal. While in practice, indeed, Captain Kennedy was ranked among the players of first-rate strength; but when at the top of his force, it became evident from his writings that the literature and history of chess, and the romantic legends that cling to it, had more charms for him than practical play. Hence he is probably more widely known as the author of "Waifs and Strays from the Chess-board," and as a contributor to the Athenæum and Notes and Queries than as the competitor of Staunton, Buckle, Wyvill, and of nearly all the great players of the most brilliant era in the records of the game of chess. During the last few years his health had been failing, and he had been obliged to avoid the rigours of our climate by wintering abroad. Nevertheless, whether his home was in Madeira or at Reading, his interest in the game never faded. It was manifested in his latest contribution to its literature, a letter addressed to the Illustrated London News upon the subject of the first chess-match by electric telegraph, published in our Issue of July 20 last. Captain Kennedy died on the 22nd ult. at his residence, Ailsa House, Reading, in his sixty-ninth year.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Feb. 19, 1878) of the Right Hon. and Rev. Francis William, Baron Dynevor, late of Dynevor Castle, Carmarthen, and of Fairford, Gloucestershire, who died on Aug. 3 last, at No. 54, Brook-street, Hanover-square, was proved on the 24th ult. by the Right Hon. Eliza Amelia, Baroness Dynevor, the widow, the Hon. John Talbot Rice, the brother, and Henry George Augustus Knox, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £60,000. The testator appoints the residue of the trust funds under the marriage settlement of his first wife to his daughter, the Hon. Mrs. Ellen Joyce; all his East Indian Five per Cent stock he leaves upon trust for his children by his present wife; £1000, and all his furniture, pictures, and effects (except certain plate and other things specifically bequeathed) to his wife; and the residue of his property upon trust for his wife for life, and then for all his children by her.

The will (dated Feb. 10, 1873) with three codicils (dated April 3 and June 16, 1873, and March 6, 1875) of the Rev. Arthur Gibson, Vicar of Chedworth, Gloucestershire, who died on Aug. 7 last, was proved on the 29th ult. by Richard Gibson, the brother, the sole executor, the personal estate being sworn under £140,000. The testator specifically devises part of his freehold property to his brother George and other part to his brother Richard; to the Provost and Scholars of Queen's College, Oxford, he bequeaths £4000 Consols upon trust for the dividends to be paid to the Vicar of Chedworth for his own use for ever; to the Rev. H. E. Hooper, £3000; to Mrs. Ellen Jones, £300; to his servant, Ann Birkin, £500; and to each of his servants, William and Harriet Birkin, £200. The residue of his property is given to his said two brothers.

The will (dated Jan. 28, 1878) of Mr. Holden Sheppard Ravenshaw, formerly of the Bengal Civil Service, and late of No. 36, Eaton-square, who died on the 7th ult. at Brighton, was proved on the 23rd ult. by the Rev. Thomas Fitzarthur Torin Ravenshaw, the brother, and the Rev. Edward Stanley Carpenter, the nephew, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £25,000.

The will (dated July 17, 1862) with two codicils (dated Dec. 1, 1874, and Oct. 13, 1876) of General Sir Henry John William Bentinck, K.C.B., who died on Sept. 29 last, at No. 22, Upper Grosvenor-street, Park-lane, was proved on the 29th ult. by Dame Renira Antoinette Bentinck, the widow, the sole executrix, the personal estate being sworn under £7000.

The will (dated Jan. 7, 1873) with two codicils (dated Jan. 22 and Feb. 22 in the same year) of Mr. Peter Ellis Eyton, M.P., late of Rhyl, Flintshire, who died on June 19 last, was proved on the 29th ult. by Mrs. Ann Parry Charles, the sister, the personal estate being sworn under £5000. Among other legacies, the testator bequeaths two sums of £2000 for the purpose of founding two scholarships at the Welsh University College at Aberystwith for North Wales boys, to be tenable for not more than three years; the residue of the personalty and the proceeds of the realty, directed to be converted into personalty, is divided into fourths, and one part given to the Vicar of Llanynys, Denbighshire; one part to the Improvement Commissioners of the town of Rhyl; and the remaining two fourths to the Mayor, Aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Flint, upon trust to apply the same in the lessening of human suffering, such as the promotion of soup kitchens, relief funds, clothing clubs, and such like charities, and in promoting education in industrial pursuits, particularly in teaching girls of the working classes to cook plainly, plain sewing, and washing and ironing; and further for public improvements to which no public rates are applicable.

THE VOLUNTEERS.

The nineteenth official year of the existence of the volunteer force closed on Thursday, Oct. 31, and though it is yet too early to have anything finished in the way of statistics, it is tolerably certain that the returns from all parts of the country will show that a considerable advance has taken place in the efficient strength since October, 1877, and that the total will approximate to 200,000 of all arms.

The first annual prize distribution of the present season in the Home District took place last Saturday evening, at the City Terminus Hotel, when the members of the 7th Surrey Rifles received the rewards of their skill at shooting from the hands of Mrs. Porter, wife of the Major of the regiment. The prizes were to the value of about £250. The challenge cups were taken by Corporal Broughton, Private Hart, and Private Suttill. Corporal Broughton also took the badge for "best shot in the regiment;" and the other principal prizes fell to Corporal Eccles, Private Hart, Private Suttill, and Private Keen.

The prize-meeting of the 26th Kent Rifles, which was postponed on account of the range being closed whilst so many persons were traversing it to look at the wreck of the Princess Alice, was concluded last week at the Laboratory Range at Woolwich, and the following were the principal winners:—Corporal Andrews, Corporal H. Brand, Private Welsh and Captain Foggie, Private Brand, Major Farrell, Sergeant Ogilvie, Sergeant Wood, Corporal Bailey, Private Wren, Lance-Corporal W. Marshall, and Staff Sergeant Marshall.

Surgeon-General Munro in Westminster Hall yesterday week distributed prizes to those members of the volunteer force who had passed satisfactory examinations at the end of their attendance upon the classes of the newly-formed ambulance corps in connection with this service.

Two members of the Order of St. John Ambulance Association, Major-General the Marquis Conyngham and Lord Leigh, have sent donations of £10 and £21 towards the expenses of the St. John Ambulance Association. Besides the rapidly-increasing country centres, there are now nearly thirty classes formed in London alone.

The Duchess of St. Albans presented the prizes to the successful competitors in the Robin Hood Rifles, in the Mechanics' Hall, Nottingham. Amongst the speakers were the Duke of St. Albans, honorary Colonel of the regiment, and Mr. Bernal Osborne.

Among the list of exhibitors who have been rewarded with the Légion d'Honneur we read the name of Mr. Ch. de Marnyhac, Directeur of the Maison Marnyhac, Regent-street, London, and Rue de la Paix, Paris. The exhibitors in his class (artistic and decorative bronzes) have unanimously agreed to present him with the cross of the order set in diamonds.

There were the usual Fifth of November gatherings in the streets of London on Tuesday, but the proceedings on the whole were very poor. At the Alexandra Palace there were a display of fireworks and a torchlight procession of monster Guys. There was a grand display of fireworks at the Crystal Palace also. Lewes again maintained its supremacy as the chief celebrant of Guy Fawkes' Day. There were the usual torchlight processions, bonfires, and burning of effigies, and the whole fortunately passed off without any mishap. At Brighton, Croydon, Cambridge, and Exeter there were similar celebrations of the day.

THE PUREST.
THE MOST PALATABLE.
THE MOST DIGESTIBLE.
THE MOST EFFICACIOUS.

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.

SIR G. DUNCAN GIBB, Bart., M.D., Physician to the Westminster Hospital.

"The value of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL as a therapeutic agent in a number of diseases, chiefly of an exhaustive character, has been admitted by the world of medicine; but, in addition, I have found it a remedy of great power in the treatment of many Affections of the Throat and Larynx especially in Consumption of the latter, where it will sustain life when everything else fails."

DR. SINCLAIR COGHILL, Physician Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor.

"I have convinced myself that in Tubercular and the various forms of Strumous Disease, Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL possesses greater therapeutic efficacy than any other Cod-Liver Oil with which I am acquainted. It was especially noted in a large number of cases in which the patients protested they had never been able to retain or digest other Cod-Liver Oil, but that Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL was not only tolerated, but taken readily, and with marked benefit."

LENNOX BROWNE, Esq., F.R.C.S.E., Senior Surgeon Central London Throat and Ear Hospital.

"The action of Dr. de Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil has proved, in my own experience, particularly valuable, not only in those diseases for which it was originally employed, but also in many cases of weakness of the Singing and Speaking Voice, dependent on Bronchial or Laryngeal Irritation, and in all forms of Strumous Enlargement of Glands, and Discharges from the Ear."

DR. PROSSER JAMES, Lecturer on Materia Medica, London Hospital.

"DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL contains the whole of the active ingredients of the remedy, and is easily digested. Hence its value, not only in Diseases of the Throat and Lungs, but in a great number of cases to which the Profession is extending its use."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1878.

Lord Mayor's Day, the name by which Nov. 9 is popularly designated in the City, usually attracts no small amount of anticipatory interest. It marks a sort of half-way station between one Parliamentary Session and another. It may be described as the dawn of a new political season. It breaks off with the past; it directs public attention to the future. At the Guildhall Banquet, the attendance of the principal members of her Majesty's Government has been customarily expected and given. At the close of the feast, the Prime Minister, if present, has been wont, in response to a toast drunk in compliment to the Ministers of the Crown, to deliver a speech more or less illustrative of political affairs as they exist, and more or less pointedly referring to political movements as they may be likely to distinguish and affect the proximate future. This year the occasion was looked forward to with special, we think we may say anxious, curiosity. Much has occurred since the prorogation of Parliament in August last. Very little information has reached the public mind to explain with authority certain facts which no official reticence could conceal. Commercially speaking, the present aspect of affairs, to say the least, is sombre; politically speaking, if not actually dangerous, is calculated to engender serious anxieties. It was taken for granted that Lord Beaconsfield would seize the opportunity of making some communications to his audience, and through them to the outer world, by the aid of which facts might be discriminated from rumours, errors of opinion might be effectually disposed of, and a correct view might be given to the public of the position and prospects of this country, as far as they come within that range of influences which its Rulers are authorised to employ. The Noble Earl frankly recognised, at the outset of his speech, we will not say the obligation imposed upon him by the occasion to clear away all impending mystery, but the expediency enforced by circumstances of stating "the views of her Majesty's Government on the present situation of the country with regard to its external relations."

Lord Beaconsfield adverted, in the first instance, to the policy contemplated and pursued by her Majesty's advisers on the North-Western Frontier of India. They apprehended no invasion of our great Eastern dependency across that Frontier. They regarded any such enterprise as impracticable. But it was "a hap-hazard and not a scientific Frontier." It might not lead to invasion, but it might oblige the Government of India "to maintain a great military force in that quarter, entailing on the country a proportionate expenditure." To this unquestionable evil the Government was determined to put an end. It was on this account that the Convention with Turkey and the occupation of the Isle of Cyprus were adopted, as means of prevention; and the Premier gave it as his opinion that, if this proposed rectification of the North-Western Frontier towards Afghanistan in conjunction with the beforesaid Convention and Occupation were consummated, "the English people might dismiss from their minds all anxiety as to the external enemies of their Indian Empire."

Then, as to that other aspect of the Eastern Question which involves the independence of Europe, and especially of the Mediterranean Powers, the object of the Congress of Berlin, he said, was to extricate the Sultan from

"sources of constant exhaustion," and to establish him "as an independent Sovereign, capable of exercising no inconsiderable influence in the maintenance of the political balance." The provisions of the Treaty there agreed upon had already been carried largely into effect. The Russians had retired from Constantinople and from the Straits of Gallipoli, and had restored to the Porte the City of Erzeroum, destined to become "the scene of one of the strongest fortifications in Asia Minor." The Porte, on the other hand, had surrendered to Russia the fortresses on the Danube and the bay of Batoum on the Black Sea. Committees and Commissioners are at this moment engaged in arranging the lines of demarcation for the different States and Provinces created by the Treaty of Berlin. Little more than three months have elapsed since the ratification of that Treaty—not much more than one third of the time provided by it for the realisation of its provisions—and yet these results have been obtained. Why are we to believe that all the other points will remain unconcluded within the time prescribed by the Congress? None of the signataries could possibly contemplate any evasion of their engagements. At all events, her Majesty's Government will not retire, but will see to it that the Treaty shall be carried out "in spirit and to the letter," and will, if necessary, appeal with confidence to the people of this country to support them in maintaining, with all their energy and all their resources, the Treaty of Berlin.

We have not the space at our command which would be required for any critical comment upon what friend and foe alike will admit to be the able and adroit speech of the Prime Minister. It will suffice us, for the present, to remark that it does not put the British Public into possession of any new information. In this respect, it leaves things much as they were. All that we are told is that the policy approved of and pursued by her Majesty's Government contemplates such a rectification of the North-Western Frontier of India as will make it "scientific"—mainly, we presume, in a military sense—and aims at giving practical effect to the stipulations of the Berlin Treaty for establishing the Throne of the Sultan as an independent European Power. How far this view of foreign affairs will satisfy the English people, who will be apt to take into their cognisance a vast number of collateral circumstances, it is impossible to foresee at the moment. Undoubtedly they will have to bear the brunt of the expenditure to be incurred in both cases, and would, we are confident, willingly make the sacrifice, were it necessary to uphold a Foreign Policy framed for the purpose of supporting justice and liberty abroad. Myriads of keen eyes will scrutinise the bearings of the Premier's Guildhall statement. Thousands of critics will canvass them under various lights. What is true and substantial in them will be ungrudgingly recognised; what is evasive or illusory will be detected and exposed. The external policy of England will not eventually rest upon oratory, however splendid, or flowing from the lips of men of either party, however illustrious. It will be determined, in the end, not by words, but by "the inexorable logic of facts." For this we must wait.

THE COURT.

The Queen and Princess Beatrice returned to Balmoral Castle on Saturday last from the Glassalt Shiel. The Duke of Richmond and Gordon arrived at the Castle as Minister in attendance on her Majesty. The Queen and the Princess attended Divine service on Sunday, performed at Balmoral by the Rev. W. W. Tulloch, B.D., Maxwell parish, Glasgow. The Earl of Dufferin arrived at the castle. The Duke of Richmond and Gordon has dined generally with her Majesty; and the Earl of Dufferin has also dined with the Queen.

Her Majesty, with Princess Beatrice, has taken her usual daily out-of-door exercise. The Court will return to Windsor about the 23rd inst. Her Majesty has inspected a picture of the Princess Elizabeth, painted by Mr. T. Jones Barker, which was submitted by Mr. R. Turner, of Newcastle-on-Tyne.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales entertained Princess Christian, Princess Louise of Lorne, and Prince Leopold at luncheon on Thursday week at Marlborough House. The Prince dined at the Royal Buckhound banquet given to the farmers at Willis's Rooms in the evening. The Master of the Buckhounds, the Earl of Hardwicke, was in the chair, and the Duke of Connaught, Prince Christian, and the Duke of Cambridge were among the guests. The Prince and Princess left Marlborough House the next day for Sandringham.

Saturday last was the thirty-seventh anniversary of the birthday of the Prince. Princess Louise of Lorne and the Marquis of Lorne, the Duke of Connaught, and Prince Leopold arrived at Sandringham House in the morning. In celebration of the birthday a dinner was given to the labourers on the estate at the Royal Mews, in a large room which is annually set apart for that purpose. 170 men were provided with a substantial dinner, and the Prince and Princess, with their visitors, were present when the Royal toasts were given. At all the towns adjacent to the Royal estate peals of bells were rung:—viz., at King's Lynn, Wisbech, Norwich, Cambridge, &c. In London the customary honours were observed, and the Royal tradesmen dined together, as usual, at Willis's Rooms, the Prince having contributed his annual present of venison. At the request of the Prince, Captain Fairfax, of the Britannia Training-Ship at Dartmouth, granted the cadets a day's holiday; and at Windsor and the principal naval and military stations the day was celebrated with due honours. On Sunday the Prince and Princess, Princess Louise of Lorne and the Marquis of Lorne, the Duke of Connaught, and Prince Leopold attended Divine service at St. Mary Magdalene's, Sandringham Park. The Rev. F. A. J. Hervey, M.A., Rector, officiated. Princess Louise of Lorne and the Marquis of Lorne, the Duke of Connaught, and Prince Leopold left Sandringham on Monday, and the Duke of Cambridge and Prince Christian arrived on a visit to the Prince and Princess. A county ball was given last evening by the Prince and Princess at Sandringham. His Royal Highness, with his various guests, has had good sport shooting. The Prince will visit Lord Hastings at Melton Constable, Norfolk, at the end of this month. Lieutenant-Colonel Clarke has succeeded Colonel A. Ellis as Equerry in Waiting to his Royal Highness.

DEPARTURE OF PRINCESS LOUISE OF LORNE AND THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF CANADA.

Princess Louise of Lorne and his Excellency the Marquis of Lorne left St. Pancras Station at twelve o'clock on Wednesday night by special train for Liverpool, where they embarked on Thursday on board the Sarmatian, the vessel selected to convey them to Canada. They were accompanied by the Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold. The suite of the Governor-General and of her Royal Highness consisted of Major and Mrs. F. de Winter, Colonel M'Neill, Dr. Andrew Clarke, the Hon. Captain Harbord, and Captain F. Campbell. The Duke of Teck and various friends took leave of them at the station. Two of the Pullman palace sleeping-cars, "The Midland" and "Excelsior," were specially fitted up for the use of the Royal party, who were received at the station by Mr. Ellis, the chairman, and Mr. Allport, the manager, of the Midland Railway; and Mr. Needham, superintendent of the line, took charge of the train to Liverpool. The Royal party breakfasted at Adelphi Hotel, and subsequently received addresses at the Townhall from the Town Council and the Chamber of Commerce; after which the Princess and the Marquis embarked on board the Allan steam-tender for the Sarmatian, which started on her voyage immediately afterwards. The Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold returned to town.

The Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold were advanced to the Thirty-third Degree in Freemasonry on Wednesday, at the head-quarters of the Ancient and Accepted Rite, Golden-square, in the presence of the Prince of Wales, Grand Patron of the order. The ceremony was performed by Lord Skelmersdale, the Sovereign Grand Commander, assisted by the other members of the Supreme Council, Thirty-third Degree. On Monday Prince Leopold was installed by the Rev. Thomas Cochrane, M.A., Eminent Prior of the "Cœur de Lion" Preceptory of Freemasons. Prince Leopold and Prince Louis Napoleon went to the Globe Theatre in the evening.

The Archbishop of Canterbury and Mrs. Tait and the Misses Tait have left town for Blairlogie, near Stirling.

The Earl and Countess of Derby have arrived at Keston, their seat in Kent, from Knowsley.

The Earl and Countess of Lichfield and the Ladies Anson have returned to Shughborough Park from visiting the Earl and Countess of Leicester at Holkham Hall, Norfolk.

Mr. Abney Hastings and the Hon. Paulyn and Gilbert Hastings have left Loudoun Castle for Donnington Park.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGES.

The marriage of the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Lichfield and the Hon. Augusta Ann Barrington, youngest daughter of the late Viscount Barrington, was solemnised on Tuesday at Shrivenham church, Berks. Those present at the ceremony were confined to the members of the family. Viscount and Viscountess Barrington afterwards entertained their relatives and friends at breakfast at Beckett House.

A marriage was solemnised on Tuesday, by special license, in the private chapel at Lambeth Palace, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Right Rev. the Bishop of Dover and the Rev. Canon W. F. Erskine Knollys, between the Rev. Randall T. Davidson, M.A., Domestic Chaplain to the Archbishop, and Edith M. Tait, his Grace's second daughter. The bride was attended to the altar by her two sisters, Miss Lucy and Miss Agnes Tait, the bridegroom being accompanied by the Rev. Sidney Pelham as best man. Owing to the recent death of the Rev. Craufurd Tait the company present at the marriage was confined to the nearest relatives of the two families, to persons immediately connected with his Grace's household, and to a few intimate friends of the bride and bridegroom. After the solemnisation the Archbishop and Mrs. Tait received their friends at breakfast, which was served in the large dining-room, formerly the guard-chamber of the old palace. Mr. and Mrs. Davidson left Lambeth soon after the marriage ceremony for Italy.

The marriage between Lord Alexander Paget and the Hon. Miss Stapleton-Cotton will not take place.

A marriage is arranged and will shortly take place between Count William Bernstorff, second son of the late German Ambassador to the Court of St. James's, and the Baroness Augusta Gutschmid.

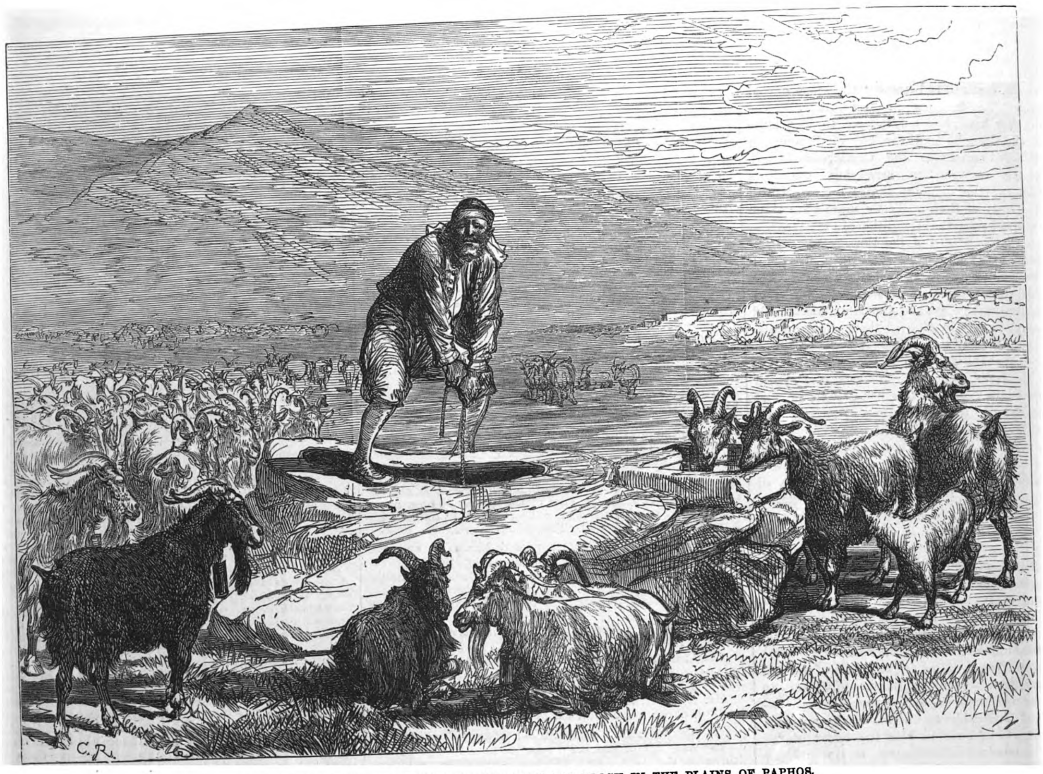
Sir Lawrence Palk, M.P., has offered to the Torquay Board of Health a beautifully situated piece of land as a recreation ground for the nominal rent of 2s. 6d. per annum.

A shocking phase of the misery brought about by the Glasgow Bank failure is pictured in a statement made by a Glasgow doctor. This gentleman says that two of his patients who were shareholders have lost their reason, and have been sent to a lunatic asylum, while several others connected with the bank have been completely prostrated by disease, induced by the effects of the calamity.—The Glasgow police have obtained information to the effect that Mr. Fleming, the ex-director of the City of Glasgow Bank, has escaped to Spain.—A meeting of the Glasgow unemployed was held on Monday on Glasgow-green to protest against the Corporation giving £5000 to the City Bank Shareholders' Fund while the unemployed are starving.—The fund for the relief of the shareholders of the bank amounts in Glasgow to £117,012, in Edinburgh to £30,000, in Paisley to £10,000, and in Dundee to £3600.

The Colston anniversary dinners took place on Wednesday at Bristol. At that of the Dolphin Society (Conservative) Mr. R. Plunkett, M.P., spoke of the obstruction last Session in the House of Commons. The Duke of Beaufort expressed his full belief that the Berlin Treaty would be properly carried out. Lord Henry Thynne, M.P., traced the bad state of trade from which the country is suffering to the Liberal legislation of the past forty years.—At that of the Anchor Society (Liberal) Lord Carlingford criticised the conduct of the Government, and remarked that at the Lord Mayor's banquet things were omitted to be said which the public would very much like to know. He objected to the entire Eastern policy of the Government, and asked why they could not see to the carrying out of the Berlin Treaty before they had anything to do with Afghanistan. The Marquis of Lansdowne believed that the diplomatic action of the Government had sown the seeds of many foreign complications.—The dinner of the Grateful Society (Neutral) was held at the Montague Tavern, under the presidency of Mr. J. D. Weston. About one hundred gentlemen were present, including the Mayor (Mr. G. W. Edwards). The speeches were of a non-political character. The collection amounted to £1035, as against £883 last year.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

In spite of the wretchedly meagre acceptance, the field for the Liverpool Autumn Cup proved almost of average strength, and a prettier finish has seldom been seen. A quarter of a mile from home nothing but the three placed horses had any chance of success, and though, until reaching the distance, Master Kildare (7 st. 6 lb.) held a slight lead, he was then passed by Belphœbe (8 st. 1 lb.) and Touchet (8 st.), of whom Lord Hartington's filly finished a little the stronger, and won by a neck. Touchet certainly is a most luckless colt, and seems to run second with almost as much persistency as does Insulaire. The sport on Friday was not of a very grand description. The Duchy Cup was reduced to a match between Belphœbe (9 st. 5 lb.) and Julius Cæsar (9 st.), the latter having no less than 16 lb. the better of the weights, as compared with the terms upon which they met on the previous day. Nevertheless he only just had the call in the betting, and, when challenged by Belphœbe at the distance, would not make the slightest effort, having turned such a complete rogue that it will be useless to train him after this season. Only seven ran for the Great Lancashire Handicap; but among them was Sir Joseph (7 st. 6 lb.), who started first favourite for the Derby, and has not run since his failure at Epsom. He looked very well, and secured a neck victory after a good race with Tower and Sword (6 st. 9 lb.).



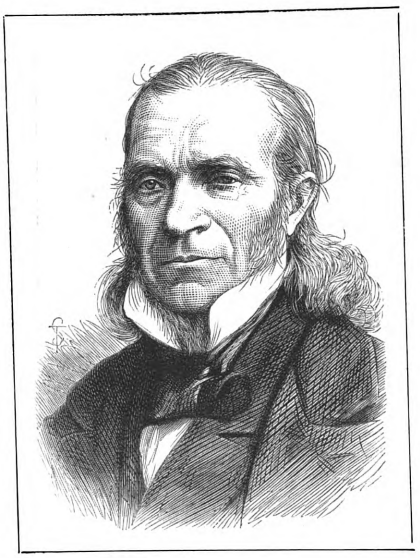
Promoters of race meetings who arrange for fixtures to take place in November are undoubtedly "playing with edge tools," for frost may prove a spoil-sport at any moment. Under these circumstances, therefore, the management of the Derby meeting may esteem themselves fortunate that they only had to postpone their second day's racing from Tuesday to Wednesday, though even then they lost a good many visitors, who went straight to Shrewsbury. With the exception of the Great Shropshire Handicap, there was no race to which we need allude during the first half of the meeting, though we may mention that the proceedings were enlivened on Tuesday by a riot, occasioned by the band of thieves and welshers who invariably appear at every race meeting. These scoundrels, emboldened by the immunity they have hitherto enjoyed, made a determined attack upon the ring, and for some little time had matters all their own way. On Wednesday, however, Mr. Frail engaged an extra number of police, and the ringleaders were taken into custody. The doings of "the scum of the course," as they have been fittingly termed, are becoming unbearable, and, unless promoters of meetings take strong measures to put them down, they will infallibly lose the patronage of nearly all the respectable portion of the public. The field for the Great Shropshire Handicap only reached a dozen, which is the smallest number of starters since the race was established in 1871. Touchet and Speculator, the former of whom was first favourite for some little time, were both scratched two or three days before the race, and the public then fixed upon Avontes (6 st. 13 lb.) as a "good thing," and brought him to 3 to 1 before the fall of the flag. Eminence (6 st. 5 lb.) was also very heavily backed, but nothing else received much attention. Eminence is by no means a boy's horse, and, though he ran very prominently for a considerable distance, he had no chance when Avontes took up the running, and Mr. Crawfurd's horse won in the commonest of canters by ten lengths. Nearly all the others pulled up when pursuit was evidently hopeless, so no importance attaches to second and third places, which were gained by Sunshade (6 st. 6 lb.) and Sutler (8 st.) respectively. This is a fitting termination to a long list of Fyfield successes during the present season, the City and Suburban, Derby, and Goodwood Stakes being the most important of the previous victories gained by Mr. Crawfurd this year.

The sale of the late Sir Richard Sutton's stud attracted a good many people to Tattersall's on Monday; but buyers were few and far between, and there was no animal of note in the catalogue. The highest price of the afternoon was 175 gs., which was given for a filly foal by Dutch Skater—Consort, on behalf of the Cobham Stud.

At Lullingstone Castle, on the 7th inst., in the presence of a large company, a dessert service of gold plate, valued at 1000 guineas, was presented to the Hon. Ralph Nevill, in recognition of his services as master of the West Kent Hunt. The presentation was made by Sir W. Hart Dyke, M.P., in the name of the subscribers.

Scarcely has the last visitor to the Houghton Meeting quitted Newmarket when coursing men begin to assemble there in full strength, and it is not until the Newmarket Champion Meeting has been wiped off the list of fixtures that the little town can settle down to its winter's quiet. On the first day some of the hares were weak, and afforded poor trials; but during the remainder of the week they ran strong and well, and, as they were very plentiful, each day's card was got through in capital time. Mr. Wentworth and T. Wilkinson, as judge and slipper respectively, gave every satisfaction, and a better meeting in all respects has never taken place on the famous heath. The Duke of Hamilton's kennel was in splendid form, and divided the Champion Stakes, with High Seal, by Hawkshaw Pate—Royal Stamp; the All-Aged Stakes, with Black Beard, by Blue Beard—Silkworm; and the Chippenham Stakes, with Hawkshaw Belle, by Hawkshaw Pate—Caroline. Lady Lizzie, by Sir Charles—Lizzie, took the other half of the Champion Stakes. Both she and High Seal are smart and very clever puppies; but as each was led to the hare once or twice during the week, we fancy they are a little deficient in pace to take high honours in the Waterloo Cup. Black Beard also ran exceedingly well, and his co-divider was Hark Forward, by Crossfell—Artiste.

The sculling-match between John Hawdon, of Delaval, and William Lumsden, of Blyth, which took place over the Tyne championship course on Monday last, caused an immense amount of interest and excitement in the north. No less than ten heavily laden steamers accompanied the race, and every "coign of vantage" was crowded with eager spectators. Hawdon, who is only twenty-three years of age, has won seven matches in succession, and is still undefeated, while Lumsden was wonderfully successful during the early part of his career, and is undoubtedly the best man that Hawdon has yet encountered. The latter lost the toss for choice of stations, and, though this was a great disadvantage, especially during the early part of the race, he became a much stronger favourite as the time for the start approached, and at last as much as 3 to 1 was laid upon him. When they got off, to a capital start, the wind and rough water seemed to almost stop Hawdon, and Lumsden soon showed in front. At the end of a mile the latter held a lead of three lengths, but Hawdon, who was in splendid condition, spurted again and again in the most extraordinary style, and, when they had gone about two miles and a half, was once more level with his opponent. Lumsden was now thoroughly beaten from the effects of his great exertions, and Hawdon, drawing right away, won at his ease by ten lengths. The young Delaval man is now matched with Edward Hanlon, of Toronto, the American champion, and, with ordinary care, he ought to make a most dangerous candidate for the championship of England.



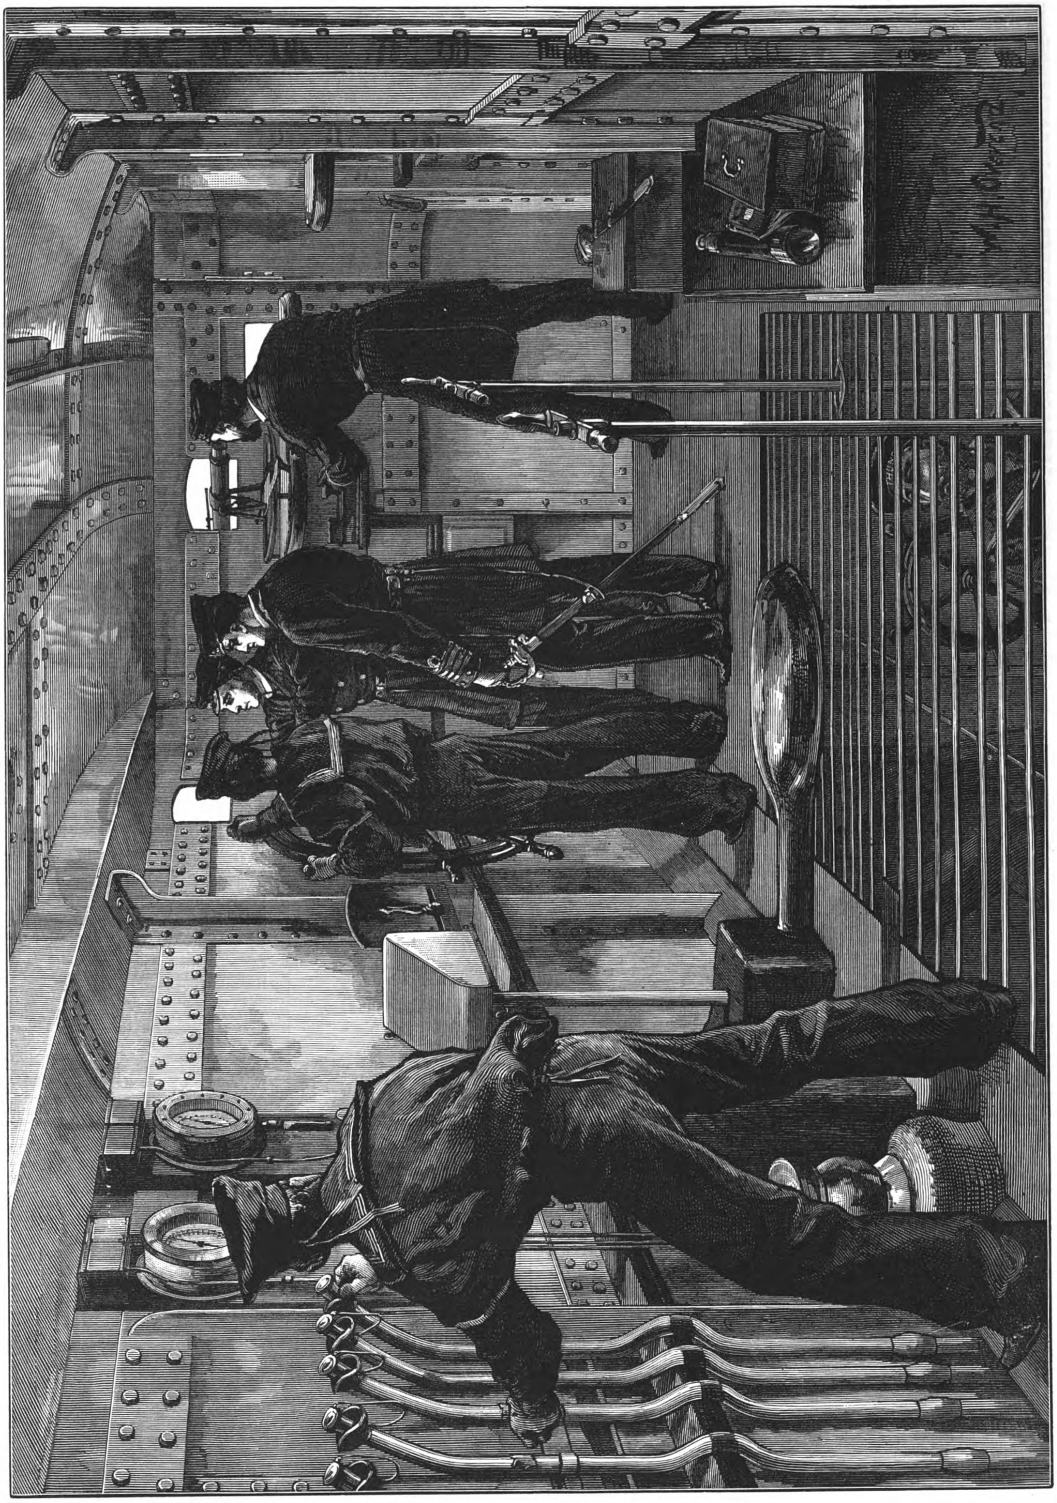
SKETCHES IN CYPRUS: GOATHERD WATERING HIS FLOCK IN THE PLAINS OF PAPHOS.

SKETCHES IN CYPRUS.

The Engraving on our front page is a view, from a photograph, of the west front of the ruined Gothic Cathedral of Famagusta, which place was the chief seaport town and fortress of Cyprus under the Venetian rule, from 1473 to 1571. It has been described by our Special Artist and Correspondent, "S. P. O.," who was lately in Cyprus on the service of this Journal. We learn from Mr. R. Hamilton Lang's interesting book on "Cyprus," just published in one volume by Messrs. Macmillan, that Famagusta in the sixteenth century, let us say in the time of Othello's unhappy residence there, was a city of thirty thousand inhabitants. It had belonged to the Genoese from 1376 to 1464, having been wrested by that mercantile Republic from the crusading Lusignan dynasty of Princes, to whom Cyprus was delivered, in 1192, by our own Richard Cœur de Lion. We are not told by whom or when the stately Cathedral was built; its architectural style is that of the fifteenth century in Western Europe, with some variation, and it was probably erected before the Venetian period. In striking contrast to this relic of superb mediæval lordship on the eastern shore of Cyprus we give the Sketch of a quiet pastoral scene near Paphos, at the western extremity of the island. The native herdsman there leads his flock of goats to water, like Tityrus and Menalcas and their like in a poem of Virgil or Theocritus, caring little for the decay of proud Empires and Principalities, which have so frequently come and gone upon the sea-girt plains and hills of Cyprus. "Assyria, Greece, Rome, Egypt—what are they?" Or what the Norman, the Venetian, the Ottoman, or the British Imperial power, when a few more generations of mankind have lived and died? The Cypriote goats and kids will browse and frolic in their pasture when Sir Garnet Wolseley's administration is long forgotten.

THE LATE M. GARNIER-PAGÈS.

M. Louis Garnier-Pagès, who died a week or two since, after a short illness, in his seventy-sixth year, had retired from political life since the resignation of the Government of National Defence in 1871, but attended M. Thiers's funeral fourteen months ago, and sent a letter of adhesion to the recent Peace Congress. He took part in the Revolution of 1830, but only became a prominent politician on the death, in 1841, of his half-brother, Étienne Garnier-Pagès, a Republican leader of some note in his time. As a Deputy under the Orleans dynasty, he materially contributed to the limitation of the concessions of railway companies, thus securing their reversion to the State. In 1848 he became first Mayor of Paris, and afterwards Minister of Finance, being mainly responsible in the latter capacity for the increased direct taxation which saved France from bankruptcy, but brought on the Republic the odium of the peasantry. He failed to obtain admission to the Legislature of 1849; but in 1857 he was one of the chief organisers of the first electoral opposition to the Empire, but was not himself one of the half-dozen successful candidates, being defeated in Paris by M. Emile Ollivier. In 1864, however, another Paris district elected him, and he became a sharp critic of M. Haussmann's administration of Paris; but in 1869 he with difficulty retained his seat against the opposition of M. Raspail. In 1870 he was a second time member of a Provisional Government, but took no very active part in it; he was not elected to the Assembly of 1871, and refused a candidature for a by-election in 1872. The Portrait is from a photograph by Truchelot, of Paris.



THE LATE M. LOUIS GARNIER-PAGÈS.

AN UNSCIENTIFIC FRONTIER.

The reader who may wonder at this phrase should turn to a page Engraving, in which he will see how the Suleiman range of mountains rises like a mighty wall, forty or fifty miles distant, beyond the perfectly level plain, to a spectator looking westward from a house-top on the banks of the Indus, at Dera Ismael Khan, towards the centre of our Punjaub frontier. As we consider "the impending Afghan war"—if it should not rather be termed the intended war for Afghanistan—we are gratuitously furnished by the most absolute of political authorities with an explanation of its geographical motive. His Highness Prince Beaconsfield, Imperial Chancellor and Grand Vizier of the Anglo-Asian Empire, announced last Saturday to the Lord Mayor's guests that it is designed to remedy the inconvenience of having, as he said, "a haphazard and not a scientific frontier." We therefore submit to our readers, by the aid of a sketch lately sent us from an esteemed military correspondent, this View of what they are told to regard as an unscientific frontier, with its mere "haphazard" summit, the Takht-i-Suleiman, or Solomon's Throne, attaining a sublime height of 11,000 feet, the whole range extending 350 miles from south to north, beyond which only the Khurum and Khyber Passes break the continuous curve of mountain ramparts, to the almost inaccessible Himalayas, inclosing the British dominion. It is, of course, a very unscientific freak of nature, and a fortuitous accident of history, that made these marvellous highlands, from time immemorial, the abode of the aboriginal race of Afghanistan, dividing them from the natives of the Punjaub and of Sind, and from Daman or the Derayat, which is the strip of lowland west of the Indus, and from all which we took from the Sikhs of Lahore thirty years ago. To be sure, it has been the deliberate opinion of three successive Governors-General, and presumably of their military advisers, till the advent of the present Viceroy, that this north-west frontier of British India was one of unsurpassed natural strength for defensive purposes; only needing the construction of bridges and roads up to the foot of each Pass, and a few connected forts to guard them in time of war. But the Anglo-Asian Mystery is fraught with a superhuman insight into these and other matters of practical statesmanship and strategy, which it would be rash to contradict; and its dictum is supported by newspaper letters from a distinguished common-law barrister who resided a few years at Calcutta. We must, therefore, leave the View of "Solomon's Throne" to speak for itself, if our readers think it can do so, against the plea of alleged necessity for a more commanding barrier on the Afghan frontier of the Empress Victoria's Asiatic dominion. It will certainly cost a trifle of Asiatic lives and British taxpayers' money to effect the proposed rectification of the frontier; and if the Hindoo Koosh, north of Cabul, or even the ill-omened passes of Jugdulluk and Khoord Cabul, are to be substituted for the Suleiman range, it may hereafter be discovered that a more formidable enemy has been invited to a nearer approach. But these are questions not requiring to be discussed in England at all, either by the Press or by Parliament; England has only to fight and to pay, and "the harebrained chatter of irresponsible frivolity" is desired to hold its peace.

At Camborne, yesterday week, a large number of county gentlemen, including Mr. Pendarves, High Sheriff of Cornwall, Mr. Pendarves Vivian, M.P., and Colonel Tremayne, M.P., held a meeting, presided over by Mr. Bolitho, to consider the condition of the working men and their families in the mining districts of Cornwall, and to provide for the distress which exists.

THE CONNING TOWER ON BOARD H.M.S. THUNDERER.

H.M.S. THUNDERER'S CONNING-TOWER.

The interior of an iron chamber, fitted with a variety of apparatus, which is occupied by several of our naval officers and seamen, engaged in some operations not apparently intelligible on a mere view of the scene presented by our Engraving, is a subject that needs a little explanation. The "conning-tower" is a special addition to the equipment of our powerful turret-ships, with which the Thunderer and the Dreadnought have been furnished, while the term "conning" has been understood, in the art of naval gunnery, to denote the pointing and laying of the guns with a precise aim to hit their objects of attack. The Thunderer, of which we gave an Illustration, showing her fitted with torpedo nettings around her sides, on May 12 of last year, is a double-screw ironclad ship, with a single mast, a flying or hurricane deck raised amidships, and two revolving gun-turrets, fore and aft, below the hurricane-deck, altogether forming a complex group of structures in the middle of the vessel's length. The steering-house and the conning-tower are both erected upon the hurricane-deck; and from these elevated chambers, by means of connecting mechanism, electric wires, and speaking-tubes, the ship and her formidable armament, of great guns and torpedoes, can be managed by the officers in command. In the conning-tower, as shown in our present Illustration, the reader will observe a man at a wheel, acting under the orders of one of the two officers standing beside him. This is to work the more powerful steam-steering machinery below, turning the ship's rudder; and there is an indicator hand, on a brass plate, fixed to the wall close to this wheel, showing every movement of the vessel to port or starboard. The wall that appears to the left hand in our Engraving is on the forward side of the tower, so that the officer looks straight ahead of the ship's course through the little square window above the steering-wheel. Further to the left hand are shown a couple of circular dials, to indicate the steam-pressure of the engines; and in the left foreground is a sailor, waiting at the mouths of a row of speaking-tubes, to send down orders either to the persons in the gun-turrets or to those in charge of the torpedoes. Electric telegraph wires, communicating with all parts of the ship below, are laid in covered lines, painted red, along that side of the apartment, and may be worked by the small telegraphic apparatus in a box on the shelf. We have next to invite attention to the officer who is "conning" through a telescope, fitted with an auxiliary "sight" above its tube, and taking the exact direction for aiming the guns. He is assisted by the use of a quadrant, or other graduated arc of brass, to determine the bearings of the object, however distant, with the utmost minuteness and accuracy; while the actual position of the guns in their turret, which he never sees, is at the same time correctly shown to him, in juxtaposition with his intended line of aim. He is thus enabled, by ordering the direction of each gun to the required degree right or left, to make the fire of two guns, at 1000 yards' range, converge at one striking-point. When the gun is truly laid, and the word "Ready" is passed up from below, this officer has only to touch one of the knobs upon which his finger is resting and the gun is fired; or he may fire all the four guns in the two turrets at once. The fore turret has two 38-ton guns, and the aft turret has two guns, each weighing 35 tons. The operation of launching a Whitehead torpedo, after aiming its course in a similar manner, is performed just as readily; the officer will turn round, seize either of the two handles upon the tall rods which rise through the floor grating, and by turning one or the other handle he can discharge a torpedo from the port or the starboard side of the ship. Below the grating, where a man's head is seen, with another steering-wheel, is a chamber protected by eight-inch armour-plating, where the officers could retire to carry on these operations, in case the upper part of the conning-tower were struck by an enemy's shot or shell. The conning-tower in the Thunderer, is only bullet-proof, but in the Dreadnought it is protected by thick armour. These modern appliances of naval warfare would have puzzled the old Jack Tars who "sailed with noble Howe and sailed with gallant Jervis," a hundred years ago.

THE VOLUNTEERS.

The results of the competition for the handsome challenge cup, value £50, presented to the Queen's (Westminster) Rifles by the Right Hon. W. H. Smith, M.P., First Lord of the Admiralty, for the promotion of good drill and shooting in that regiment, have been announced. In addition to the cup, ten prizes, value £30, were offered for the highest scorers; and the keenness with which the principal prize was contested will be shown by the fact that nine out of the ten members given in the list of winners scored 80 points each for drill. In the final competition Private C. F. Lowe, of the celebrated I company, made 89 points, which, with 80 for drill and 65 in class, brought his aggregate up to 234, and made him the winner of the cup and £7. Sergeant A. Blackford was second, and takes £5; Corporal H. B. Wilson, third prize of £4; Private G. Parkinson and Private J. Southam tied; and take £3 each; and the remaining prizes in the contest were won by Sergeant S. Millings, Lieutenant W. Dennis, Private J. Dyke, Sergeant C. Webb, and Sergeant E. Rowley. For the Champion Badge, to which was added a silver cup, value £10, the rules were that the most coveted honour of the battalion should be awarded to "that member of the regiment who, being an efficient and a marksman, should make the highest aggregate score in the regimental competition to select representatives for Wimbledon, the first stage of the Queen's Prize, Major Tyler's Prize, and the final competition, making altogether thirty-eight shots at 200, thirty-eight at 500, and forty-eight at 600 yards." Corporal H. B. Wilson was the winner, with a total score of 447 points. Private C. F. Lowe was second, Sergeant Brooking third, Private Cameron fourth, and Corporal Cook fifth. The other challenge prizes shot for this season were the Burgesses of Westminster Cup, value 100 guineas, won for the second year in succession by the I company; F company was second, C company third, and B company fourth. The Scrubbs Shield, value 100 guineas, originally subscribed and shot for by all the regiments using the Scrubbs ranges, and finally won by the Queen's, was contested. F (Broadwood's) company were the winners; I company was a close second, C company third, and B company fourth.

The annual dinner of the members of the two Canterbury rifle corps took place at the Odd Fellows' Hall, Canterbury, on the 7th inst., when the Mayor and other leading citizens joined the volunteers. Colonel Lawrie, commandant of the 3rd London Volunteer Rifle Brigade, was likewise present, and handed over a handsome silver challenge cup and a money prize, which he had given to be shot for.

Lord Elcho has resigned the command of the London Scottish Volunteers, and is gazetted honorary Colonel.

Miss Amy Sheridan, the actress, died on Monday at Brighton, somewhat suddenly of heart disease.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The President of the Republic received the Prince and Princess of Denmark at the Palace of the Elysée yesterday week. Marshal MacMahon presided over a Cabinet Council at the Elysée on Tuesday morning. The Budget and foreign affairs were the subjects which occupied the attention of the Ministers. On the latter the Cabinet seemed to be well satisfied with the report of M. Waddington, and on the former views were expressed in accordance with those of the Budget Commission.

The question of the election of M. Paul de Cassagnac occupied the Chamber of Deputies until eight o'clock on the 7th inst. At the close of the debate the election was annulled by a show of hands. M. Cassagnac then exclaimed "Au revoir!" and left the Chamber. In the Senate the President read a letter from M. Jacotin, resigning his seat. In the Chamber of Deputies on the 8th inst. M. Léon Say presented a bill for the opening of supplementary credits to the amount of 34,412,158f., of which 13,000,000f. are to be devoted to the requirements of the War Department and 12,000,000f. to public works. Last Saturday the Chamber confirmed the election of several deputies recently elected in place of those whose election had been invalidated. The motion of M. Joubert respecting a modification in the Licenses Law was taken into consideration.

The Senators of the Right have issued a manifesto respecting the coming Senatorial elections, in which the members of the Left are denounced in strong terms.

The Electoral Commission decided last Wednesday on recommending the unseating of M. de Fourtou, ex-Minister of the Interior.

M. Léon Say, the Minister of Finance, attended Wednesday's sitting of the Budget Committee, at which an agreement was arrived at for effecting reductions of taxation to the amount of 19,000,000f. in the estimates for 1879. These reductions are chiefly applied to the tax on chicory and oils and bill-stamps. The Budget Committee has finished its labours.

M. Gambetta, replying to an address presented to him from Aveyron, pointed out the signs from which he deduced proof of the stability of the Republic. He said what was desired was a Republic which should represent the nation.

The Paris Exhibition closed on Sunday afternoon. The total number of admissions has been 16,032,725, an average of about 82,000 per day; and the gross receipts since May 1 have been 12,653,746f. Those of 1867 were 9,830,369f. In 1867, moreover, there were only 400,000 free admissions; whereas there were this year 950,000. One of the last incidents of the Exhibition was the presentation to Sir Philip Owen by the Exhibition Executive Commissioners of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, and New Zealand of a silver epergne, value 250 guineas. The Foreign Commissioners-General have presented to M. Georges Berger, the Director of the Foreign Sections of the Universal Exhibition, a splendid group in solid silver as a testimony of their gratitude and esteem. The Canadian Trophy at the Exhibition, valued at 100,000f., has been presented to the future industrial museum. The private exhibits in and around it will be replaced by a collection of Canadian products. We learn from Galignani's Messenger that Messrs. James Carter and Co., of High Holborn, the seedsmen to the Prince of Wales, received five gold medals, which is a higher award than that received by any other English exhibitor, and includes the only gold medal for grass lawns on the Trocadéro.

The Working Men's Exhibition also closed on Sunday when diplomas were presented to the successful exhibitors.

The French Lottery Commission has resolved that the small prizes shall be divided into twelve groups, each of about the same aggregate value, while the large prizes shall form a special category, for which all the tickets shall compete. The drawings will be public, and, it is calculated, can be got through in eight or ten days.

The Academy of Fine Arts has submitted to the Minister of Public Instruction its list of candidates for the post of Director of the School of Rome. M. Cabat, landscape-painter, was chosen unanimously.

A millionnaire, M. Darblay, a noted corn merchant and miller at Corbeil, died recently, at the age of eighty-four. In 1861 he was deprived of a postmastership for Bonapartism, to which party he adhered through life, being for some years a Deputy. The Times' correspondent says that his property is estimated at 70,000,000f.

ITALY.

Pisa and Leghorn were visited last Saturday by the King and Queen, who met with magnificent receptions at both towns.

Queen Margaret and her son, the Prince of Naples, who on Monday attained his ninth year, went to the Hall of the Five Hundred, Florence, where they were most enthusiastically received by 8000 children assembled there to meet her Majesty and the Prince.

In an election for the Chamber of Deputies, held at Clusone on Monday, Signor Roncalli was returned by 330 votes against 257 polled by General Bonelli, the late Minister of War. A second ballot will be necessary.

SPAIN.

In Monday's sitting of the Chamber of Deputies the Minister of the Interior declared that the Liberal Conservatives rejected universal suffrage, as being repugnant to the conscience of the party, and as opposed to the development of its principles. In the debate upon the new Electoral Law in Tuesday's sitting Señor Castelar opposed the measure as restricting universal suffrage, and in the course of his speech described the proclamation of King Alfonso as an ill-omened act. Señor Canovas del Castillo, President of the Council, denied this, and said that what was really an act to be deplored was the expulsion of the Cortes by General Pavia, which Señor Castelar was not able to prevent. The Electoral Law was adopted in Wednesday's sitting.

Sentence of death has been passed by the Tribunal of First Instance upon Moncasi, the perpetrator of the recent attempt upon the life of King Alfonso.

The Moorish Government has informed the Spanish Mini-ter for Foreign Affairs that it will grant indemnities to the families of the Spaniards lately assassinated in Morocco, and, as further satisfaction, salute the Spanish flag.

BELGIUM.

On Tuesday the Parliament was opened by the King in person. His Majesty, in his Speech from the Throne, in referring to the education question, said that the instruction given at the expense of the State should be placed under the exclusive control of the civil authorities. Various bills would be presented on the subject. Alluding to the state of trade, his Majesty said he hoped the industrial crisis was now past. The Government were endeavouring to find means to relieve the distress caused by it. The estimates were not altogether favourable, and the Government had contracted engagements for which it would be necessary to provide. Proposals for further electoral reforms would be laid before the Chambers.

The Chamber of Representatives on Wednesday elected its bureau. M. Guillery, of the Progressist party, was chosen President; and the Vice-Presidents are M. Dewael, Burgomaster of Antwerp, and M. Descamps, deputy for Ath.

A Great Exhibition of National Industry will take place at Brussels in 1880, on the occasion of the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of Belgian independence.

GERMANY.

A torchlight procession was held last Monday evening at Wiesbaden in honour of the German Emperor. At the same time a deputation of the inhabitants waited upon his Majesty, who, in reply to their congratulations, said he had experienced, besides bodily suffering, the pain of being forcibly withdrawn from his usual sphere of activity. He hoped, after going through a course of waters at Wiesbaden, that he would shortly be able to resume his former active duties. A law had been passed to put an end to criminal tendencies, and the example thus set would be followed in other countries, because the danger was one common to all.

The Emperor on Wednesday sent General Count Lehnsdorff, his Adjutant, from Coblentz to Berlin to congratulate Prince Bismarck on the marriage of his daughter, and to present to him the Grand Cross of the Order of the Red Eagle with Sceptre and Crown, the only Prussian decoration which remained to be conferred upon the distinguished Chancellor.

Prince Bismarck left Berlin last Tuesday afternoon for his country seat at Friedrichsruhe. The Berlin correspondent of the Morning Post states that the Chancellor proposes to spend some time away from Berlin. During his absence he will continue to conduct personally the more important business of State, without, however, tying himself down to regular work.

DENMARK.

The Ministerial bill authorising a loan of 1,200,000 crowns for the reconstruction of the plantation works in Santa Cruz, destroyed during the recent riot in that island, was read in the Folkething on the 9th inst. The debate not being decidedly favourable to the measure, the bill was referred to the Finance Committee.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The Emperor of Austria received the Delegations on Sunday. Replying to the addresses presented by the Presidents, the Emperor said his aim was to secure peace and Austrian interests as well as the execution of treaty stipulations, and he hoped that in this he should succeed, his relations with other Powers being most friendly.

His Majesty has granted a complete and general amnesty to all Bosnian and Herzegovinian insurgents, not excepting the captured chief Hadji Loja. The amnesty is said to have been granted in consequence of a note addressed by the Porte to Count Andrassy.

The Austrian and Hungarian Delegations were opened at Pesth on the 7th inst. In the former Herr Caronin was elected President. Count Andrassy presented the Budget, and a Finance Committee of twenty-one members was chosen.

The Budget Committee of the Austrian Delegation held two sittings on Wednesday, in which it adopted the most essential points of the war estimates as submitted by the Government.

Count Schouvaloff, accompanied by M. Palischeff, Secretary to the Russian Embassy at Vienna, reached Pesth on Tuesday morning, and at noon waited upon Count Andrassy, with whom he had a conference. On Wednesday Count Schouvaloff was received in private audience by the Emperor.

It is stated in a Vienna telegram that differences have arisen between the Hungarian Government and General Philippovich with regard to the organisation and administration of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Commander-in-Chief being reproached with having filled the administrative posts in the occupied provinces with none but Croatians, to the exclusion of the German and Hungarian elements. General Philippovich has requested to be allowed to return to his former post at Prague.

A deputation of Begs has presented a petition to General Philippovich praying for the annexation of Bosnia and the Herzegovina to Austria, for the removal of the provinces from the religious jurisdiction of the Sheik-ul-Islam, and for the establishment of national instead of denominational schools. The address is said to be signed by fifty-nine of the richest and most trustworthy Mohammedans in Serajevo.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY.

Absolute denial is telegraphed from St. Petersburg of statements that have been published concerning the ill state of the Czar's health.

Count Schouvaloff, it is reported, will return to London; and, on his arrival, will be in a position to explain the more immediate views of the Emperor of Russia on the present situation of affairs. Down to the present time, it is declared in official circles at St. Petersburg, no intelligence has been received in confirmation of statements made in foreign journals to the effect that Count Schouvaloff had been appointed Vice-Chancellor of the Russian Empire; nor has there been any announcement of the resignation of Prince Gortschakoff.

Count Schouvaloff was with the Grand Duke Sergius on board the Livadia at the time of her foundering. As noticed in our Austrian news, the Count has been at Pesth.

According to reports received from the interior of Russia, the state of trade and manufactures is reported as being most satisfactory. Both in Nishni-Novgorod and Charkoff the fairs were very successful, and the factories in the Government of Vladimir have had a favourable year.

An official assurance has been given to the British Ambassador at St. Petersburg that it is the wish of the Czar that the Berlin Treaty should be faithfully executed, and that no Imperial functionary will fail in that respect.

It is stated in a Constantinople telegram that the reply of the Porte accepting the English reforms in Asia Minor enumerates the four fundamental points of the scheme. 1. The establishment of a gendarmery organised and officered by Europeans. 2. The appointment of European inspectors to travel from one district to another, receive complaints against the Judges, and watch over the administration of justice. 3. The reorganisation of the finances. 4. The term of office of the valis and financial inspectors.

Midhat Pasha has been appointed Governor-General of Syria, replacing Djevdet Pasha, who had made himself so obnoxious to the population.

The Daily Telegraph publishes a despatch from its Pera correspondent which states that the Porte accepts in principle the rectification of the Greco-Turkish frontier, and it is stated that, with the view of arriving at an understanding, the appointment of delegates was on Monday proposed to the Greek Minister.

GREECE.

M. Coumoundouros has formed a new Cabinet, of which the Ministers took the oaths of office on the 7th inst.

AMERICA.

The Times' correspondent at Philadelphia states that Lord Salisbury's reply to Secretary Evarts's recent despatches on the fishery question has been received in Washington by cable.

His Lordship's reference to Newfoundland interference with American fishermen is understood to be satisfactory to the United States Government, which is convinced that England intends in good faith to enforce the Treaty of Washington, giving United States fishermen all rights and privileges accorded by that treaty. Everything indicates that the United States will pay the full Halifax award in London on Nov. 23, the date specified by the treaty. The Daily News' correspondent at New York says also, it is regarded as certain that the award will be promptly paid, with the approval of all parties in the United States.

The Times' correspondent says that from the latest returns the following result is obtained regarding the new Congress which will meet after March 4:—In the Senate, 41 Democrats, 34 Republicans, and 1 Independent; in the House of Representatives, 149 Democrats, 129 Republicans, and 10 Greenbacks. There are still five vacancies. This result, it is generally believed, will put an end to the Greenback party as an effective political organisation.

Cape May, a sea-bathing town on the Atlantic coast, at the mouth of the Delaware river, was partly burnt on Saturday. The town, consisting chiefly of hotels and boarding-houses, was entirely built of wood. The fire, kindled by an incendiary, burnt over forty acres in the centre of the town. Nine hotels, nineteen boarding-houses, a large number of private cottages, bath-houses, and shops have been destroyed.

A strange story comes from New York. When Mr. Alexander T. Stewart, merchant, died, his body was put in a vault in St. Mark's-churchyard, of that town. On Oct. 7 the vault was found to have been tampered with, and a watchman was in consequence placed there, who remained on duty till recently. On the night of the 6th inst., however, thieves opened the vault, and took the body out of three inclosing coffins. A large reward has been offered for the discovery of the robbers.

CANADA.

We learn by telegrams from Montreal that the arrangements for the reception of the Marquis of Lorne as Governor-General of Canada are complete, and that the enthusiasm is very great. The fleet at Halifax will steam out to meet the Sarmatian and escort her into harbour. The streets will be lined with military. The new Governor-General will spend two days at Halifax, and go straight through to Montreal, deferring his visit to Quebec. The Scotch residents at Montreal will give a ball on St. Andrew's Day. After staying two days at Montreal the Governor-General will leave for Ottawa, where he will take up his residence.

Sir Alexander Galt has arrived at Ottawa for the purpose of assisting the Government in the preparation of the Canadian case in the fishery dispute for the information of the English Foreign Office. It is understood that Sir Alexander will be sent to England by the Dominion Government in order to state its views of the case. It is expressly provided by the Newfoundland Coast Fisheries Law, according to a telegram from St. John's, Newfoundland, that none of its clauses shall affect the right granted by treaty to the subjects of any Power in amity with her Majesty Queen Victoria.

A movement is on foot in Canada for the creation of a permanent military force, and it is understood that the Minister of Militia will introduce a bill in the Dominion House of Commons for the establishment of such a force and for remodelling the militia.

The 101st Regiment has landed at Halifax from Cyprus. A despatch of Tuesday says eighty-six men are still prostrate with Cyprus fever, which is of a malarious character; but medical men there believe the patients will speedily recover in the climate of Nova Scotia.

THE CAPE COLONIES.

War with the Kaffirs has recommenced. By the latest news, to Oct. 22, from Capetown we learn that a small British force in the Transvaal has been compelled to fall back before a great number of natives, who were subsequently defeated with great loss in a night attack which they made upon the English. The Colonial Government is making active military preparations.

AUSTRALIA.

In the New South Wales Legislative Assembly on the 6th inst. the Colonial Treasurer, the Hon. Henry Emmanuel Cohen, made his financial statement. He stated that the revenue of 1878 would probably exceed the original estimate by over £40,000. The accumulated surplus at the end of 1878 would amount to £2,350,000. He estimated the revenue for 1879 at £5,031,000, and expenditure at £5,336,000; this sum including, however, £400,000 for new public works, which would be chargeable to the surplus account, still leaving a surplus of about £2,000,000 at the end of 1879. The revenue continues in a flourishing condition. No fiscal modifications are proposed. The railways are self-supporting, and yield a profit sufficient to pay the interest on the capital borrowed for their construction. The public debt amounts to £11,700,000, being rather less than in January last; and against this debt are placed the reproductive telegraphs and railways, which have cost £10,500,000; the balance due from land selections—viz., £8,000,000; the revenue surplus advanced to loans for public works, £2,000,000; besides unalienated domains to an extent of 160,000,000 acres.

Major Sartorius, V.C., who distinguished himself in Ashantee, has volunteered for service in Afghanistan.

Notice, it is stated, will be given by the Swiss Federal Government on Jan. 1 next of its intention to withdraw from the Latin Monetary Convention.

A new Synagogue, said to be one of the finest of its kind in Europe, has been opened at Warsaw. It has cost, the Jewish World says, £48,000, exclusive of the cost of site, which was 70,000 roubles.

Baroness Mary Itulak Artymowska, twenty-five years of age, moving in the best Russian society, has, says the Estafette, been banished to Siberia for forgery, fraud, and bribery, leaving debts to the amount of 2,000,000 roubles.

The question respecting the adoption of a word-rate for telegrams between England and Germany has been finally settled. Telegrams from Berlin to England will be charged from January next at the rate of 30 pfennige per word, which is as near as can be to 3s. for the ten words.

The British Resident at Mandalay has remonstrated with the Burmese Government against the conduct of the native Governor in removing some persons from a British steamer on the Upper Burmese waters of the Irrawaddy, and the Governor has been summoned to Mandalay to account for his conduct.

The Woodlark, 869 tons, Captain W. Gibbons, chartered by Sir Arthur Blyth, K.C.M.G., Agent-General for South Australia, left Plymouth on the 8th inst. for Port Adelaide, with 290 emigrants, among whom were fifty-nine single female domestic servants. The Agent-General for New South Wales has been informed by telegraph of the arrival in Sydney of the ship Pericles, which sailed from Plymouth with emigrants in August last.

Orders have been given to the 42nd Regiment to embark from Cyprus immediately for Malta.

News received from the west coast of Africa states that Europeans have been forbidden by the King of Dahomey to leave Whydah without his authority, and a good deal of uneasiness prevails. It is reported from Cape Coast Castle that the various Ashantee tribes are becoming discontented with having to pay tribute to the King, and many of them are desirous of returning to their allegiance to the old dynasty.

A Bluebook has been issued containing official correspondence respecting the commercial relations between Great Britain and Spain. There are in all 214 despatches, ranging in date from April 29, 1877, to Sept. 13, 1878. On the latter day Lord Salisbury writes, with regard to the wine duties, that the Government cannot abandon the principle involved in the alcoholic scale, but is prepared to revise it if it be found to press unduly upon the commerce of Spain and of other countries which grow the stronger natural wines.

A Reuter's telegram reports a discovery of gold in India. It is stated that Sir Andrew Clarke, the public works member of the Viceregal Council, visited the Wynaad district, in the Madras Presidency, last February, and noticing, from his Australian experiences, indications of the presence of gold, he, with the sanction of the Viceroy, invited Mr. Brough Smyth, a mining engineer of Victoria, to bring to India some practical miners for the purpose of exploring and testing the quartz reefs. Mr. Smyth has already discovered, in an area of twenty-five miles by thirteen, ninety outcrops of ore reef with a thickness of two to four feet, yielding from a few pennyweights to 200 ounces per ton, and it is believed that with capital and good management a very large industry may be insured.

THE PROPOSED AFGHAN WAR.

Wednesday next, the 20th inst., is the day when the reply from Shere Ali of Cabul to the Viceroy of India's ultimatum letter is expected at Simla; but Lord Beaconsfield's speech of last Saturday has informed us that the aim of the British-Indian Government is to get a more "scientific frontier;" and, since we are not aware that the Ameer has yet been requested to cede a portion of his border territory, we cannot feel sure that the question of peace or war really depends on any explanation he may have to make touching the refusal to admit Sir Neville Chamberlain's mission through the Khyber Pass. It is already quite evident that the mission was sent with a previous expectation that it would be stopped, as it was eventually stopped, at the fort of Ali Musjid. There is proof of this, if any were needed, in the letter which we published last week, and which was written by a member of that mission, perfectly conversant with its objects and intentions, and was sent us to accompany the Sketches of Major Cavagnari's interview with the Afghan commandant. That letter stated that Major Cavagnari was sent on in advance to demand passage, because "it was not considered desirable to expose Sir Neville Chamberlain and the whole of the Mission to the insult of being turned back." It was, indeed, well known in India that the Ameer had declined to have a European military officer as resident Envoy at Cabul; and the Indian Government, in sending one without permission, must have reckoned upon the so-called "affront," which is now to be made the instant occasion of an offensive war in Afghanistan, with a view to the acquisition of "a scientific frontier." This being the political situation, we fear that the Viceroy's reception of some answer from the Ameer next Wednesday is a mere formality, and that the declaration of war rests entirely in the breasts of her Majesty's Ministers in London, and of her representative at the Indian seat of government. The intentions of our Prime Minister may be learned from his recent speech, in which he positively announced that the Indian frontier should now be altered, without referring to any contingency of a pacific reply from Shere Ali, or to any settlement of an existing dispute. As for the intentions of Lord Lytton and his advisers in India, there cannot be much doubt that they mean war, for they are making immense preparations, at a cost which would be frightful for India to bear, and which can scarcely be charged to the account of England unless war be eventually carried on beyond the Indian frontier. Putting these circumstances together, we are obliged to conclude that the proposed Afghan war is a certainty, whatever message from Cabul may arrive next week, and that it could only be averted by a change of mind in her Majesty's Government here, which is not very hopeful.

The latest news, from Peshawur on Wednesday last, informs us that General Sir Samuel Browne's Division is now concentrating in brigades in that vicinity. The first brigade is at Jamrood; the second at Hurri Singh; the third at Peshawur; the fourth at Nowshera. The cavalry is at Mutra Thana. The Guides still hold the Jamrood mouth of the Pass. The unhealthiness of the troops, and the backward state of the supply and transport organisation, scarcely warrant the expectation of immediate action on an extensive scale. Shere Ali is absolutely passive. He has cautioned the frontier tribes against disturbances, and appears bent on posturing as an unaggressive individual who is undergoing the process of bullying. Major Cavagnari has assurances of the friendliness of the tribes of the frontier zone, whose headmen daily crowd into Jamrood and Peshawur, avowing their goodwill. Trustworthy information puts the Ameer's force at Ali Musjid at 2500 men and twenty-four guns. It is quite untrue that the Ameer has any force detached in the Mishnee direction. The reports of artillery fire thereabouts are wholly fables.

According to a Russian letter received at St. Petersburg from Orenburg, Yakoob Khan, the son of the Ameer of Cabul, has been released from confinement, and will conduct the defence of Ali Musjid. It is further stated that Ahmed Ali, the nephew of the Ameer, will command an Afghan force consisting of ten regiments of infantry and four of cavalry. The Russian Embassy at Cabul is now under General Razgonoff, General Stolietoff having received leave of absence to go abroad. There is startling news of the Russian military advance through the Turcoman's country north of Afghanistan. General Lamakine has marched from the shores of the Caspian eastward up the river Attrek, and is said to have occupied the town of Merv, which is about two hundred miles due north of Herat; while another Russian force, of eight thousand men, is on the road towards Balkh, a city of Afghanistan, about the same distance north-west of Cabul. The Russians have plainly declared that they will not remain passive if England attempts to annex Candahar or Cabul; they will at least, in that case, take possession of Herat, which would now seem almost within their reach.

We are requested by Messrs. Verity Brothers, of Regent-street, and of Queen's-road, Bayswater, to state that they made the stove-grate fixed in the beautiful chimneypiece exhibited by Messrs. Howard and Sons, the manufacturers, at the Paris Exhibition, and of which we gave an Illustration last week.

A handsome memorial brass, executed by Messrs. E. Matthews and Sons, Oxford-street, is to be erected in Lowther church to the memory of the late Lord Lonsdale.

For the third time within thirty years the tower of the parish church of Week St. Mary, North Cornwall, was last Saturday night struck by lightning and destroyed.

The Church of All Saints, Child's-hill, was reopened on the 6th inst. by the Bishop of London. Mr. John Young, of Great Winchester-street, designed the additions, which cost £2000.

The new Church of St. Catherine, Nechells, built at a cost, including the site, of about £7000, the seats being chiefly free, was consecrated on the 8th inst. by the Bishop of Worcester.

On Wednesday the Bishop of Salisbury attended the re-opening service of Buckland Newton parish church, which has been restored, at a cost of £2000. This sum, within £400, has been raised by voluntary subscriptions.

The Council of the Curates' Augmentation Fund met on Monday and adopted a report which had been received from Messrs. Quilter, Ball, and Co. upon the recent frauds, and the best mode of preventing the recurrence of the like.

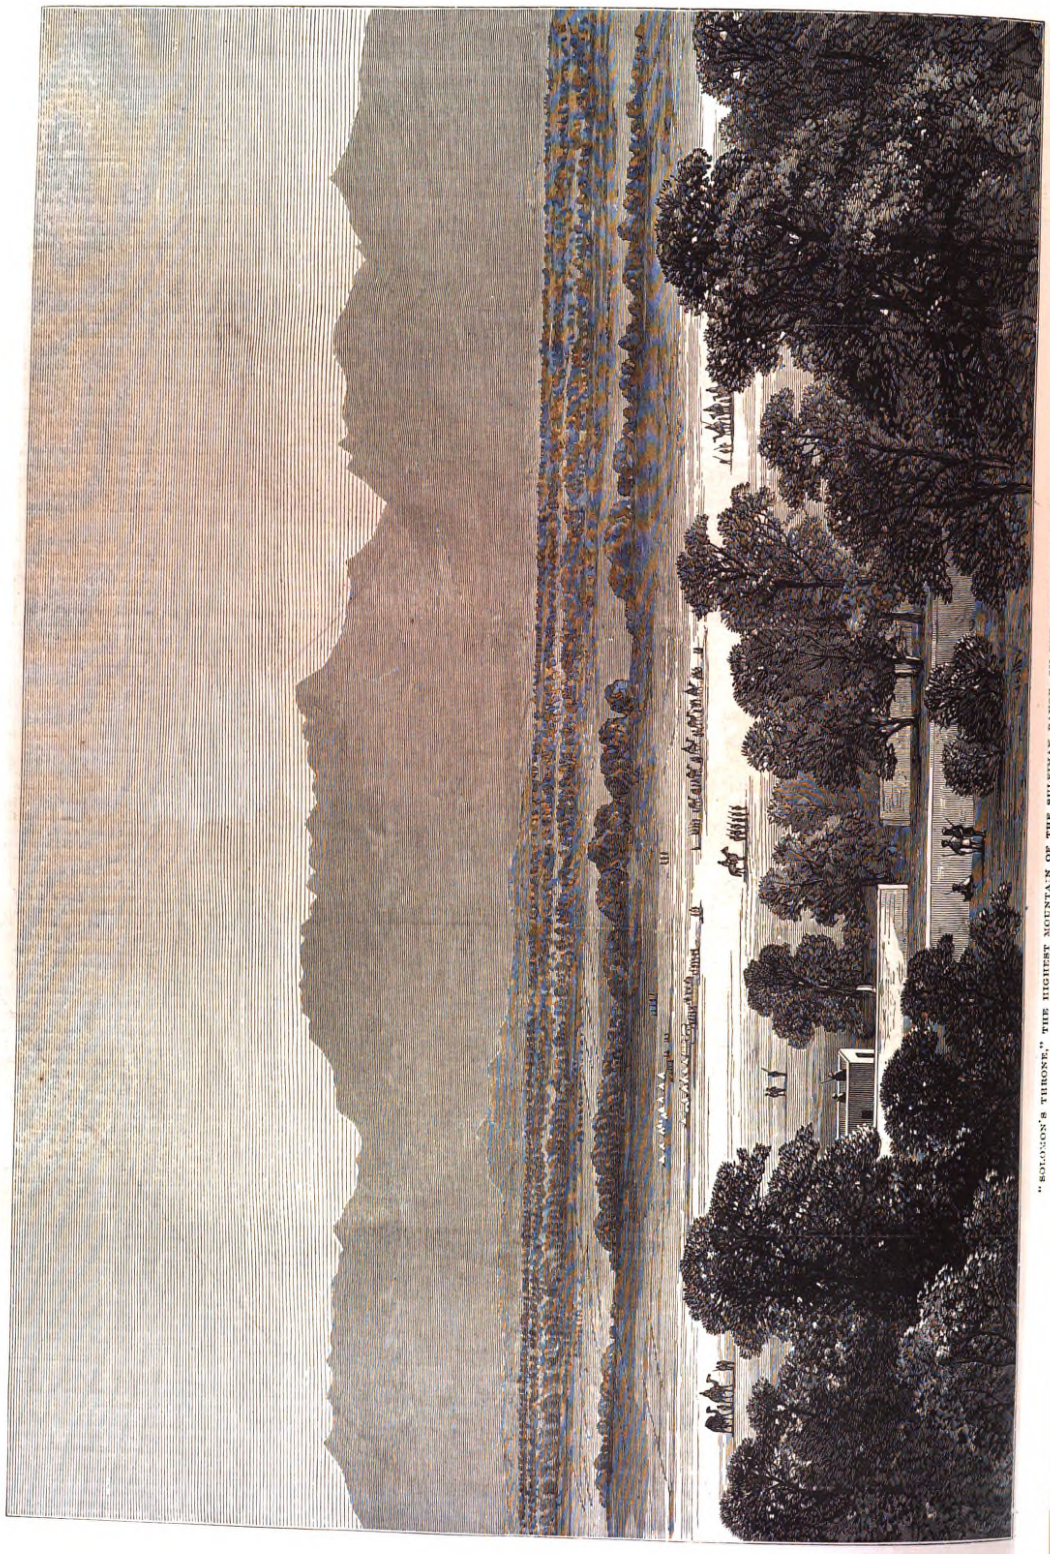
The revisers of the New Testament assembled on Tuesday, in the Jerusalem Chamber, for their eighty-fourth session. The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol presided. The company proceeded with the second revision of the Epistles to the Thessalonians.

The chancel of Charlton Kings, which has almost been rebuilt by Mr. Dixon Hartland and his sisters, as a memorial to their mother, was reopened on the 7th inst. The nave was reopened on St. Mark's Day, after complete restoration. Mr. Middleton was the architect throughout.

St. Mary's, Stalbridge, Dorset, which has been restored by Mr. T. H. Wyatt, at a cost of £2600, was reconsecrated on the 7th inst. It is a large structure, comprising work of the thirteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries. The works include a new south aisle and transept, and lengthening of the nave.

The Rev. Dr. Lee, Incumbent of All Saints', Lambeth, appeared on Monday in the Queen's Bench Division to show cause against a rule which had been obtained by the Metropolitan Board of Works for a mandamus commanding Mr. Partridge, a metropolitan police magistrate, to issue a warrant to levy on the reverend gentleman a sum of £100 for repairs done to his church. The Lord Chief Justice said the Building Act never contemplated that an outlay of this description should be shifted from the parishioners upon the Incumbent. He therefore dismissed the rule.

The Rev. C. A. Belli, who was for fifty-three years Vicar of South Weald, near Brentwood, but who resigned the living a short time since, has given £12,000 towards the building of a church and its endowment, and for the erection of a parsonage-house at Bentley, an outlying district of South Weald parish. Mr. O. E. Coope, M.P. for Middlesex, who resides in the neighbourhood, has subscribed £2000 for the same objects; and a site for the buildings has been presented by Mr. C. J. Hume Tower. At the laying of the corner-stone of the church, a ceremony which has just been performed by Mr. Belli, it was stated that during his incumbency that gentleman had rebuilt the mother parish church and the parsonage, erected and endowed the village schools, and been a liberal contributor to the erection of Christ Church schools, Great Warley. The new church will cost about £8000, and the remainder of the money subscribed will be devoted to endowment. Mr. Belli's successor as Vicar of South Weald is Canon Fraser.



The Bishop of Hereford preached last week at the reopening of the church of Garway, situate on the banks of the Monnow, close to the borders of the counties of Hereford and Monmouth. A new Vicar, the Rev. J. Jones, who has recently been appointed, has set himself the task of effecting a complete restoration of a church which his Lordship described, "without fear of contradiction," as one of the most curious and interesting to be found in the West of England. The fine Norman tower, 27 ft. square, is detached, and there is much excellent work of the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries about the church. The stone altar, with five incised crosses, remains in situ, and the rood loft steps are intact, while the open seats of massive oak have ends four inches in thickness. In the reign of Henry II., the Knights Templars built a preceptory close by, and after their suppression in 1313 it fell into the hands of the Knights Hospitallers, who remained there till the Reformation. Their chapel, adjoining the chancel, contains many interesting features, while the church generally exhibits sundry Jewish or Saracenic details, very harmoniously blended with English features. The architect engaged in the restoration is Mr. E. H. Lingen Barker, of Hereford; and the contractor for the works just executed was Mr. W. Balcombe, of Kenilworth.

It is stated that Monsignor M'Cabe, Auxiliary Bishop to the late Cardinal Cullen, has been appointed Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin.

The hon. gentleman spoke of the importance of thoroughness in education, and of the great good which resulted from these local examinations.

A CHINESE PROCLAMATION.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

"The harebrained chatter of irresponsible frivolity." Surely there has rarely been uttered a more neatly turned sentence of sarcasm than Lord Beaconsfield's denunciation at Guildhall of people who presume to talk politics without being members of her Majesty's Government, and at other seasons besides Lord Mayor's Day, on which occasion only, according to our epigrammatic Premier, "sense and truth" are served up as accompaniments to the calipash and the calipee. The point of Lord Beaconsfield's arrowy gibe lies in the fact that it is discharged at full random, and may hit all and sundry—friend or foe alike. It is a cap which may be made to fit anybody. Tories may twit Liberals with their "irresponsible frivolity," while the Liberals may return the compliment by laughing at the Jingoes as "hairbrained chatterers."

Mem: When my readers (may they all live a thousand years!) grow weary of these "Echoes" I will change the title thereof to "Chatter," and sign myself "Harebrain," instead of "G. A. S." I shall continue to be frivolous, of course; but I shall not be wholly "irresponsible:" so far as doing my best to amuse my readers goes.

Still, I venture to opine that the eloquent Prime Minister had much better have left alone that allusion to "anonymous paragraph writers." Now and again a journalist may harmlessly lift, either wholly or partially, the veil of his incognito, as I do laughingly in this column, where, luckily, it is not my business to discuss any great public question, or to be angry with anybody. But, so far as seriously argumentative and controversial journalism is concerned, I hold the Anonymous to be one of the chief factors in the power and purity of the English press. Who am I, Brown or Jones or Robinson, that I should presume in my own proper person, and in print, to denounce the tergiversating statesman, to expose the corrupt speculator, to lash the impudent imposter, to rebuke the unjust judge? But, writing anonymously, the editorial "We" gives me, Brown or Jones or Robinson, authority and weight. Individually, I may be obscure, frivolous, hairbrained, and an irresponsible chatterer. But as "We," I am the representative of a certain phase of Public Opinion, and I can claim to be listened to with attention and respect.

It is quite true that personally and in pocket the writer of leading articles suffers grievously from the maintenance of the anonymous. In France the successful journalist may become a Deputy, an Academician, an Ambassador, a Minister of State. Thiers, Guizot, Villemain, Sainte Beuve, Fleury, all began their career as journalists or as professors. Some of the wealthiest newspaper proprietors in Paris have been simple journalists. Louis Veron, Nestor Roqueplan, and Alphonse Royer, successively managers of the Grand Opéra, were newspaper writers. Jules Janin, dramatic critic of the Journal des Débats, was a member of the French Academy. John Lemoinne, of the Débats, is an Academician now. The English journalist, however eminent may be the rank which he has taken in his profession, may expect to become—just nothing at all. No Academic distinction, no cross of the Legion of Honour, no chance of being appointed to a foreign mission, no chance of getting into Parliament—unless he have plenty of money, or, in Ireland, priestly patronage: in a word, November, to paraphrase Tom Hood. Stay, when November is dragging to a close, and December, with waning faculties, and poverty, and perhaps paralysis, approaches, the once eminent journalist, provided he have plenty of influential friends to back his petition, may perhaps get a Civil List pension of a hundred a year. In the face of these mournfully obvious facts, I yet contend that the English Press would not be half so useful nor half so powerful as it is were journalists to sign their names to their articles.

I see that Dr. Arthur Edis has been drawing attention in the Times to the cruel system of not permitting the young lady assistants in shops to sit down in the intervals of their long and weary hours of work; and I perceive that some of the leading drapery houses at the West-End have protested against Dr. Edis's strictures, and declare that in their establishments, at least, there is an abundance of sedentary accommodation for the female assistants. This I am extremely glad to learn; but, at the same time, proffering my respectful compliments to Dr. Arthur Edis, who is doing, I think, yeoman's service in a righteous cause, I would entreat him to make the round of the refreshment counters of our great London railway stations, and confidentially ask the young ladies employed there whether they are ever allowed to sit down, and if so, how often? Perhaps, since the letter in the Times appeared, a few three-legged stools have been introduced into our railway buffets for the relief of the barmaids; but I don't think that there were any such facilities for rest afforded for these poor damsels when I left London.

Still, it is quite possible to have too much of a good thing. What agonies, arising from muscular contractions of the lower limbs, are suffered by the continually sitting omnibus driver, by the sewing-machine "hand," by the watchmaker, the engraver, and, to a certain extent, by the author. The merchant's clerk may stand or sit, as he pleases; the painter can stand to his work; but I have known very few men of letters who could write comfortably, save sitting. Alexander Dumas the Elder used to dash off his romances, standing, in his shirt, with his bare feet on the cold tiles. He began at six in the morning, and by noon his day's work was finished. But then the elder Dumas seldom troubled himself to think. In Meissonier's admirable full-length portrait of Alexander Dumas the Younger the distinguished dramatist is immersed in a capacious fauteuil, with one leg crossed over the other, and an expression of the profoundest cogitation on his countenance. Dumas the Younger is a writer who thinks.

Mem: Two or three years ago I was afflicted during seven months with a dreadful malady in the extremities which caused me almost ceaseless torture. I experienced a little relief when I stood up; so, having no tall counting-house desk by me, I had a number of back volumes of the Illustrated News piled breast high on the dining-room table, and supporting my left arm with a crutch, tried to scrawl the "Echoes." I got on pretty well for an hour or so, but after that the crutch slipped, and I tumbled on the carpet, while the dining-room table emitted divers sounds alarmingly symptomatic of giving way under the weight of the back volumes. So I was fain to call in an intelligent youth to write from dictation at a guinea a week.

English shop girls do not sit down half enough. French shop women, on the other hand, sit a great deal too much. The females in the newspaper kiosques on the boulevards sit in their narrow little niches from seven in the morning until midnight. As for the poor dames de comptoir in the restaurants and cafés, they are the whitest of all white slaves. Always sitting, always scribbling out the customers' little bills, and always exposed to the glare of the gas and the fumes of bad tobacco. Poor ladies! They are expected, moreover, to keep a lynx eye on the company and the waiters—if you look around, at your table, for a newspaper—for the saltspoon, you hear at once a little bell tinkling in the distance. The dame de comptoir has been watching you, and she has signalled to the garçon to supply your needs. A wonderful race, both garçons and dames de comptoir, and white slaves all of them. Who is not a slave, in some way or another? Have you not a friend who is the slave of his banker's book? or another who is the bondservant of his broughams and victorias and his thoroughbred horses?

Anything more doleful than the aspect of the building in the Champ de Mars, tenanted until Sunday afternoon last by the peerless Exposition Universelle of 1878, it is difficult to conceive. Glass cases have been emptied, pictures, statuary, big machines, even, have been carted away with almost magical rapidity; and by Tuesday morning the vast bazaar looked miserably empty. The asphalte flooring has been torn up, and the bare earth of the Champ de Mars is disclosed beneath, with long lines of iron tramways to facilite the removal of the heavier merchandise from the dismantled building. Sic transit gloria mundi.

I proposed, jestingly, a fortnight ago that Messrs. Osler's great crystal throne should be dispatched to Cabul as a peace offering to our ill-conditioned neighbour, Shere Ali, Ameer of Afghanistan. I find that the glittering fauteuil in question is actually about to be dispatched to Calcutta. At the same time the Rajah of Putaila has purchased from the exhibit of Messrs. Thos. Webb, of Stourbridge (they got a Grand Prix), a splendid crystal casket, decorated with gilt metal-work; while another Indian magnifico has become the possessor of three vast ornamental mirrors, with clusters of candelabra at the sides. A number of engraved and other glass from the Webb exhibit has been acquired by the Duchesse De la Torre for transmission to Spain.

All the scandal-mongers in Paris—there are said to be a million of them, just half the number of people who talk scandal in London—are in ecstasies at the extracts from Prince Bismarck's table-talk given in Herr Moritz Busch's recently published book. Whether Napoleon III. was, as the Prince qualifies him, a Tiefenbacher—a carpet knight, a commander of the Lumber Troop, or not, may be a matter of opinion; but I own that I felt a bitter pang when I found the illustrious Alexander von Humboldt set down as an egotist and a bore of the first water, who was always worrying people with stories about "Popocatapetl, a mountain in Mexico, seven thousand yards above the level of the sea." Ah! Prince Bismarck, if you had ever lived in the shadow of Popocatapetl and of its sister Istclasiuatl, "the Virgin in white reclining" you would speak less disrespectfully of the topography of Tenostitlan. I never heard General Ulysses S. Grant talk more eloquently than when he discoursed one night at Mr. James Ashbury, M.P.'s house at Brighton, of his Mexico campaign and of his ascent of Popocatapetl.

Mem: The monarch of Aztec mountains has, I admit, a somewhat crabbed name. To remember it off hand requires a slight mnemonic effort. Think of "Pop the cat in the kettle" and the transition to Popocatapetl will be instantaneous. This suggestion will, I hope, meet with the approval of Mr. Stokes, the distinguished authority on the Art of Memory. I succeeded the other day in "Stokesing" the name of a French novelist, Pigault Le Brun, whose appellation, through some perversity of memory, I have been during the last thirty years persistently unable to remember at call. At last I determined to "Stokes" the name of the author of "Mon Oncle Thomas" and "Les Barons de Felsheim." I remembered that he was a great glutton, and that he was a favourite of Jerome Napoleon, some time King of Wurtemburg, to whose Court he was attached in some subordinate capacity. As a courtier he would have worn some kind of uniform. I arbitrarily assumed that it would be of a brown colour embroidered with gold. Then I made a pen-and-ink drawing of a pig on his hind legs in a Court dress, and with a book under his arm. "Pig gold brown"—"Pigault Le Brun." I shall remember, I hope, the novelist's name for good.

THE NEW PRESIDENT OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

It would, perhaps, be asking too much of human nature to furnish a model President of the Royal Academy—one that should meet every conceivable requirement of the office—that should reconcile rivalities and possible jealousies within the Academy, and satisfy the exactions of "outsiders" and the conflicting views of those who occupy themselves with the present and future of British art. We think, however, that both artists and public have reason to congratulate themselves on finding so many desiderata realised in the new President, Mr. Frederick Leighton, R.A., who was elected to the vacant post on Wednesday. First, and foremost, Mr. Leighton is eminent in art; and, as though to silence those of his critics who found in his painting something of effeminacy in feeling and conventionality of execution, he has lately produced a group in sculpture remarkable for masculine energy both in conception and modelling. He may, also, be confidently expected to grace the position by gentlemanly courtesy and the gift of eloquence: whilst his command of Continental languages will be of advantage in official intercourse.

It is natural to compare Mr. Leighton with his predecessors in the Presidential chair. But in some points of view he has little in common with any of them. Three of the former Presidents, Sir Thomas Lawrence, Sir Martin A. Shee, and Sir Francis Grant were exclusively portrait-painters. Benjamin West (who steadily refused knighthood on religious grounds) devoted himself principally to scriptural and historical subjects, but the encomia of his contemporaries and his own pretension have not been indorsed by the present generation. Sir Charles Eastlake—if he likewise failed to reach any high achievement—formed his taste at the purest sources of Italian art; and his contributions to artistic literature possess a value which should be more widely appreciated. Sir Joshua Reynolds, the first and greatest President, whose range extended beyond the portraiture in which he pre-eminently excelled, alone is now acknowledged as a great English master; and his "Discourses" have remained equally unapproached in our art-literature.

It may, perhaps, be regretted that the works of the new President of our English Academy should have revealed scarcely a trace of sympathy with English history, life, manners, or scenery. Nor is Mr. Leighton known as a prominent promoter of the interests of English artists, or of art-education in this country. Criticism, unbiassed by fashionable applause, often delusive, will find in his painting the perception of only the superficial aspects and relations of beautiful forms and colours, in classical suggestions, or Italian and Eastern realities, as lending themselves to decorative effect, rather than the deeper insight into that highest beauty which is also the highest expression of natural truth. We do not demand that art should have a purpose outside itself. Even the so-called "sensuous" Venetians tell us most precious truths within the proper domain of art: their works are conditionally true, not unconditionally artificial. On the other hand, it may be justly argued that Mr. Leighton has by his example done a service to English art in directing attention to classical ideality, and the graceful aspect of life in Italy and the East. And we trust that when in his new position opportunities for usefulness present themselves he will not fail to avail himself of them for the benefit of the profession at large.

FARADAY LECTURE—GASEOUS STATE OF MATTER.

The Faraday Medal, given every third year to a distinguished foreign philosopher by the Chemical Society of London, was this year given to Professor Adolphe Wurtz, of Paris, member of the Institut (Academy of Sciences), and editor of the great Dictionary of Pure and Applied Chemistry just completed. The previous recipients of the medal were professors J. B. Dumas, A. W. Hofmann, and Cannizzaro.

The lecture (in French), as on former occasions, was given at the Royal institution on Tuesday. Professor Wurtz chose for his subject, "The Constitution of Matter in the Gasecus State," one intimately connected with Faraday's earliest discoveries. After having described the experiments of that philosopher in the liquefaction of chlorine, ammonia, cyanogen, and sulphurous acid, the Professor explained the principle of Faraday's method, which consists in letting the gas escape and accumulate in sealed tubes; and then noticed that of M. Bussy in 1824, who subjected the gases to great cold. Both processes result in bringing closer together the ultimate particles of the gas. According to the opinion of Sir Humphry Davy, it would seem that compression is more efficacious as a means of condensation than cold; but, as Professor Wurtz remarked, compression is not sufficient for certain gases, which can only be reduced to the liquid state by the combined action of great pressure and extreme cold. This also agrees with the present opinions on the constitution of aëriform fluids and also with Professor Andrews' discoveries relating to the continuity of the liquid and the gaseous states. The Professor next referred to the theory of Daniel Bernouilli, who first described gases as being composed of minute particles, free in space, capable of moving very rapidly in straight lines, so that the pressure which gases exert results from the shock of their particles against the walls of the vessels which contain them. The facts relating to what Professor Andrews terms the "critical point" were next explained, as well as the impossibility of reducing by pressure alone any given gas above the temperature to which the "critical point" corresponds. For the so-called permanent gases this point is very low; and therefore for their reduction to the liquid state the combined action of a very great cold and a very powerful pressure is essentially requisite. The Professor then explained and illustrated the methods by which MM. Cailletet and Raoul Pictet were so thoroughly successful in causing the disappearance from science of the distinction between permanent and coercible gases. After considering the physical constitution of gases, the Professor terminated his lecture by touching upon some of the most general points relating to their chemical constitution. He said that the molecules, which move in space with incredible velocity, are themselves composed of atoms which are drawn together and so kept by affinity; and he referred to a theory concerning the relations which exist between the volumes of these gases and the number of molecules which they contain. The Italian chemist Avogadro was the first to say that equal volumes of gases or vapours, taken in the same conditions of temperature and pressure, contain the same number of molecules. Professor Wurtz insisted upon the importance of this proposition in a chemical point of view, and discussed several alleged exceptions, which he showed to be rather apparent than real, to the rule of Avogadro; and concluded by warmly expressing his sense of the immense importance of Faraday's researches in relation to the present high position of modern chemistry.

At the close of the lecture, which was illustrated by a series of magnificent experiments, the cordial thanks of the meeting were moved by Professor Frankland, seconded by Professor Odling; and, finally, the Faraday medal was given to Professor Wurtz by Dr. Gladstone, the president of the Chemical Society. The meeting closed with the Professor briefly expressing his deep sense of the honour awarded him.

The theatre was lit by the electric light, produced by the magneto-electric machine of Dr. C. William Siemens.

There was a great gathering of scientific men on Wednesday night at the annual dinner of the Chemical Society, at Willis's Rooms, the occasion being made use of to do honour to the eminent French chemist, M. de Wurtz, who on the previous night gave the triennial Faraday lecture at the Royal Institution. Among those present were Professor Huxley, Professor Tyndall, and Messrs. Crookes, Dewar, Frankland, Odling, and Roscoe.

LOSS OF THE PRINCESS ALICE.

Last Saturday the official report of the Commissioners appointed by the Board of Trade to inquire into the loss of the Princess Alice was issued. The Court finds the cause of the casualty to have been a breach of rule 29 of the Thames Conservancy regulations by the Princess Alice not porting her helm when she came end on the Bywell Castle, a vessel coming in the opposite direction. Recommendations are made with respect to the navigation of the river as precautions against the recurrence of similar disasters.

The Coroner's jury in this case, being unable to agree on Wednesday evening, were locked up all night. At half-past seven on Thursday morning they agreed to the following verdict, fifteen out of the nineteen jurymen signing the inquisition returned:—"That the deaths of the said William Beachey and others were occasioned by drowning in the waters of the river, from a collision that took place after sunset between a steam-vessel called the Bywell Castle and a steam-vessel called the Princess Alice, whereby the Princess Alice was cut in two and sank; such collision not being wilful. That the Bywell Castle did not take the necessary precaution in time for easing, stopping, and reversing her engines; and that the Princess Alice contributed to the collision by not stopping and going astern. That all collisions, in the opinion of the jury, might be in future avoided if proper and stringent rules and regulations were laid down for the navigation of all steam traffic on the River Thames."—The following addenda were made to the verdict:—"1, We consider the Princess Alice was on Sept. 3 seaworthy; 2, We think the Princess Alice was not properly and sufficiently manned; 3, We think the number of persons on board the Princess Alice was more than was prudent; 4, We think the means of saving life on board the Princess Alice were insufficient for a vessel of her class."

A new bridge over the river Irwell at Old Trafford, erected by the Corporation of Salford, the Cheshire Lines Committee, the Stretford Local Board, and the Mersey and Irwell Navigation Company, has been opened.

Lord Salisbury has received a despatch from the Chinese Minister in London, conveying the thanks of the Chinese Government for the assistance rendered by Englishmen in all parts of the world in relieving the distress caused by the famine in the northern provinces of China. The Minister says that this "spontaneous act of generosity has made a deep impression on the Government and people of China, which cannot but have the effect of more closely cementing the friendly relations which now so happily exist between China and the people of this country."

The Court of Common Council, after a long discussion, has rejected by a majority of 92 the report of the committee recommending the erection of a low-level bridge over the Thames near the Tower.—At a meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works a recommendation of Sir J. W. Bazalgette has been approved, that in the Parliamentary notices there should be included power to make an additional approach to the proposed Tower Bridge from the Surrey side, and it was stated that the gradient of the approach to the proposed bridge from the south side was one in forty, and was consequently much less than the approach the Waterloo, Blackfriars, Southwark, and London Bridges.

In the Exchequer Division yesterday week, the hearing of an action concerning the right of chemists and druggists to prescribe was brought to a close before Mr. Baron Pollock and a special jury. It had been instituted by the Society of Apothecaries of London against a pharmaceutical chemist carrying on business at Nottingham to recover two penalties of £20 each for having acted as an apothecary without having obtained the certificate specified in the Act; in other words, for having medically examined and prescribed for customers over the counter. The defendant pleaded that he had only followed the practice of chemists, which was protected by the 28th section. The jury found a verdict in his favour.

During Alderman Sir T. White's year of office a sum of £495,000 was raised for charitable purposes: the principal Fund was of course the Indian Famine Fund, the other collections being for the West of England Inundations, the Shipping Disasters, and the Fire at St. John, New Brunswick. In the year just closed (Sir Thomas S. Owden's) the total is about £85,000: being in respect of the Eurydice Fund, £5700; the Princess Alice, £47,500; the Abercarne Colliery Fund, £31,000: and the Haydock Colliery Fund, £1000. The total for the three years is about £618,000.

The forty-sixth annual general meeting of the Sacred Harmonic Society was held on Wednesday evening at Exeter Hall. According to the report read, the subscription-list of the past season was fully up to the average. Reference was made to the successful production of Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," both musically and financially, and the members referred in very complimentary and congratulatory terms to the valuable services rendered by Sir Michael Costa, who from the first suggestion of the idea down to the moment of its successful realisation gave unremitting attention to every point connected with the score; and to his unceasing vigilance, coupled with his well-known musical ability and skill, must in a great measure be attributed this happy crowning point of the labours of the past season. The forty-seventh season will begin on Friday next with performances of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The chief vocalists will be Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Suter, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson.

The Duke of Bedford, this year's president, and the Council of the Smithfield Club have made arrangements for the forthcoming Cattle Show at the Agricultural Hall. The prize-list for the ensuing show has been settled, and will be larger than ever. The show is this year to be divided into seventy-six classes—thirty-two for cattle, thirty-one for sheep, and thirteen classes for pigs. For the Devon, Hereford, Shorthorn, and Sussex breeds the money prizes for each breed will be £220, and the aggregate amount of the monetary prizes for the cattle classes will reach £1400, for the sheep classes £755, and for pigs £192. In addition, there are six silver cups of the value of £40 each to the best Devon, Hereford, Shorthorn, Sussex, Scotch, or cross-bred animal, in their respective classes; a £50 silver cup for the best steer or ox, and for the best heifer or cow, with the champion plate of one hundred guineas for best beast in the show, of the aggregate value of £445. In the sheep there are ten silver cups of the value of £20 each, and a champion plate for the best pen of three sheep in the show, value £240; and four silver cups for pigs, valued at £15 each, or an aggregate of £60, thus making the entire value of the prizes for the forthcoming show considerably over £3000. It has been arranged that the show shall begin this year on Monday, Dec. 9. Tuesday, the 10th, will be the commencement of the show to the general public, and it will continue open the three following days, finally closing on the evening of Friday, Dec. 13.

The inhabitants of the fishing port of Eyemouth, on the Berwickshire coast, have resolved to adopt a scheme for the improvement of the harbour proposed by Mr. Meek, C.E., of Edinburgh. A pier is to be built, at a cost of £20,000, and there is to be a line from the North British Railway.

The Dublin Chamber of Commerce on Monday adopted a scheme of incorporation under the Companies Acts as an association limited by guarantee. The association will be registered under the Board of Trade; but the objectionable word "limited" will, by consent of the Board of Trade, be omitted from its title, and its accounts will not be audited by an officer of the Board of Trade. There are at present about 1200 members, and the constituency is not to number more than 1500. The liability of each member is fixed at £5.

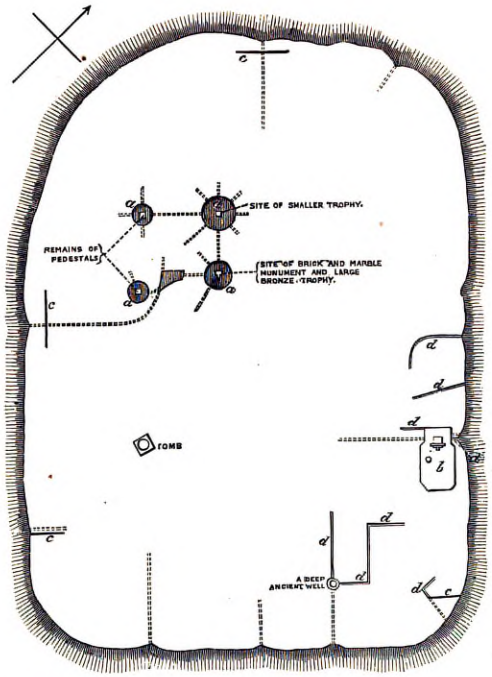
JOHNSONIANA.

Dr. Johnson still stops the way. It is to be hoped, however, that, when Dr. Johnson, His Friends, and His Critics, by George Birkbeck Hill, D.C.L. (Smith, Elder, and Co.), and Johnson's Lives of the Poets, &c., edited, with a preface, by Matthew Arnold (Macmillan and Co.), have stood their fair time at publicity's door, the "great lexicographer" may be finally driven off, and the literary thoroughfare may be left free for the circulation of less threadbare "subjects." It is not improbable, in fact, that the public have had more than enough, by this time, of Dr. Johnson; and that his memory may suffer from the irritation produced by "damnable iteration," just as the name of Aristides became intolerable to the worthy Athenian citizen. One is almost tempted to ask for a revision of the English language, if "the portrait of one great man drawn by another great man" is to be considered a true description of Macaulay's life of Johnson. Dr. Johnson was undoubtedly a "great lexicographer;" and Mr. Macaulay, before he became a lord, was undoubtedly a great essayist; but it is surely an exaggeration to write them down "great men." Moreover, for all the fear which Dr. Johnson inspired (and it is notorious that he inspired none in such men as Beauclerk or even Langton) during his lifetime, there cannot be many people who regard his memory with that awe of which a little is almost inseparable from one's idea of greatness. On the contrary, one's admiration for the "great lexicographer" is, in consequence perhaps of the manner in which Macaulay and other biographers have dwelt upon his more repulsive and ludicrous peculiarities, modified by a little of that feeling with which such monstrosities as a learned pig, or a dancing bear, or a talking seal are regarded. And that is not the sort of feeling with which we look upon greatness. That Dr. Johnson was an extraordinary man, and that he was something better than a great man, as the world generally counts greatness, there is certainly no inclination here to deny; but it is possible to have too much of a good thing, and even of a good man. It must be acknowledged, however, that the prevalent rage for Johnsoniana has resulted, so far as both Dr. Hill and Mr. Arnold are concerned, in two very entertaining, interesting, and possibly useful works.

Dr. Hill's volume consists partly of essays hitherto unpublished; partly of articles already published in the columns of the leading journals and periodicals, "so re-cast and so enlarged that, so far as form at least is concerned, they may fairly claim to be original;" partly of compositions "republished in the same form in which they at first appeared," but with such additions as appeared advisable. The work is divided into ten chapters. The first presents the reader with a very striking picture of Oxford as it was when Johnson was an undergraduate of Pembroke. The second is occupied with a sort of disquisition, in which anecdotes concerning Johnson are intermingled with or added to a vindication of his character against the misrepresentations of Macaulay. The third is devoted chiefly to the task of showing how far Mr. Carlyle is right and how far wrong in his estimate of Boswell as a true hero-worshipper and as a labourer in what the French might call the exploitation of Samuel Johnson. The fourth is to all intents and purposes a defence of Boswell against the aspersions of Macaulay. The fifth contains a short dissertation upon "the melancholy of Johnson and Cowper." The sixth is apparently intended to prove that "the respectable Hottentot" mentioned in one of Lord Chesterfield's letters "was not Samuel Johnson, but Mr. L, Lord Chesterfield's relation." The seventh has to do principally with the tone of Lord Chesterfield's celebrated letters, from which we are called upon to conclude, as we have probably long ago concluded, that "there could never have been any intimacy, still less could there have been any affection, between the author of 'The Vanity of Human Wishes' and the writer of these 'Letters to a Son.'" The eighth is full of pleasant writing about the "tall Lincolnshire squire," Bennet Langton, of gentle and gentleman-like repute; and the ninth, of equally pleasant writing, about the fashionable Topham Beauclerk. The tenth is a touching tribute to the memory of Oliver Goldsmith. There is also an appendix, wherein the not very important question of how long Johnson remained at Oxford is discussed; and to that appendix is further appended a "note" exhibiting the evidence upon which we should conclude that, "so far from being three years at Oxford, he was there barely fourteen months." The book is pretty certain to be received with "the degree of favour" for which the author is anxious; but it is with mixed feelings that one accepts the assurance that, if it should, the author will "hope in another volume to write of others among Johnson's friends, and, perhaps, of others among his critics." Many of us would be better pleased if the author would write an equally agreeable volume about somebody else's friends and critics, of whom we know less and are desirous of knowing more.

As for Mr. Arnold's book, there is scarcely anything to be said about it beyond the few following remarks. He is so grave an authority that we open our mouths and shut our eyes and take what he pleases to send us. And it pleases him to give us a preface in which he explains some of his views about education, and his reasons for editing, in the interest of "the student of English literature," the "most important of the lives in Johnson's volumes." He has accordingly chosen six—the lives of Milton, Dryden, Swift, Addison, Pope, and Gray. The selection shows that he does not consider "most important" to comprise "best;" otherwise, he would certainly have substituted the life of Savage for one of the chosen. He has taken what Sydney Smith might have called a "short view" of his editorial duties; for he has added only "one single note," has "reprinted Johnson's six chief lives simply as they are given in the edition in four volumes octavo, the edition which passes for being the first to have a correct and complete text," and has "left the lives, in that natural form, to have their own effect upon the reader." There is, of course, a great deal to be said in favour of this plan; for in passing from Milton to Gray the reader will pass from the English of 1608 to the English of 1771 and, in respect of the biographer himself, of 1781, when Johnson was still sound as well as ripe in intellect and style, though doomed to fall in a year or two, so that gradual transformations in manner, expression, and orthography may be easily followed by the observant. On the other hand, the plan allows wheat and tares, truth and error, what is worthy and what is unworthy of imitation, to become implanted together in the reader's mind, to be hereafter distinguished and separated not without considerable difficulty and at some risk of mental disturbance. However, the reader will certainly have in Johnson's criticisms, poor and unjust as they may sometimes be, an example which might be profitably studied by the majority of our modern critics: he does not use the work which he criticises as a mere excuse for the display of his own proficiency in the arts of rhetoric, mystification, and fine writing; he does not wrap up his meaning in a cloud of vaporous verbosity. It should be mentioned that between the preface and the lives is interposed the vigorous "Life of Johnson" contributed by Macaulay to the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

RECENT ASSYRIAN DISCOVERIES, BY MR. RASSAM.



BRONZE SCULPTURES OF GATES, AND ALABASTER CHEST WITH TABLETS, IN THE TEMPLE AT BALAWAT, NEAR NINEVEH.

THE LATE MR. SAMUEL PHELPS.

ASSYRIAN DISCOVERIES.

Some interesting articles in the Times, and in several other daily journals, towards the end of last August, described the important discoveries made in the spring of this year by Mr. Hormuzd Rassam at Balawat, nine miles north-east of Nimroud (Kalakh), and fifteen miles from Koyunjik, on the Tigris, the site of ancient Nineveh. Mr. Rassam, a native of that country, but a naturalised British subject, and long in the service of our Foreign Office, was the assistant of Sir Austen Henry Layard, now her Majesty's Envoy at Constantinople, in the famous explorations of Nineveh and Nimroud, about thirty years ago, which contributed the first instalment of relics of the Assyrian historical monuments to the British Museum. Since the lamented death of Mr. George Smith, who had carried on the work partly for the British Museum, partly at the cost of the proprietors of the Daily Telegraph, the Museum authorities have commissioned Mr. Rassam to pursue these researches, from which he has already obtained some valuable results. He came home last summer, bringing some collections which are now in the Museum, and a portion of which, from Balawat, are the subject of our present Illustrations. A lecture explanatory of these sculpture-records of Assyrian history was delivered last week to the Society of Biblical Archæology, in Conduit-street, by Mr. Theophilus Pinches, the successor of Mr. George Smith at his post in the Oriental Antiquities Department of the Museum. He described the mound of Balawat as the site of an ancient Assyrian fortress, which had borne a different name before the reign of Assurnazirpal, father of Shalmaneser II., whose reception of tribute from Jehu, King of Israel, is recorded on the famous black obelisk. Though so close to Nineveh, it had been taken and held by the Babylonians during a period of Assyria's political decline, perhaps coincident with the epoch of Hebrew ascendancy. But when Assurnazirpal, a great warrior, came to the throne he recovered the city, and renamed it Imgur-Beli, and built there a temple to the god of war, near the city's north-eastern wall. These facts are recorded on alabaster tablets found by Mr. Rassam in a coffer of the same material near the entrance of the temple itself. As Mr. Pinches remarked, they shed a fresh ray of light on one of the darkest periods of Assyrian history. The mound is nearly rectangular, and its corners are turned pretty accurately towards the four cardinal points of the compass. The temple ruins lie near the north-eastern edge, where ran the city wall. In the western half of the mound four stone platforms were found marking the sides of an irregular square. While digging round these platforms Mr. Rassam unearthed some pieces of chased bronze, and at length two huge bronze monuments slowly came to view. They were of the strangest shape. Each seemed formed of a centre-piece with seven long arms on either hand, like colossal hat-racks, with which the first published accounts compared them. Even after laying them bare, the energetic excavator had great difficulty in disinterring them, and was mortified at hearing the precious bronzes split and crack as the sun dried up the earth in which they had lain buried during so many centuries. According to the explorer's ground plan, the platforms mark the entrances to the courtyard of a noble palace, having two entrances on the north-east and two others on the north-west. The bronzes arrived at the British Museum at the beginning of August last. There they met with an enthusiastic welcome, and no less naturally called forth much speculation as to their nature and use. To Mr. Ready, the ingenious artificer of the department at the British Museum, whose task it was to see to the cleansing of the fragments, piecing them together, and nailing them with the original bronze nails on wood of the same thickness as that which underlay the plates thus fastened, belongs the merit of solving the riddle. He was the first to see that the bronze plates of the larger of the two monuments had formed the coverings of an enormous pair of rectangular folding doors, each about twenty-two feet in height and six feet broad, which had evidently turned on pivots, and were held up at the top by strong rings fixed in the masonry. The body of the doors was of wood three inches thick, as measured by the nails, which are found to be clinched a little more than that distance from the heads, the overplus being just the thickness of the bronze plates themselves, which is about one sixteenth of an inch. Each door revolved on a circular post, about a foot in diameter. Each post had a pivot at the bottom. The pivots are at the Museum, but the sockets in which they turned were unfortunately left behind. The bronze plates are about eight feet long. They were nailed horizontally across each door, but, allowing for their extension round the post, the total length across each leaf was but six feet. What is technically termed the "style" of each leaf was also overlaid with a bronze edging, which overlapped the door by about a couple of inches. On the right it is cut plain, but is indented on the side overlapping the back of the doors. The smaller pair of gates is much more decayed than the other. Its designs represent hunting scenes, and it belongs to the same reign as the larger, whose inscriptions are those of Shalmaneser II. The representations on the plates of both pairs are in the repoussé style. Those on the plates of the great gates depict Shalmaneser's battles, sieges, triumphal processions, the tortures inflicted on his prisoners, and his worship of the gods. The bronze plates covering the "styles" of the doors are also engraved with historical inscriptions, of which, reserving for another time his account of the extremely numerous and interesting designs chased on the doors themselves, Mr. Pinches gave the general purport. The record on the "styles," he observed, though somewhat fuller than that on the black obelisk, and than the Kurkh and Bull inscriptions, is very carelessly executed, even the chronological order of events having been to some extent inverted. The new document begins with Shalmaneser's Babylonian campaign, when he went to help King Marduku-Suma-Iddin against that Babylonian Monarch's revolted brother. Next, it places his war in the region of Mount Ararat, followed by that against Gozan, and his triumph over Akhuni, King of Borsippa, which paved the way for his conquest of Syria and Palestine. A critical comparison of all the sources proves, however, that the Ararat campaign came first, and then his expeditions against Akhuni and the Babylonian war. In concluding, Mr. Pinches held out the hope of identifying, in his future paper on the bas-reliefs (which greatly exceed in number those in the Nimroud Gallery in the British Museum), some Jewish faces of the ninth century before Christ. It is certain that, as he remarked, this wonderful monument cannot fail to be of great use to the ethnologist, as well as to the philologist and the antiquary.

The late Mr. George Smith's excellent summary of the "History of Assyria," published by the Christian Knowledge Society, tells us the events of Shalmaneser II.'s reign, from B.C. 860 to B.C. 824. He continued and maintained the conquests of his father Assur-nazir-pal, the builder of the palace at Nimroud, who had marched his army to the Mediterranean seacoast, andexa cted homage from Tyre and Sidon. The military expeditions of Shalmaneser II. likewise conducted him into Syria, and led to the series of conflicts related in the Second Book of Chronicles, in which Israel and Judah became fatally involved, but at a considerably later period. This circumstance gives a share of Biblical interest to the actions delineated in the bronze sculptures of which we present some Illustrations. They show the King with his army on the march; warriors standing in two-horse chariots, like those of Homer's heroes at the siege of Troy, the horses led by footmen; the King riding on horseback, wearing a loose robe and cap, with attendant eunuchs before and behind him, and men carrying his bows and quivers, wading across the River Tigris. Then, in the piece below, the King appears standing to offer sacrifices upon an altar; the captain of his guard is behind him, with soldiers who are bringing a slaughtered bull and a live ram for the offering. There are four conical stones, the well-known emblems of a common object of Eastern nature-worship; there is a sacred grove of trees, with a lodge or temple in the background, and the guardian priest is talking with the King's herald or secretary, who may perhaps be asking leave to approach or enter the sanctuary. The nethermost scroll would seem to represent the King's servants cutting an inscription on the rock, and lopping a few branches of the trees, to commemorate his visit to the foreign shrine. This was situated, most likely, in Northern Syria, and there would be a motive of policy for thus recording the pious regard of Shalmaneser for the divinities worshipped by the nations over whom his ambition sought to reign. The alabaster chest, three feet long and two feet high, which contained three alabaster tablets, all covered with inscribed history of the reign of Assur-nazir-pal, is represented at the top of the page. A ground-plan of Mr. Rassam's excavations at Balawat is also furnished, and we may expect the publication of his own account of them, as well as Mr. Pinches' further interpretation of their historical import.

The executive committee of the Kent and Sussex Labourers' Union has resolved to accept the offer of the Canadian Government to devote upwards of 5000 acres of land to the locked-out agricultural labourers.

A return has been issued which shows that the number of plaints entered in 1877 in all the county courts of England and Wales was 1,024,826, of which number 392,429 were for sums exceeding forty shillings, 569,320 for sums exceeding five shillings and not exceeding forty shillings, 61,950 for sums exceeding one shilling and not exceeding five shillings, and 1127 for sums not exceeding one shilling. The total number of persons imprisoned during the year was 5088; and of that number 2241 were imprisoned in respect of sums over forty shillings, 2791 for sums exceeding five shillings and not exceeding forty shillings, twenty six for sums exceeding one shilling and not exceeding five shillings, there being no case of imprisonment for a sum not exceeding one shilling.

LINDEN VELVET OZONID.
The perfection of these splendid Velveteens is so apparent, and their superiority to every other kind so undeniable, that numberless imitations are produced in this country under different names; but not one is fit to compare, either in finish, colour, durability, or effect with the patent LINDEN VELVET OZONID. These Velveteens are not distinguishable from the rich silk velvets which they are made to represent. 2s. 6d., 2s. 11d., 3s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. 6d. per yard.—CHAPMAN'S.

OLIENNE.
Is a Combination Cloth, or it can be used singly, to suit the taste of the wearer. The plain material is a substantial fabric, with a bright satin surface, while the fancy has a very tiny woven pattern distributed over it, resembling the stitch known as herring-boning. It is promised a large share of patronage for the coming season, and will be most useful for transition costume; 26in. wide, 3s. 6d. per yard.

SERGES.
Varieties in Serges will form another Novelty in Dress Fabrics this season, and, as to colour, every shade and tone in green will be worn, with an infinitesimal dash of bright colour, such as garnet, maize, or blue, introduced, which imparts a warm and cheerful appearance to this otherwise sober-looking material. These are called HEATHER MIXTURES. The OLD ENGLAND SERGES, so called from the peculiar rough unfinished surface, make up into handsome dresses. There are very cheap Serges also in the accepted colours—Navy Blue, Black, and Brown—which for durability remain unsurpassed at the price. Very fine Estamenes, 1s. 1d. per yard, superior quality. Heathers, 1s. 3d.; other qualities, 7½d. to 1s. per yard.
CHAPMAN'S, Notting-hill.

FRENCH MERINOS.
Merinos have become so associated with every idea of utility and beauty perfected in a woollen dress mate ial, that it seems almost superfluous to remind my patrons that these useful fabrics are, if possible, better than ever. My Stock represents every phase and tone of colour that is now worn. First quality, 2s. 11½d.; second ditto, 1s. 11½d. per yard.

FRENCH TWILLED FLANNELS.
Twilled flannel is now a recognised material for dresses, and very pretty and useful they are. For winter wear the double milled goods are recommended as being extra warm, particularly for children. The novel tones of colour that are fashionable this season have all been produced in these beautiful goods. All are perfectly fast colours. 30in. wide, 1s. 6d. and 1s. 11½d. per yard.—CHAPMAN'S, NOTTING-HILL, W.

WINTER SKIRTINGS.
These useful and indispensable fabrics are now in great request. All the new designs are prepared for distribution. Those in the best style will be found strikingly pretty and effective. The lines or stripes are raised in fine silken knots, in various shades of a light colour on a dark ground. Thus—a myrtle green will have a stripe of very pale green, with a knotted line of cardinal red and sage on either side, or the same colourings will be mixed on a navy blue or seal-brown ground. Then there are endless varieties in pretty useful mixtures, suitable for all requirements, and at all prices. Another novelty in skirtings for this season are Tartan Mixtures arranged longitudinally. These are most stylish, and the plain and rough-threaded Skirtings well merit distinct n. An excellent and varied assortment that no one can fail to make a selection from. 1s. to 6s. per yard.
Complete Sets of Patterns forwarded to all Parts of the Globe same day as Receipt of Order.

THE LORD MAYOR'S PROCESSION CROSSING LONDON BRIDGE.

NEW BOOKS.

Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin have published their "Illustrated Edition" of the Rev. Canon Farrar's Life of Christ, a book which has, since its first appearance in 1874, gone through twenty-three editions, and has gained an abiding place in the highest class of that department of English popular literature devoted to sacred themes. After such emphatic confirmation of the decided public approval with which this important work of evangelical history was greeted, it would be superfluous to criticise its method and style of execution, or to discuss the objections still entertained by many thoughtful readers to any attempt, however learned, skilful, and reverential, to recast the New Testament narrative in a literary composition of modern form. Canon Farrar must be admitted to have performed this task as well as it could have been done upon the plan which had been laid down, and with such materials as were extant; though it may appear to some, who are much accustomed to historical studies, that the result is to show the inapplicability of ordinary modes of inquiry to the examination of the facts referred to, having regard to the nature of the documents in hand. There can, however, be no question of the great interest and value of a large amount of collateral information which Canon Farrar has brought to bear, from extensive and various researches, upon the surrounding circumstances of our Saviour's earthly lot in Palestine under the Roman Empire. His work demands for this purpose a serious and attentive perusal, accompanying that of the Gospels, to which it furnishes an instructive commentary from the archæological, topographical, and exegetical standpoints. The book is rendered far more useful to that end, as well as extremely beautiful and attractive, by the magnificent series of pictorial illustrations with which it is now supplied in the present edition. Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin have spared no cost or care in preparing this noble volume. They intrusted to Mr. F. Mason Good the service of taking original photographs in the Holy Land, which he visited on that errand; while the Rev. S. S. Lewis, Fellow of Corpus Christi, superintended the copying and engraving of sculptures, coins, and gems, and other relics of antiquity. The illustrations, numbering five or six hundred, consist mostly of woodcuts interspersed with the text, but some views of scenery are of full-page size. No attempt has been made to design any fresh artistic and ideal representations of the persons of Christ and His disciples; but a few of the most ancient sculptures, and paintings in Greek or Oriental manuscripts, which show the primitive conception of grouping the figures, in such actions as "The Raising of Jairus' Daughter," or "The Miraculous Draught of Fishes," have been copied in reduced outline. This moderate and subordinate use of fine-art creations, eschewing all those which belong to the later ages of the Roman Catholic Church, may be deemed preferable to the copious introduction of Italian Renaissance designs, those of Raffaele and others, majestic and graceful as they are, in Mr. Murray's edition of the New Testament; but it would perhaps have been still better to exclude all pictures of our Lord from a book for Protestant English readers. The views of places in Judea and Galilee, and ruins of buildings, of the towns and cities, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Nazareth, Tiberias, the supposed sites of Bethsaida and Capernaum, and many localities of hallowed associations, contribute the better part of the Illustrations; besides many others which exemplify the customs, dress, manners, and habits of the people in that country, less changed than among the nations of Christendom. Maps, plans, and diagrams assist the topographical explanations, and there are many small drawings of furniture, implements, and utensils of daily life, which help the reader to a correct knowledge of things mentioned in the Gospel narrative, or in the discourses and conversations reported of Christ.

The second volume of the New Testament Commentary, edited by the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, of which also Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin are the publishers, has now made its appearance. We noticed, about eighteen months since, the publication of the first volume, containing the Four Evangelists, with an introduction by Bishop Ellicott, and with commentaries on St. Matthew, Mark, and Luke, by the Rev. Dr. E. H. Plumptre, and by the Rev. H. W. Watkins on St. John. The present volume consists of the Acts of the Apostles, with commentary by Dr. Plumptre; and the Epistles of St. Paul to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians, with commentaries by the Rev. W. Sanday, by Dr. Plumptre, and by the Rev. Teignmouth Shore. This portion of the New Testament is certainly that which most needs the aid of a judicious theological exposition; and we cannot doubt that the esteemed clergymen to whose hands it was here committed, following their eminent predecessors, Dr. Lightfoot, Dr. Vaughan, Dean Stanley, and others, have done all that could be expected to render the full meaning of St. Paul clearly intelligible, and to remove misconceptions and hindrances in the study of his authentic writings. It should always be remembered that these, after all, constitute the oldest in date, and the most immediately Apostolic, of the Christian Scriptures in our possession; that they have a peculiar impress of originality and genuineness, not surpassed by any other ancient literature; and that they are the unquestionable documents of the earliest form of Christian doctrine and practice. Every contribution, therefore, to the better understanding of this part of the New Testament, is even more valuable than the more elaborate work of Canon Farrar above noticed; and it does equal credit to the same publishers that they have procured its compilation for the benefit of their countrymen in the present times of eager religious discussion.

We have lately renewed, upon the occasion of receiving, from Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington, the beautiful illustrated edition of "The Fern Paradise," our former expressions of admiration for that work, and for its predecessor, "The Fern World." The same author, Mr. Francis George Heath, an enthusiastic and accomplished observer of the loveliest forms of wild and free vegetable growth in his native country of Great Britain, but more especially in the West of England, has now produced a third book of that class, which merits an equal degree of popular favour. It is entitled Our Woodland Trees, and is a worthy companion of the preceding delightful volumes, being adorned in like manner with exquisitely fine coloured lithographs, representing the leaves of trees with their minutest veining, perfectly accurate in drawing, and life-like to a charming degree, as well as many wood engravings of forest scenery and other landscape, groves and glades and single trees—a store of summer beauties to be enjoyed by the winter fireside. The text, of which these pictures supply most agreeable illustrations, is a discourse, first, upon the life of the tree, one of the most interesting topics of natural history; next, upon the romantic paths of the New Forest in Hampshire, with a nearer ramble to Epping Forest, which also repays the visitor; thirdly, upon the cultivation of certain trees in London and other towns, in the Parks, open roads, and private gardens of a city or its suburbs; and, finally, we have a brief account, but sufficiently precise, of sixty different species—oaks, elms, and beeches, the ash, the chestnut, the lime, the plane, maple, and sycamore, the willow, the poplars, the birch, the yew, the firs, pines, and larches, the hedge-trees, the orchard-trees, and many others familiar to English eyes. Such a book as this has long been wanted; and it should be, together with the book of Ferns and Mr. F. E. Hulme's Familiar Wild Flowers, in the possession of all those persons living in town who love the country best, and who desire to keep up their happy remembrance of rural nature. We have no doubt there are several hundred thousand of such residents in London and the other great towns of England and Scotland at all seasons of the year; and we sand them to Mr. F. G. Heath and several recent authors of the same class for a certain amount of literary consolation.

ART.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

In our article last week on the National Gallery, we mentioned incidentally the genial manner in which the information relating to the pictures acquired during the current year is conveyed. Some emendations or rather alterations in the old matter of the catalogue have, however, been made, which seem to us scarcely so well considered. Among the alterations to which we refer is the substitution of the family name or surname of several masters for their frequently better-known pseudonym, sobriquet, or nick-name. It need not be said that no personal names are more difficult to arrange alphabetically than those of the Old Masters. Frequently they were known in their own time, and have been known since, almost exclusively by nicknames. For instance, Masaccio, "dirty Thomas," was so called on account of his slovenly habits; Giorgione, "big George," was an allusion to his fine, handsome person; whilst Pinturicchio was "the little painter;" Giovanni da Fiesole was styled "Fra Angelico," on account of the number of angels which the good frate introduced into his pictures, as "Uccello" derived his name from his fondness for introducing birds, and Garofalo from the gilliflower monogram in his foregrounds; "Guercino" owed that appellation to his squint, whilst the more flattering designation, "l'Ingegno," was given in acknowledgment of Aloisi's cleverness. Sometimes the name was due to the painter's office or order, as Sebastiano del Piombo, "of the Lead," in reference to the office he held of keeper of the leaden seals, with which the Papal bulls were stamped; and Domenichino, or "the little Dominican." But as frequently the father's occupation gave the cognomen, as Tintoretto, "the dyer;" l'Ortolano, "the gardener;" Andrea del Sarto, "of the tailor;" and Ghirlandaio, in allusion to the art of his father, the goldsmith, in making garlands. Very often, also, the painter derived his name from his native place, or the place he last hailed from, or where he was best known, as il Pordenone, or the Pordenonese; Parmegiano, "the little Parmesan;" Perugino, "the little Perugian;" Spagnoletto, "the little Spaniard." It is not easy, either, to arrange many compound names alphabetically—such as Melozzo da Forli, Guido Reni, Don Diego de Silva y Velasquez, Rembrandt Hermanszoon van Ryn.

The principle adopted in the changes made in the new catalogues is to class the works under the artist's family or surname. Thus Raphael appears under Sanzio, Titian under Vicellio, Giorgione under Barbarelli, Guido under Reni, Michael Angelo under Buonarotti, Francia under Raibolini, Moretto da Brescia under Bonvicino, Claude under Lorraine, Spagnoletto under Ribera. To persons familiar with the nomenclature of the old masters this may be an advantage; and persons less well informed are directed to the surnames by cross references from the more popular names. The principle is not, however, consistently pursued. For example, the names Tintoretto, Masaccio, Veronese, Angelico, Del Sarto, Caravaggio, Correggio, Garofalo, Guercino, l'Ortalano, Parmegiano, Perugino, Pinturicchio, Sebastiano del Piombo, Pordenone, and others are retained; whilst there are no cross references from their respective surnames. To avoid this discrepancy we think it would be, on the whole, better in all cases to give the biographical notice under the popularly known name, and to give the less well-known surname where there is the least possibility of mistake, as a cross reference merely.

Before concluding, we would join in the complaint made by many of our contemporaries against closing the national collection so great a part of the year. On two days a week the public is rightly excluded for the sake of a few copyists, whose generally useless and unintelligent, and frequently decidedly mischievous, operations might be conducted equally well, as they are in the galleries of Italy, France, and other countries, on the days when the gallery is open, without appreciable hindrance from, and with little impediment to, the visitors. Not content, however, with thus virtually closing the gallery one third of the year, the authorities hermetically seal it one whole month—the month of October. Such a custom, even when the gallery was in its infancy, was not excusable; but now that it is fast becoming worthy of this great and wealthy nation—now that it is indeed one of the most important in Europe—such a custom is little short of scandalous. When we see from the Official Report that the number of visitors last year ranged from 44,000 to 190,000 per month, we may conceive (taking only the smallest monthly attendance as approximately what would be the attendance were the gallery open in October) how great must have been the inconvenience and disappointment to the masses unacquainted with the arrangement—attending this closing the doors an entire month. It not only unfairly deprives hosts of tax-paying provincials of the only opportunity they have of seeing the collection—the opportunity they have after harvest time; but it is to the last degree discourteous to many classes of Continental visitors, who come to London in larger numbers during the month of October than during any other part of the year, and in regard to whom we ought, if only for the sake of our amour propre, to endeavour to support our recent pretentions to national taste. It is also still more discourteous to our nearer relations, the American visitors, half of whom—those who make the "grand tour" in the summer instead of the winter—pass through London during October, like a flight of swallows, on their way back to "the other side."

There is no gallery in Europe where such discourtesy is shown. With or without a passport (or, at the worst, with an easily procurable introduction) an Englishman has only to present himself to gain admission at any time into any public gallery abroad, and even into almost any private gallery, though his presence must occasionally be more or less inconvenient. This custom at the National Gallery is not paralleled in any other great public resort even in England: there is nowhere such a continuous wholesale exclusion of students, amateurs, provincials, foreigners, and public at large. Nor is there any substantial reason whatever for such exclusion. During the recent recess nothing was done beyond cleaning the windows and the floors, dusting the pictures, and making a few trifling alterations; nothing which might not have been done in any odd hours, morning or evening, or on "students' days." No one would deprive the director and secretary of their holiday. But, even if it were absolutely necessary they should both have their holiday together during the month of October, and it were impossible to provide a responsible substitute for either, the pictures could come to no harm in their absence; for the gallery is in charge of a permanently-attached force of police, consisting of two inspectors, one sergeant, and sixteen constables, to say nothing of a staff of porters and assistant porters. We purposely abstain from advancing the strong arguments that might be adduced, and which are beginning to be advanced by enlightened and liberal clergymen of the Church of England, in favour of opening the gallery free on Sundays for the moral and intellectual recreation of working men, some of whom spend their Sunday afternoons so unprofitably in the neighbouring Trafalgar-square. We purposely abstain from any remark on that head: it will all be settled in good time by public opinion. But we do contend that it is high time the gallery should not be closed for a month at a time, and on so large a proportion of the week-days of the year.

The Prince of Wales's Indian Collection is, it is stated, to be exhibited in the Science and Art Museum, Edinburgh, on the return of the collection from Paris.

Her Majesty has commanded that the ancient tapestries of Holyrood Palace shall be restored at the Royal Windsor Tapestry Works.

Earl Sydney, Lord Lieutenant of Kent, presided on Tuesday night at an inaugural banquet in connection with the new science and art schools at Bromley, Kent, and referred to the encouragement to art afforded by several members of the Royal family. Mr. Talbot, M.P. for Oxford University, said that, while not wishing to cast any slur upon modern science and art, or to suggest that any of the wonderful inventions of the present age were superfluous, he would recall to their minds the fact that the great masters of antiquity laid down rules in science and art—models and principles which we, in the nineteenth century, were happy to follow.

A meeting was held on Monday at Mercers' Hall for the purpose of formally constituting the "City and Guilds of London Institute for the Advancement of Technical Education." The meeting was, in fact, the first held by the board of governors which the provisional committee of the guilds had recommended should be constituted as the supreme governing body of the new institute. This body consists of representatives from the subscribing livery companies, nominees from the Court of Common Council, the Lord Mayor, and other City officials, with a president and twelve vice-presidents. The first business was the election of the council, which consists of members elected by the board and other governors nominated by the contributing companies, or by the Common Council. The council, after their appointment, elected as their chairman Lord Selborne, who has acted as chairman of the provisional committee for the last year; they then proceeded to select the executive committee of the council, which will in future be the real working board of the institute, and is composed, like the other two bodies, partly of elected members and partly of nominees. Mr. Bramwell, the deputy-chairman of the provisional, became the chairman of the executive committee. This formal business over, the committee took into consideration the report of the provisional committee, and finally decided to prepare a scheme thereon which might be laid before an early meeting of the council for their approval. The amount of available income promised is £12,000.

The picture of "The Vintage Festival—Ancient Rome," by Mr. Alma-Tadema, is being exhibited at Messrs. Gladwell's gallery, Gracechurch-street.

A marble monumental bust of Canon Conway, executed by Mr. R. C. Bell, has been placed in a handsome marble niche prepared to receive it in the south wall of St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, and was unveiled last Saturday by the Duke of Buccleuch.

Messrs. Deighton and Dunthorne, of High Holborn, have opportunely published two lithographic bust portraits, about half lifesize, of the Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise.

Some scriptural compositions of large size, by distinguished German artists, exhibited by means of artificial light at the back, thus forming effective transparencies, are on view at the Westminster Aquarium, and are much superior to ordinary productions of the kind.

The first of a series of water-colour exhibitions, under the auspices of the Scottish Society of Painters in Water Colours, has been opened at Glasgow, in a gallery in West Nile-street, which has been specially fitted up for the purpose. The collection contains 172 drawings.

A Fine-Art and Industrial Exhibition will be held in York next year, to open on May 1 and close Oct. 31. The exhibition will include paintings in oil, water-colour drawings, manufactures, machinery, natural products, antiquities, &c. The Archbishop of York is president.

The Council-General of the Seine has passed a resolution against the demolition of the Exhibition building in the Champ de Mars, and requests the Prefect of the Seine to negotiate with the State the exchange of the Champ de Mars for a piece of ground for manœuvres outside the city walls.

A statue of Rabelais is to be erected in the city of Tours.

Lord Methuen, Grand Master of the Wilts Freemasons, has been presented with a pair of silver candelabra of the value of 600 guineas, on his having completed his twenty-fifth year of presiding over the Freemasons of Wiltshire, an event on which Prince Leopold congratulated him by letter.

Mr. Gladstone was present last Monday evening at the opening of an institute and reading-room at Buckley, a village not far from the right hon. gentleman's residence at Hawarden. He spoke of the various kinds of combination in vogue at the present day. Of friendly societies he observed that they should be based upon principles of sound economical calculations; and of trades unions, that it was essential that those who entered them should respect the liberty of those who did not join them. One of the features of the new institute led Mr. Gladstone to speak of the advantages derived from the practice of debating in such associations.

A meeting of the supporters of the Mary Carpenter Memorial Fund was held in Bristol on the 7th inst.—the Mayor presiding—for the purpose of receiving the report of the committee. In answer to the committee's appeal, nearly £2500 has been subscribed. With this sum £80 has been spent upon a memorial tablet in Bristol Cathedral; a Working Boys' Home had been built in St. Philip's, capable of accommodating forty boys who have no home, or wish for a better one; and also for twenty working women and girls, whose means will not allow them to procure such advantages for themselves. The home will be conducted on the same principles as the home which Miss Carpenter established in Bristol and worked in until her death. The Boys' Home cost £600, the women's home nearly £500, and each has been endowed with £300. The report was adopted, and committees appointed to superintend the working of the homes.

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

"Le Nozze di Figaro," as given on Thursday week, included the first assumption here of the character of Figaro by Herr Behrens, who sang with much effect, particularly in the aria, "Non piu andrai," and acted with considerable animation, although perhaps scarcely realising to the full the light-hearted and flippant gaiety of the character. It was, however, a generally artistic performance. Madame Pappenheim gave the music of the Countess with much genuine feeling, especially in the aria "Dove sono;" and Madame Hélène Crosmond was a very efficient representative of Susanna, both dramatically and musically. Her by-play in the scenes with Cherubino was very good, and she gave her principal air, "Deh vieni," with much effect. Mdlle. Bauermeister was to have been the Marcellina, but was prevented by indisposition, her place having been taken, in the later scenes only, by a not very efficient representative. Madame Trebelli, as often before, sang the music of Cherubino charmingly, and was encored in "Voi che sapete." Signor Rota was the Count; Signor Zoboli, Bartolo; and Signor Rinaldini, Basilio—as heretofore.

Bizet's "Carmen" seems to retain its power of attraction, having been announced on Saturday for the seventh time during the present series of performances.

On Monday Flotow's "Marta" was performed, with the brilliant singing of Mdlle. Marimon as the Lady Enrichetta (Marta). Her romance, "Qui solo vergin rosa" ("The Last Rose of Summer") was encored, as was the Spinning quartet; and the romance "M'appari," for Lionello, in which character Signor Carrion sang with considerable effect. Madame Trebelli's Nancy was, as often before, a valuable feature in the cast, which included Herr Behrens as Plumketto and Signor Zoboli as Lord Tristano.

On Tuesday "Il Trovatore" was the opera, with Madame Pappenheim as Leonora, Madame Trebelli as Azucena, Signor Gillandi as Manrico, and Signor Mendioroz as the Count. In the subordinate character of Ferrando Signor Mancini made his first appearance here, and was well received.

Other repetition performances were announced for Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday; and this (Saturday) evening Mdlle. Ambre is to appear, for the first time here, as Violetta in "La Traviata."

The quartet party at this week's Monday Popular Concert was the same as at the opening performance of the new season last week, having consisted of Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries and Zerbini, and Signor Piatti. M. Louis Brassin, the Belgian pianist, made his second appearance here, and again played with much success—his solo on this occasion having been Bach's "Italian Concerto," the encore to which was replied to by playing Schubert's "Impromptu" in E flat. In Beethoven's great trio in B flat the pianist was associated with Madame Néruda and Signor Piatti. Miss Emma Thursby was the vocalist, and Sir J. Benedict the accompanist.

At the sixth of the present series of Crystal Palace concerts—on Saturday afternoon—M. Louis Brassin, the eminent Belgian pianist, made his second appearance there and played a concerto of his own composition, a work well calculated for the manifestation of his highly-trained executive powers. Of the three movements into which the concerto is divided—"Allegro con fuoco," "Andante," and "Allegro molto vivace"—the last was perhaps the most effective: each portion pleased much by its skilful construction and clever instrumentation. The solo portion was finely played by the composer, as also were two unaccompanied pieces, a Notturno of Chopin, and Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise." The clever overture entitled "The Maeque of Pandora," composed by the accomplished lady formerly known as Miss Alice Mary Smith, that to Cherubini's opera, "Elise," and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, were the other orchestral pieces. Mrs. Osgood and Mdlle. F. Keller were the vocalists. At this week's concert Beethoven's symphony in C minor is to be given, and, for the first time in England, the ballet music from M. Saint-Saëns's "Dalilah"—and Mr. George Magrath is to play Rubinstein's fourth pianoforte concerto (in D minor).

We could only briefly allude last week to the opening of the eighth season of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, which took place on the Thursday evening with a performance of "Elijah," conducted by Mr. Barnby. The chorus-singing was, as usual, exceedingly good, the great choral climax to the first part, "Thanks be to God," having produced a special effect. The principal solo music was distributed between Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington and Antoinette Sterling (encored in "O rest in the Lord"), Misses A. Sinclair and Dones, Mr. V. Rigby and Mr. Hilton, Mr. J. Thornton, and Mr. S. Smith having assisted in some of the concerted music. Mr Hilton appeared in replacement of Mr. Wadmore, whose sudden death, at a very early age, and at the beginning of a prosperous career, is a matter of wide-spread regret.

The second of this season's London Ballad Concerts took place on Wednesday evening at St. James's Hall, with a programme of the usual varied and attractive kind.

A series of Saturday evening concerts at St. James's Hall is to begin this week. Messrs. Ganz and Thouless are the conductors, and several eminent singers are announced to appear.

A concert of very special interest musically, and also of high importance on account of its purpose is to take place next Tuesday evening at St. James's Hall, conducted by Dr. Hans von Bülow. The object is to raise funds towards the increased expenditure of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind (at Upper Norwood), incurred by the enlarged scope and efficiency of that most valuable institution. Beethoven's symphony in C minor, a pianoforte sonata by the same composer, Dr. von Bülow's symphonic ballad "Des Sangers Fluch," and Liszt's "Danse Macabre," for piano and orchestra, are to be given, in addition to other pieces—Dr. von Bülow being the solo pianist. There is to be a grand orchestra of about eighty performers; and the concert deserves success on its own account, apart from its purpose.

The Borough of Hackney Choral Association, conducted by Mr. E. Prout, opens its new season on Monday evening, at the Shoreditch Townhall, with performances of Schumann's "Faust" music, a selection from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and other pieces—a programme of high and special interest.

Next year's Birmingham Festival is to take place on Aug. 26 and three following days; Sir Michael Costa will again be the conductor and Mr. R. Peyton orchestral steward.

It is stated that twenty-four meetings have been held in London, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Newcastle, and other towns in the country to consider the new Weights and Measures Act. Ten of these were of Chambers of Agriculture, three of Chambers of Commerce, and eleven of millers and corn-merchants. Twenty-two meetings voted for weight by the "cental," one voted for weight as in the Act, and one for weight by the 112 lb.

THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

A third Shakspearean tragedy was revived on Saturday, when Mr. Charles Dillon appeared as Othello. A more pathetic performance has been seldom witnessed, and the audience recognised him as an old favourite in the part. Mr. Dillon may be congratulated as having survived his competitors, and must now be regarded as our leading actor. In all phases of the character he manifested signs of greatness, but particularly in the third act, which throughout he interpreted with an artistic skill that was perfectly admirable, such was its finish and discriminative subtlety. Mr. Ryder was the Iago. Since Mr. Fechter's there has been no better, and it must be pronounced to be thoroughly satisfactory. Mr. Compton appeared as Cassio. Miss Wallis was respectable as Desdemona, and Mrs. Hermann Vezin properly energetic as Emilia. These artists, with Mr. Edgar as Brabantio and Mr. C. Tritton as Roderigo, sufficed to supply representatives for the principal characters, and the subordinate were respectably filled. It is probable that a better company than this cannot be assembled for the performance of legitimate pieces, and that we shall have to wait long for a better. The audience was numerous, and it is to be trusted will continue to be so during the whole period of this interesting experiment.

OLYMPIC.

The opportunity of morning performances is now beginning to be utilised by managers for the production of new pieces. They may thus be introduced without interfering with the general run of business, and if found capable of signal success be then retained on the stage for a permanence as regular evening performances. "A Republican Marriage" is the title of the new play, which is in five acts, the plot of which is a combination of several well-known incidents and characters, that are so treated as not to suffer much from the want of novelty. Marie de Courcelles, the heroine, is the daughter of a Count, and at the opening of the play is likely to become the victim of a democratic mob, who propose to sell her by auction. A witness of this disgraceful proceeding offers a gold snuff-box, and is accepted as her purchaser. Henri Duval, who passes for a mason, but is eventually proved to be a Marquis, acts toward the poor girl in the noblest manner, setting at nought the republican marriage which they had been compelled to submit to, and undertakes to restore her to her family as free as she was before its enforced celebration. Of course he wins her affections notwithstanding; and when in the sequel he turns out to be the nobleman whom her father had designed her to wed, she rejoices in her unexpected good fortune. The part of the heroine is well conceived by Miss Marion Terry, and acted with so much heart-felt pathos that she melts the audience to a tenderness almost equal to that which she herself displays. Mr. Henry Neville, as Duval, has a character that suits him admirably. Some comic parts also are well supported, and the scenes in which they appear give relief to the serious interest. Altogether, there is promise of success in the drama of "A Republican Marriage."

Messrs. David James and Thomas Thorne have returned to the Vaudeville, and again appeared in the comedy of "Our Boys," which has now been performed more than 1231 nights.

At the Alhambra has been revived Offenbach's spectacular opera "La Périchole," with Miss Emily Soldene as the heroine. The interest has been enhanced by the introduction of a new ballet, called "Les Sevillians," which does credit to the composer, M. G. Jacobi, and to Mdlles. Rosa and Richards, whose dancing commands admiration.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

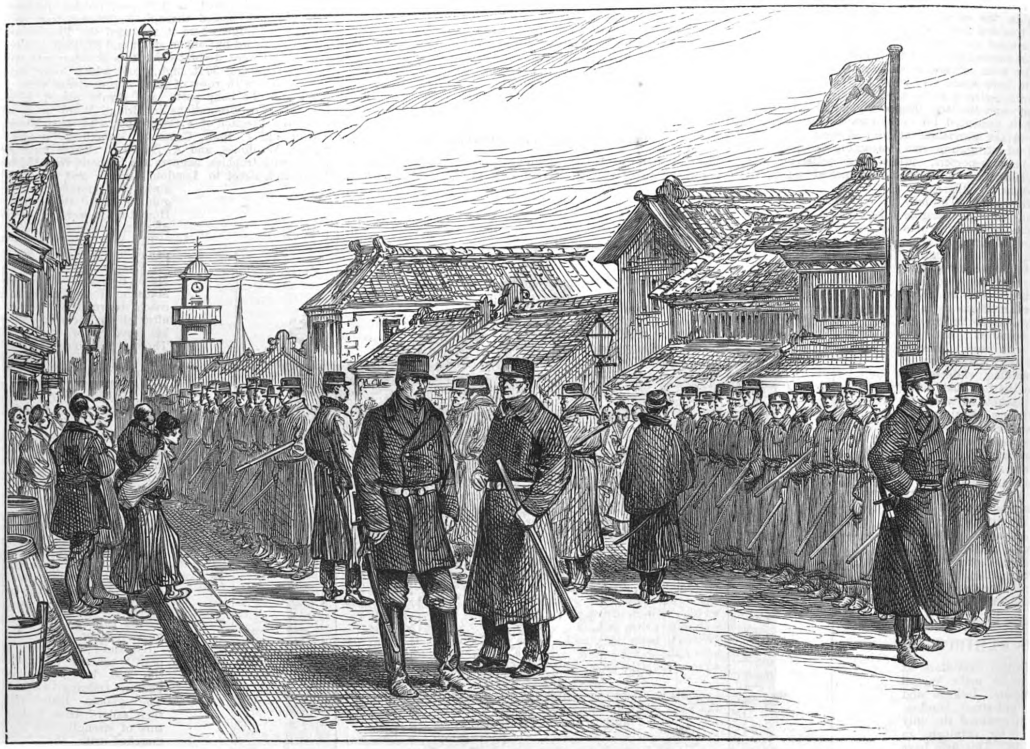
Spohr's Violin School (Boosey and Co.). This is a new edition of the greatest work extant on violin-playing, the author of which has not only taken high rank as a classical composer, but was also one of the most celebrated violinists of his time. The edition now referred to has been newly translated from the German by Florence A. Marshall, and edited and revised, with additional text, by Mr. Henry Holmes, himself a violinist of the first class. No doubt the task has been a labour of love, he having been one of the favourite pupils of the great master, whose excellent treatise is now presented in an improved form, and at a more accessible price than hitherto. The book is thoroughly comprehensive in its didactic portion and its practical exercises, and a careful study of it can scarcely fail to lead to the highest technical skill and the purest taste. Spohr's original preface—dated Cassel, 1832—is given, preceded by one by the editor; and there are diagrams of the violin and the bow, and of the position and attitude to be assumed by the player.

"Songs for Sailors" (Novello, Ewer, and Co.). This volume contains the well-known nautical poems of Dr. W. C. Bennett, set to music by Mr. J. L. Hatton. It is unnecessary now to speak in praise of the characteristic verses the merits of which have already obtained wide and general recognition. We have here only to deal with the music, on which the composer has very successfully impressed a bold national tone, in excellent keeping with the spirit of the poems, of which there are forty, in various styles, defiant, triumphant, pathetic, and humorous. Of course some of our naval victories are celebrated—among them being "Trafalgar," "The Nile," "Rooke in the Bay of La Hogue," "Hawke in Quiberon Bay," "Duncan at Camperdown," and "Rodney and De Grasse." The volume is in every respect a worthy pendant to the collection of the immortal sea-songs of Dibdin.

The Volunteer Service Gazette says that one Captain and nine Subalterns of volunteers resigned last week. Three of these officers held certificates of proficiency, one of them from a school of instruction. There were seven new appointments, so that there is a net loss of three officers.

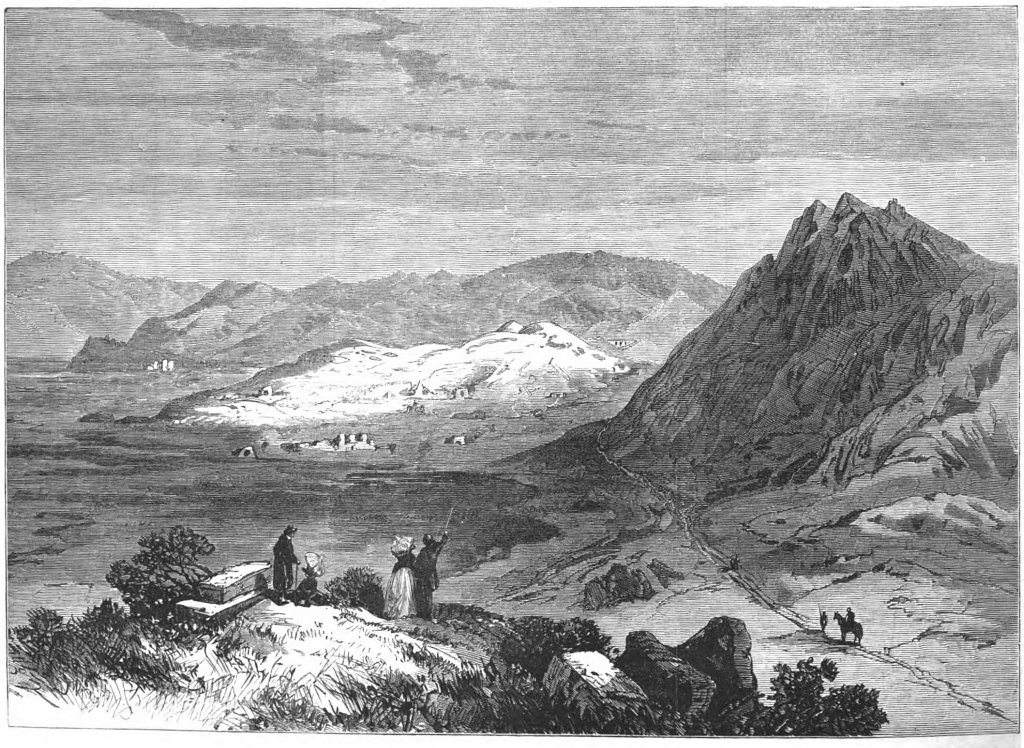
Lord Northbrook was present last Monday night at a banquet to the retiring Mayor of Winchester. Replying to the toast of the Houses of Parliament, he referred to the state of affairs in India and to Lord Beaconsfield's speech at the Mansion House. He remarked that he was responsible for the settlement of some of the difficulties which arose in 1876 between the Khan of Khelat and his nobles, but he had never contemplated in the arrangements which were then made the occupation of Quetta; indeed, he had always been opposed to such a step, and he also disagreed with other suggestions which had been made for the rectification of the North-Western frontier. He believed that our present frontier was unassailable, and to make any further advance into Afghanistan would be unwise. Our greatest difficulty on the frontier was in dealing with the independent tribes, and the further we advanced the greater this difficulty would become. He denied Lord Beaconsfield's assertion that the question of the North-Western frontier had been under the consideration of recent Indian Viceroys, and combated the idea of a Russian invasion of India in that direction.

THE LATE MR. SAMUEL PHELPS.



We have already recorded the decease of one of our best, if not greatest, actors on Wednesday, the 6th of this month, at Anson's Farm, Cospersall, near Epping, Essex. Mr. Samuel Phelps was born on Feb. 13, 1804, so that he was in his seventy-fifth year at the time of his death. He was the son of a wine merchant at Devonport, and received his education at the school of Dr. Samuel Reece, at Saltash. Having served his apprenticeship to a printer, he came to London in 1821, and was employed as a compositor on a newspaper; but his leisure evenings were devoted to amateur theatricals. A few years after he determined on becoming a professional actor, and joined the company of the York circuit, appearing at Wakefield on Oct. 29, 1827, as Belmont in "Jane Shore." In 1829 we find him playing at the Theatre Royal, Hull, being then engaged in the second business; but in 1833 he was employed as principal tragedian, performing occasionally in comic parts. During a period of nearly four years he acted at Belfast, Aberdeen, Dundee, Inverness, and other Scotch towns, and while in North Britain acquired that command of the Scottish dialect, which at a later date he displayed in the part of Sir Pertinax Macsycophant, perhaps the greatest character in his répertoire. In 1837 he was so remarkably successful at the Exeter theatre that Mr. Benjamin Webster was induced to offer him an engagement at the Haymarket, where he made his appearance on Aug. 28 of that year as Shylock in "The Merchant of Venice," Miss Huddart, afterwards Mrs. Warner, being Portia, and received distinguished applause. Mr. Macready having become anxious to secure his services for his Covent-Garden management, in October Mr. Phelps played Jaffier to his Pierre, and afterwards Othello to his Iago. At the end of the season he joined Mr. George Stephens, with Mrs. Warner, in an experiment at the Lyceum, undertaken with the view of breaking down the monopoly at the two patent houses, in regard to five-act plays. The tragedy of "Martinuzzi" was performed at that house, having been licensed as a three-act opera; but, after a few nights, the songs were omitted, and the curtain fell for the orthodox five times. Having thus shown that a coach-and-six could be driven through the Act of Parliament, the matter was referred to Sir Robert Peel, who entered sincerely into the views of the speculators; accordingly, the privileges enjoyed by Drury Lane and Covent Garden were in due time repealed. Mr. Phelps's name had now culminated in the ascendant, and he accompanied Macready to the former theatre, appearing as Adam, in "As You Like It." On the termination of his engagement, he found that the legitimate drama was without a home; and, taking advantage of Lord Mahon's Act, which had just passed the House of Lords, he, with Mrs. Warner, migrated to Sadler's Wells, and together they thus commenced a management which was destined to last eighteen years, during which thirty Shakspearean dramas were performed. It was opened on May 27, 1844, with "Macbeth," Phelps playing the guilty Thane, Mrs. Warner, his ambitious wife, and Mr. Henry Marston, Macduff—a cast which has never since been equalled. In 1846 Mrs. Warner retired from the theatre, and her place was afterwards supplied by Miss Addison, Miss Glyn, and Miss Atkinson, by whom Mr. Phelps's efforts were ably supported. During the same period Mr. Phelps, who was sole lessee as well as manager of Sadler's Wells, produced other Elizabethan dramas, including Webster's "Duchess of Malfi," in whose character Miss Glyn made a great hit. The tragedy of "Antony and Cleopatra" also afforded her a grand opportunity of which that eminent actress took the utmost advantage. Among the most costly of Mr. Phelps's Shakspearean productions was "Pericles," which he converted into a grand spectacle, and in which Miss Edith Heraud sustained with admirable aptitude the important part of Marina, the heroine. The success of this revival was extraordinary, extending nearly to a hundred nights. Mr. Phelps also brought out several new plays, principally by the late Rev. James White, paying him for one, "John Savile," four hundred pounds. From the management of the theatre he retired in March, 1862, but acted occasionally until November, when he finally took leave of the audience. In Shakspeare's more eccentric characters he showed exceptional merit; witness Bottom the Weaver, Justice Shallow, and Armado. He was subsequently engaged at Drury Lane by Mr. Chatterton, and appeared as Manfred, Faust, the Doge of Venice, and the King o' Scots. The remainder of his life was passed as a star actor at the Princess's, the Lyceum, the Gaiety, the Queen's, Astley's, and the Surrey. His profits during the last ten years from these engagements were considerable; and Mr. Phelps died a tolerably wealthy man. Full justice, however, has not been done to his extraordinary merits whether as actor or manager. In his personal habits Mr. Phelps was a recluse, seldom dining out of his own house, avoiding theatres as places of amusement, and shunning public banquets of all kinds. His habits were thoroughly domestic, and his respectability unimpeachable. Such was Phelps as an actor and a man; and his services to the cause of the Shakspearean drama exceeded those of any other British actor. His funeral took place on Wednesday at Highgate Cemetery: and never were obsequies deserving of more veneration and gratitude than those paid to the quondam manager of the humble theatre which became a temple of poetry under his influence and example. We believe that there is a probability of Sadler's Wells again passing into the hands of a competent conductor.

Our Portrait of Mr. Phelps is from a photograph by Messrs. Elliott and Fry, of Baker-street.



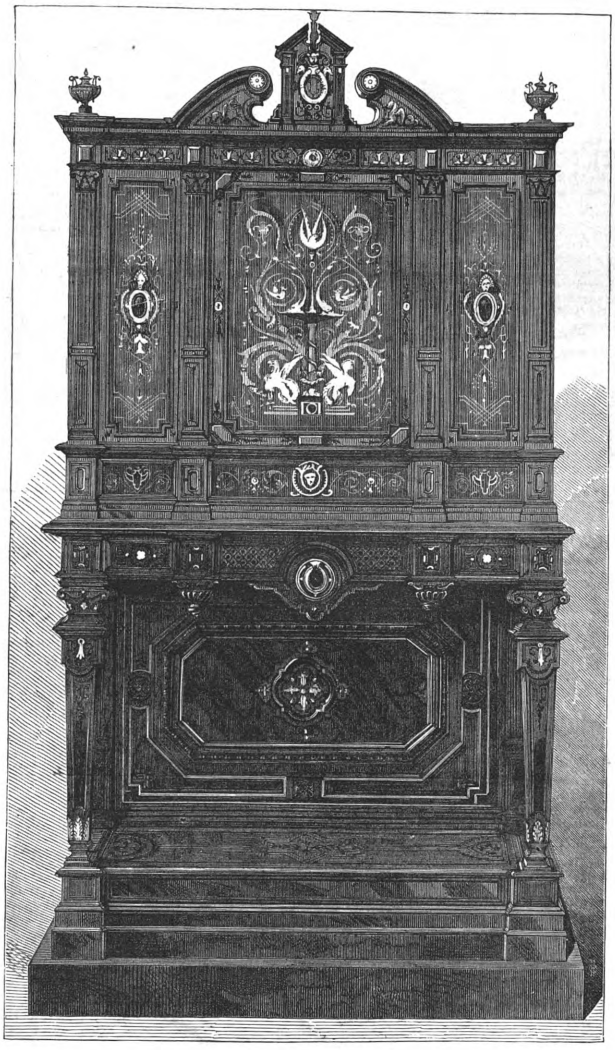
Lord Justice Christian, who previously to his elevation to the Court of Appeal in Dublin was a puisne Judge in the Irish Court of Common Pleas, has resigned his position, on the ground of increased difficulty of hearing.

The foundation-stone of a new convalescent hospital, to accommodate about eighteen children, has been laid recently by Mrs Mapleton, of Meanwood Vicarage, near Leeds. The site of the new buildings is on the high road between Meanwood and Moortown, and the architect is Mr. John Birch, of John-street, Adelphi.

Yesterday week the annual meeting of the Association for Promoting Secondary Education in Scotland was held in the Royal Hotel, Edinburgh. Sir Edward Colebrooke, M.P., who presided, said that the objects of the association had been promoted in the passing of the Endowed Schools Act and the eighteenth section of the Education Act last Session. Professor Laurie, secretary, read the report which stated that the committee are of opinion that, continuing to keep a watchful eye on the working of the Education Act, they might suspend calling for further subscriptions. They saw to what extent the new powers were taken advantage of throughout Scotland, and that their duty would be mainly one of vigilance. In the course of the proceedings, Professor Blackie said that the Scotch were in the habit of boasting at dinners and elsewhere that they were the best-educated people in the world. They had starved the schoolmasters and dragged down the Universities, asking the professors to do what it was a disgrace for them to do.

A MUSTER OF JAPANESE POLICEMEN.

THE SITE OF EPHESUS, ASIA MINOR.



JAPANESE POLICE, AND A FIRE.

The scene in a street of Yedo, which is represented by our well-known Artist, Mr. Wirgman, in the sketch we have engraved, represents an incident of the late Japanese Civil War. A certain number of the Yedo city policemen were draughted into the Mikado's army, and here they are seen mustering, in full view of the townsfolk, before starting for the campaign in the southern provinces. The ordinary appearance of this civil force, with their long overcoats belted and buttoned around the chest, their low-crowned hats and their gaiters, the staves carried by the rank and file, and the swords worn by their officers, is sufficiently practical; and they are said to have made very good soldiers. But we can readily believe the police of some other Japanese towns is not equally efficient; and the large Engraving called "A Fire in Japan," which is presented for our Extra Supplement this week, shows a rather scandalous amount of confusion. The street is full of struggling and screaming people, lantern-bearers, luggage-porters, idlers and pilferers, men, women, and children, some of them half naked, whom the awkward guardians of public safety are trying to drive away. The firemen, plying the hose of their engine as best they can, and aiming jets of water against the burning frames of the houses, which are lightly constructed of thin woodwork and paper, do all they know to stop the conflagration. Two or three Englishmen or Americans seem to be privileged lookers-on, in front of these active operators; and we observe men with axes climbing ladders, to cut away some portions of the frail building, while others come round by the first-floor outer gallery, with buckets of water to pour upon the flames. At the right-hand corner is a civic magistrate of some dignity, who is supposed to have the police and Fire Brigade under his orders; while a party of Japanese military, headed by a demonstrative young officer in spectacles, enter at the left-hand side, resolved to disperse the mob instantly, but terrifying a most respectable citizen by their sudden onset. The Engraving is from a sketch by Mr. Regamey, a French artist who has frequently contributed to our Journal.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

Among the British exhibitors at Paris we have to make special mention of Messrs. Jackson and Graham, of Oxford-street, London, who have been awarded the only "Grand Prix" for furniture in classes 17 and 18. This firm have in past Exhibitions attained the highest honours, receiving at Paris in 1855 the Gold Medal of Honour, and at Vienna in 1873 the "Ehren Diplom;" while the head of the firm has been decorated with the cross of the Legion of Honour, and, later, the present senior partner with the order of Francis Joseph. A special feature of their productions shown at Paris is that every article represents the ordinary manufacture of the firm. This manufacture is conducted on a very large scale. Aided by a "Corliss" engine in each of their two manufactories, together with all the most recent and best mechanical appliances, works in every style can be produced to an unlimited extent. In one year, besides their ordinary business, they furnished the Langham and Charing-Cross Hotels, and the Palace of the Viceroy of Egypt, near Cairo. Among their contributions to the Exhibition at Paris we must especially refer to the cabinet which is the subject of our Illustration. This beautiful upright cabinet is in the Italian Renaissance style, it is of exceeding beauty, and of marvellous execution. It is composed principally of figured ebony, thuya, box, and ivory, with panels of palm-wood, cut transversely. It is equally remarkable for its inlays, the harmonious blending of colours, and the exquisite engraving. The work seems, as the poet says,

> —garlanded with carven imageries—
> Innumerable of hues and splendid dyes.

PARIS EXHIBITION: CABINET BY MESSRS. JACKSON AND GRAHAM, LONDON (GRAND PRIX).

This exquisite cabinet was designed by Mr. Alfred Lormier. It has been purchased by Mr. H. A. Brassey, M.P. We may further notice a cabinet of the Oriental Greek character, composed of box-wood, ivory, ebony, and other woods. This, like the cabinet above mentioned, is of singular beauty. There was also a chimneypiece, in the Oriental Greek style, composed of box-wood, inlaid with ivory, palm-wood, purple, and other woods, surmounted by a garniture, consisting of a clock and pair of candelabra. The next object to be noticed was an escritoire, in the delicate style of the French Renaissance, composed of sandal and other woods, with lines and mouldings of ivory. This escritoire, designed by Mr. Prignot, has become the property of Mrs. Brassey. A "Juno" buffet, of ebony and ivory, was worthy of high praise for its originality of conception, elaboration of detail, yet quietness of effect. The subject of its panels are Juno, Venus, Minerva, the Earth, and the Ocean. These are surmounted by a pediment, in the shield of which is a peacock; the panels in the lower part inlaid with the lily, and those in the middle stage with a ship, the golden apple, the olive, and the rose, on a ground of subdued brown. Not less deserving of mention were a Vitrine, in the "Chippendale" style, for receiving objects of virtù; a "Bonheur du Jour," in the "Adams" style; an Encoigneur of ebony, of Italian character; a cabinet of especial merit, in the "Adams" style, with glass doors, for the display of precious objects; and, lastly, a chimneypiece of oak and ebony carving—each of which might claim a longer description, but that our space forbids.

Messrs. Jackson and Graham had undertaken to furnish and decorate the rooms in the "Lascelles House," which were used by the English juries during the Exhibition. Early English furniture was selected for the ground and the first floors, and furniture of the Queen Anne period for the second floors. The ground-floor room was furnished in Padouk wood, from Burmah. This was imported into England by the Indian Government, and was presented to Messrs. Jackson and Graham on the understanding that they would test its fitness and value for the manufacture of furniture. The whole exhibition, interesting and beautiful as it was, has added to the established reputation of the firm in Oxford-street.

THE RUINS OF EPHESUS.

The most renowned of the opulent Greek mercantile cities on the western coast of Asia Minor, one of the most important places of Apostolic missionary preaching and teaching in the earliest years of the Christian Church, the residence of St. Paul during several months, and of St. John for many years, is now a scene of mournful decay and desolation. Its ruins, more especially those of the theatre and of the great Temple of Diana, have lately been explored by Mr. J. T. Wood; and some remarkable fragments of their architecture and sculpture have been added to the collections in the British Museum. We have, upon former occasions, given a more particular description of the results of archæological research at the site of Ephesus; and our Special Artist, Mr. W. Simpson, has visited the spot to make Sketches of what is to be seen there. The View presented in our Engraving now published is one looking north, which may be recognised by those who have some acquaintance with the features of this locality; the sea, with the place of the ancient harbour, near the mouth of the river Cayster, would lie further to the left hand. The ground where the temple stood is now a large pool of water, from which a morass extends to the river. It is stated by Pliny that this ground was always marshy, and the foundations of the temple were laid upon a bed of rammed charcoal, which was expected to be firm and dry; but earthquakes and fires seem to have destroyed the whole city.

LORD MAYOR'S DAY.

Saturday last being the Ninth of November, the new Lord Mayor of London, Sir Charles Whetham, was conducted with a grand procession from Guildhall to Westminster Hall, to be presented by the Recorder to the Chief Baron of the Exchequer Court. The route taken by the procession was different from what has usually been followed, as it crossed London Bridge to the Borough, and passed through Southwark-street as far as Southwark Bridge, where it recrossed the Thames and proceeded westward by Cannon-street and St. Paul's-churchyard. The bridges were decorated for this occasion with triumphal arches of foliage, 30 ft. high, from which hung baskets of flowers, and with rows of small cypress-trees, with creeping plants up the lamp-posts, and shrubs placed in the side recesses. The decorations in Bridge Ward were arranged under the direction of a Committee, who were Messrs. R. P. Taylor and J. Bath, Common Councillers, Messrs. Henry Squire, W. Jones, and A. Dulacker. There were Venetian masts, with trophies, banners and festoons, from the corner of Fenchurch-street to London Bridge; and King William's statue was adorned with blue and gold. Messrs. J. Defries and Sons, of Houndsditch, were employed for the decorations here.

The new Lord Mayor, accompanied by the Rev. A. H. Lutman, his Chaplain, and the Sword and Mace Bearers, set out from the Mansion House in the old state coach, drawn by six horses, shortly after eleven o'clock, followed by his predecessor, Alderman Sir Thomas Scambler Owden, with a similar equipage. The procession was marshalled at Guildhall, whence it started punctually at noon, the City police leading the way. The band of the Royal Horse Artillery followed, and then came the corps of watermen, in picturesque costume, with the large banners of the City companies and of the past Sheriffs. Behind them were the bands of the Scots Guards and of the London Rifle Brigade, in which latter regiment a son of the Lord Mayor holds a commission. These preceded the Master, Wardens, and Court of the Glass-Sellers' Company, of which guild Mr. George Burt, the senior Sheriff, is a past Master. Following the carriage of these dignitaries came an interesting part of the pageant. A huge banner, with the motto, "England's Glory and Chief Support," ushered in the band and the 200 boys of the metropolitan training-ship Exmouth. The gallant little fellows, in their sailors' dress, looked the picture of strength and health; they marched with the greatest precision, and their band bore favourable comparison with any one in the show. They were led by Admiral Robertson, chairman of the Training-Ship Committee of the Metropolitan Asylums District Board, of which Mr. Sheriff Burt is a member, and by Captain Bourchier, R.N. The Exmouth lads were followed by an equally novel and interesting feature in the procession—namely, a life-boat of the Royal National Life-Boat Institution, fully equipped and manned, and mounted on its transporting-carriage, drawn by eight of Messrs. Mowlem and Burt's powerful cart-horses. The men were in their life-saving dress, with cork life-belts round their bodies, and each was in the position he would have occupied in a real errand of duty, some at the oars, one at the helm, and another making ready to throw out the line to the distressed vessel. This also brought out well-deserved applause. Then came the band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry and the carriages of the Master, Wardens, and officials of the Shipwrights' Company, to which both the Sheriffs belong. After them were the band of the 17th Lancers and the Farriers' Company, another guild of the senior Sheriff; and then followed the bands of the Hon. Artillery Company and of the 3rd London Rifles, preceding the Court of the Leathersellers' Company, of which the new Lord Mayor has been a leading member for over thirty years. The band of the Royal London Militia, and ex-Sheriff Sir John Bennett alone in an open carriage, having passed, there came the Epping Forest banner of the Corporation, borne by four foresters, and then the rangers of the Forest and the bearers of the Aldermen's banners. The state carriages of the Under-Sheriffs (Mr. Baxter and Mr. Godden) came next, and those of the officers of the Corporation of London, including the Common Serjeant, the Town Clerk, the Remembrancer, and the Secondary. The equipages of Mr. Sheriff Bevan and Mr. Sheriff Burt next attracted much notice; these were succeeded by the mounted trumpeters of the Royal Horse Artillery. Of the twenty-six Aldermen of the City of London only one (Mr. Alderman Staples) took part in the procession. The Recorder, Sir Thomas Chambers, followed the solitary Alderman, and preceded the late Lord Mayor (Sir Thomas S. Owden), who met with a very cordial reception in the City. The band of the Household Cavalry rode next, and then, preceded by the City Marshal on horseback and by the City Trumpeters, came the new Lord Mayor in his State carriage. The Chief Magistrate had a hearty greeting along the route.

Leaving Guildhall, the procession went through the Poultry and past the Mansion House, where the balcony was filled with friends of the new and the retiring Lord Mayors; thence up Cornhill and Leadenhall-street, through Billiter-street into Fenchurch-street, along Gracechurch-street, over London Bridge, through the Borough, back again over Southwark

Bridge into the City, and thence by Cannon-street, Ludgate-hill, Fleet-street, and the Strand to Westminster, returning by the Thames Embankment. On the way back the pageant was joined by Lady Whetham (the Lady Mayoress) and her daughters, and by Mrs. Burt and Mrs. Bevan, the wives of the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex.

On arriving at Westminster, the civic dignitaries were escorted into the Hall, where the Lord Chief Baron, Baron Cleasby, and Baron Pollock, who wore their full robes of state, waited to receive him. The Recorder, Sir Thomas Chambers, Q.C., with a suitable address, presented the new Lord Mayor to Lord Chief Baron Sir Fitzroy Kelly and the other Judges; Sir Fitzroy Kelly spoke in reply, congratulating the Lord Mayor and the City. The procession returned to Guildhall by way of the Thames Embankment. The Lord Mayor's banquet was attended by the Prime Minister, the Lord Chancellor, two Secretaries of State, and many persons of rank and high office. Count Beust, the retiring Austrian Minister, spoke to return thanks for drinking the health of the Foreign Ambassadors. Earl Cairns, the Lord Chancellor, was the next speaker; and the Lord Mayor then proposed the health of her Majesty's Ministers. Lord Beaconsfield made a speech in which he referred to different subjects of foreign policy; the desirable alteration of the north-west frontier of our Indian Empire; the occupation of Cyprus, and the treaty guarantee of Asiatic Turkey; and the punctual execution of the Treaty of Berlin, which he considered extremely satisfactory, both for England and the Sultan. He thought it quite impossible that any of the Powers which had signed that Treaty should attempt to withdraw from their engagements; but her Majesty's Government were determined that it should be carried out, in spirit and to the letter; and they would, if necessary, appeal to the people of this country, with all their energy and resources, to maintain that Treaty, if any of its signataries were not disposed to an honourable fulfilment of its obligations. But that he did not believe; it was only "the harebrained chatter of irresponsible frivolity" that imputed such a disposition to them. The Marquis of Salisbury, Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Stafford Northcote, also spoke at the banquet.

BIOGRAPHICAL WORKS.

Several years ago there was exhibited in London a picture to which, from the appearance presented by some human blood, the horribly suggestive name of "the currant jelly picture" was given by a brutal wag, but which, however shocking it may have been to English taste, bore witness to the pictorial skill of Henri Regnault, a French painter, of whom a biographical sketch is presented in the volume entitled Modern Frenchmen: by Philip Gilbert Hamerton (Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday), a volume of singular grace and interest. The "modern Frenchmen" are five in number, and of their names, which are, respectively, Victor Jacquemont, Henri Perreyve, François Rude, Jean Jacques Ampère, and Henri Regnault, it is doubtful whether any but the last is at all familiar, or so familiar as to recall the memory of a particular person and a particular career, to English readers. The five modern Frenchmen whom Mr. Hamerton has chosen for biographical treatment have been selected by him partly on personal grounds of sympathy and partly as examples of "vigour and intensity of life," examples worthy of general imitation. Victor Jacquemont, born in 1801, was a "traveller and naturalist;" and as his course of life brought him into very intimate association with Englishmen, especially in British India, and with Americans, the biographical sketch of which he is the subject derives additional attractiveness from the opportunity it offers of seeing ourselves as he saw us and of weighing the criticisms he passed upon us and our Transatlantic kindred. It is not impertinent at the present day to quote his prediction that "the British power in India will not perish by foreign aggression." Of Henri Perreyve we are told that he "was never an important personage;" but such purity of life as he exhibited affords a lesson which cannot be too often or too assiduously studied. He was born in 1831, and he died in 1865; he loved liberty and religion, and both almost equally; he was a Republican and, at the same time, strange as it may appear for a Frenchman, a priest and "a very earnest Roman Catholic." In François Rude, born in 1784, we have what Mr. Hamerton calls "a great man and a great artist;" at any rate, we have a fine man and a fine sculptor, to whose memory the French Government lately paid a tribute "by calling one of the rooms in the Louvre by his name." We have also "the singular instance of a blacksmith who was at the same time an Academic gold and silver medallist; for, notwithstanding his rapid progress in art, he still remained obedient to his father's will, and worked patiently at the forge for years." He died in 1855. As for Jean Jacques Ampère, "the well-known writer on Roman History," he died in 1864, at the age of sixty-four. He died in harness, and he offers an example of indefatigable industry as well as of other admirable qualities. He is also a remarkable instance of the effect produced by Lord Byron's poetry "on the most eager and excitable young minds of that generation." We now come to Henri Regnault, cut off in the flower of his days, slain at Buzenval, during the Franco-German war, in January, 1871. He was born in 1843, and was "the second son of Victor Regnault, whose name is as famous in the scientific world as his son's name has since become in the world of art." He is rightly called "painter and patriot;" for by his brush he won renown, and, though he was exempt even from serving, he preferred to set a good example; he fell for his country, and to his memory might, with equal justice, be paid the honour accorded to that of "the first Grenadier of the Guard," who was always reported "mort sur le champ de bataille." On his behalf Mr. Hamerton takes up the cudgels against the cant which is talked in these latter days about genius, as if it were merely "an immense capacity for taking pains," and so on. This, of course, is all nonsense; there is such a thing as inspiration, or quasi-inspiration, and no quantity of labour will ever supply the want of it, whatever may be thought by the conceited plodder, who sets up for a genius and wears his hat on the back of his head to show his mighty forehead, and all on the strength of the quantity—not the quality—of his work.

Biography is the department to which, the title to the contrary notwithstanding, Travels of Doctor and Madame Helfer (Richard Bentley and Son) must be assigned; for the interest of the two volumes centres rather in matters with which travelling has little or nothing to do than in anything else. The travels, in short, to speak the plain truth, are certainly antiquated; but that the book, nevertheless, is likely to be read with a feeling as strong as curiosity, but somewhat deeper and more creditable, will appear from the following statement:—Madame Helfer, afterwards Countess Nostitz, lost her first husband, Dr. Helfer, in 1840, when he "met his death by the poisoned arrow of a savage off the Andaman Islands, in the Bay of Bengal." A few years ago she was induced to publish an account, which had been delayed for good reasons until after 1868, of the travels undertaken by her late husband and herself, and to add thereto certain biographical and autobiographical details. Her narrative excited so much interest and sympathy in Germany, that she was prevailed upon to put orth, at what exact date it is not easy to affirm, "a sequel giving a sketch of her experiences after her husband's death." This sequel, at any rate, stops at 1871, when she lost her second husband, Count Nostitz, whom she married in July, 1844. The two works, collected into one of two volumes, have been translated from the German by Mrs. George Sturge, and will probably command the sympathetic attention of many English readers. Dr. and Madame Helfer travelled in Syria, Mesopotamia, Burmah, and other lands; met with many adventures; and the "memoir and autobiography derives increased interest from the exciting narrative of the Euphrates Expedition, under the late General, then Colonel Chesney, in which Helfer and his wife took part, as well as from the graphic and lively descriptions of the life of Oriental women, into the mysteries of which a lady traveller could obtain glimpses denied to man." There can be no need to say more about the pages in which a wife not only tells the tale of her own life, or of its most important portions, but also "erects a monument over the grave of her first husband, the naturalist, who fell a victim to his ardent pursuit of knowledge."

We are indebted to our Transatlantic kinsfolk for the well-filled volume entitled Charlotte Cushman; Her Letters and Memories of her Life, edited by her friend, Emma Stebbins (Boston: Houghton, Osgood, and Co.), recalling to mind an actress who is best remembered in this country, one would say, for her impersonations of "Meg Merrilies" and "Romeo." Charlotte Cushman, or, as her full name is believed to have been, Charlotte Saunders Cushman, was born in Richmond-street, Boston, U.S., July 23, 1816, and died at the Parker House, Boston, Feb. 18, 1876. She was descended from Robert Cushman, "an Englishman, a Nonconformist or Puritan, one of the original band of Pilgrims," though he did not sail for America in the famous Mayflower, but about a year later in the "Fortune, a small vessel of fifty-five tons." She met with signal success, both here and in her own country, on the stage; but her fame was not so enduring among us as on the other side of the Atlantic. The record of her life is by no means remarkable, compared with that of many another, even less celebrated, actress; but it is not entirely devoid of interest or of instruction, if, as was said of her by one who knew her, "She loved much, served much, earned by hard work a noble reputation, and has left an example in which her race is enriched."

Filial affection and admiration not unreasonably inspired a belief that a Memoir of the late Alfred Smee, F.R.S., by his daughter (George Bell and Sons), would have some sort of attraction for the public, to many of whom the late Mr. Alfred Smee, such was his tendency to come forward, either in person or by letter addressed to the Times or to some other newspaper, on any favourable opportunity, must have been known by sight or name, or both. He was in many respects a remarkable man, and, if one were called upon to write his epitaph, the little busy bee that improves each shining hour would at once suggest itself, were rhyme an object, and, should Latin prose appear more desirable, one might get as far as "nihil non tetigit," though there might be some hesitation about completing the celebrated eulogy. Alfred Smee was born on June 18, 1818, and died on Jan. 11, 1877. He went to St. Paul's School, which he left at sixteen for King's College, where he distinguished himself in chemistry, anatomy, physiology, and divinity. Thence he migrated to St. Bartholomew's, where he carried off the prize for surgery. He invented about that time, in 1839, "a form of splint for fractures;" and from that moment he may be said to have started upon his indefatigable career as a scientific investigator, writer, and experimentalist. In January, 1841, "he was elected Surgeon to the Bank of England," which "appointment was specially created for him, and for it he was mainly indebted to that eminent surgeon Sir Astley Cooper." About two thirds of the volume are devoted to an appendix, containing "a selection from his miscellaneous writings;" and this appendix, if it serve no other purpose, will bear ample testimony to Mr. Smee's restless energy and unflagging industry in the cause of scientific knowledge, from the sublimest phenomena of nature to the sordid mystery of the Colorado beetle. Among the illustrations, of which there are several, may be mentioned a very good portrait of the late Mr. Smee; but discretion would probably have brought about the omission of the picture representing "Alfred Smee, with his son, fishing in the Thames," which seems to serve no particular purpose, whether of elucidation or of embellishment; for the process is pretty familiar to our generation, and the execution of the scene, though creditable enough, is not of astounding brilliancy.

A testimonial, consisting of a handsome silver tea and coffee service suitably engraved, which has been subscribed for by the magistrates, councillors, and other officials of Falmouth, has been presented to Mr. Thomas Webber, J.P., the Mayor of Falmouth.

Lord Beaconsfield has written to Mr. Mark Addy, boatman, Salford, a letter in which he says:—"The attention of the Sovereign having been called to the repeated acts of heroism performed by you in saving, at the risk of your own life, the lives of many of her Majesty's subjects from drowning in the river Irwell, I have the gratification to inform you that the Queen has been graciously pleased to confer on you, in recognition of your gallantry and daring, the honour and distinction of the Albert Medal of the First Class."

The Castle Art-Museum committee of the Nottingham Town Council presented a report to the Council at its adjourned meeting on Monday, stating that the total cost of the opening of the museum by the Prince and Princess of Wales amounted to £5316 11s. 4d. The committee, in pursuance of the powers conferred upon them by the Town Council, had directed that £5000 of this sum should be paid out of the profits of the gas undertaking (which is in the hands of the Corporation), and they recommended that the balance should be charged on the current income of the committee. The total number of visitors to the museum since its opening on July 3 to the date of the report (Sept. 18) was 106,121. The report was adopted.

The Gazette announces that the Queen has appointed Lord William G. S. S. M. Compton, now a Third Secretary, to be a Second Secretary in her Majesty's Diplomatic Service. The following appointments are also gazetted:—Mr. George French, now Judge of her Majesty's Supreme Court for China and Japan, to be Chief Justice of the Court; Mr. Robert Anderson Mowat, now Law Secretary to the same Court, to be Assistant-Judge; Mr. Richard Temple Rennie, to be Judge of her Majesty's Court for Japan; and Mr. David F. Carmichael, of the Madras Civil Service, to be a member of Council at Fort St George, in the room of Sir W. R. Robinson, K.C.S.I. Mr. G. T. Ricketts, Consul at Tiflis, is to be her Majesty's Consul at Rio de Janeiro; and Mr. T. Michell, C.B., to be her Majesty's Consul at Tiflis. A number of consular appointments in this country have been approved by her Majesty.

OBITUARY.

THE MARCHIONESS OF CHOLMONDELEY.

The Most Hon. Marcia Emma Georgiana Marchioness of Cholmondeley died on the 3rd inst., at Hyde Park-street, aged seventy-four. Her Ladyship was the youngest daughter of the Right Hon. Charles Arbuthnot (some time Ambassador at Constantinople, and afterwards Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster), and was married, Feb. 28, 1825, to Lord William Henry Hugh Cholmondeley, M.P. (son of George James, first Marquis of Cholmondeley, K.G.), who succeeded his brother in the marquisate of Cholmondeley May 8, 1870. The Marchioness had two sons and six daughters. Her elder son having died in 1869, his son, the Earl of Rocksavage, is now heir-apparent to Lord Cholmondeley.

SIR R. A. O'DONNELL, BART.

Sir Richard Annesley O'Donnell, fourth Baronet of Newport, in the county of Mayo, died at Dorset-square, London, on the 9th inst. He was born May 28, 1808, the second son of Sir Neale O'Donnell, Bart., by Lady Catherine Annesley, his wife, fourth daughter of Richard, second Earl Annesley, and succeeded his brother in the baronetcy July 29, 1828. Sir Richard was a J.P. and D.L. for Mayo, and served as High Sheriff in 1834. He married, April 16, 1831, Mary, third daughter of George Clendining, Esq., of Westport, and leaves one surviving son, his successor, Sir George Clendining O'Donel, now fifth Baronet, born in 1832, and married, 1865, to Mary Stratford, only surviving daughter of the late Euseby Stratford-Kirwan, Esq., of Bawn House, in the county of Longford. Sir George was knighted in 1865, as the eldest son of a Baronet, under the special clause in the patent of creation. The O'Donnells or O'Donels, of Newport, are the direct descendants of the ancient and very historic family of the O'Donnells of Tyrconnell, who played so conspicuous a part in the annals of Ireland. Hugh Roe O'Donnell, the most popular hero of Irish history, elder brother of Rory O'Donnell, created Earl of Tyrconnell, was of the line of O'Donnell to which the late Baronet belonged. Distinguished branches of this grand old race are established in Spain and Austria, the former represented by the Duke of Tetuan, the latter by Count O'Donell, who, when aide-de-camp in waiting, saved the Emperor of Austria from assassination.

SIR JAMES GRANT SUTTIE.

Sir James Grant Suttie, sixth Baronet, of Balgone, in the county of Haddington, died on the 30th ult. He was born May 25, 1830, the eldest son of Sir George Grant Suttie, Bart., by Lady Harriet, his wife, daughter of Francis, seventh Earl of Wemyss, and inherited the baronetcy at his father's death, only a few months since. Sir James was a D.L. of the county of Berwick, and was Lieutenant-Colonel Haddington, Berwick, Linlithgow, and Peebles Artillery Militia. He married, Aug. 6, 1857, Lady Susan Harriet Innes Ker, elder daughter of James Henry Robert, sixth Duke of Roxburghe, and leaves three daughters and one son, his successor, now Sir George Grant Suttie, Bart., born Sept. 2, 1870.—In our impression of last week a memoir was given by mistake of the late Sir George Grant Suttie, fifth Baronet, instead of his son, the Baronet just deceased. As above stated, Sir George died a few months since.

THE CAFE DE LA REGENCE.

We have received the following letter from our old-time correspondent and contributor "Delta:"—

Sanquhar, N.B., Kirkconnell Manse, Oct. 28, 1878.

Dear Sir,—I saw a reference lately in your Paper to the old Café de la Régence, the Cross Rialto at Paris, now demoli-hed. It may interest your numerous readers to learn that there, more than forty years ago, I had the pleasure of meeting with the veteran De la Bourdonnais, who sate in his favourite chair (reserved apparently for him), and seemed much amused looking at a game which I played with one of the habitués of the café, whose name I have forgotten. He said to me, in a pleasant tone, "Mon jeune ami, &c., you would be an excellent player if you knew anything of the openings." I told him that I was utterly ignorant of them all; and he advised me, after I returned to Scotland, to mo e myself acquainted with them, which I did at last, but not till 1843. He played one game with me at odds of Queen's Rook, which he won in beautiful style. I have often regretted since that I had not a copy of it. He opened a K B Gambit upon me. I remember that much, and the denouement. We afterwards discussed a bottle of Chamber in together. He always played best after discussing some Burgundy, as I was informed by himself and others. I had heard before that "In vino est veritas," but had never thought till then that "In vino est Calissa." I can see still, as it were yesterday, the old Café, and the jolly, friar-like figure of old La Bourdonnais.—Yours very truly, Delta.

CHESS INTELLIGENCE.

A chess club for Kilburn and the vicinity is being organised by a number of amateurs residing in that district. A large and commodious room has been obtained for a place of meeting, and the subscription has been fixed at half a guinea per annum. Amateurs desirous of joining the new association should communicate with the secretary, Mr. G. H. McLennan, 176, Alexandra-road, St. John's-wood.

A match between the Bermondsey and Railway Clearing House Chess Club was played at the rooms of the former on the 9th inst. Eleven players on each side engaged in the contest, which resulted in a victory for the representatives of Bermondsey, who scored six games to the adversaries' three, with two draws.

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.
JAMES EPPS AND CO., HOMŒOPATHIC CHEMISTS.

THE "Civil Service Gazette" says:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly-nourished frame."

THE "Naval and Military Gazette" says:—"The nutritive qualities of cocoa over either those of tea or coffee are now so generally acknowledged that the steady increase shown by official statistics in its consumption during recent years ceases to be a matter of surprise. One of the first firms to popularise this now indispensable adjunct to our breakfast-table was Messrs. Epps and Co., whose name, since 1839, has been so continuously before the public, and whose Homœopathic Cocoa is as familiar in our homes as the proverbial 'household words.' Those whose business it has been to watch at Messrs. Epps's works the elaborate and complex processes, and to note the care and labour bestowed before the crude cocoa bean is considered ready for consumption, cannot but admit that the popularity Messrs. Epps's productions have secured is fully deserved. The vastness of these works may be imagined when it is stated that four millions of pounds of prepared cocoa alone are prepared there yearly. The reputation gained, now many years since, for Mr. James Epps's preparation, both for its purity and its value as a dietetic, has been more than maintained. A constant increasing demand fully testifies to this—which must be as gratifying to Messrs. Epps as it is certainly flattering to the good faith they have kept with the public to secure so gratifying a result."

"All the Year Round" says:—"Having now disposed of fancy chocolate, let us stroll to the Euston-road, hard by the Regent's Park, to Epps's cocoa manufactory, where may be studied the making of cocoa on a stupendous scale, giving a just idea of the value of these articles, not as luxuries, but as actual food."

THE "Court Journal" says:—"In a climate so varying and trying as our own, to maintain sound and uniform health, our daily diet cannot be too carefully and attentively studied. Advancing science and recent discoveries have within the last few years been instrumental in adding several most valuable additions to our comparatively short list of dietetic foods. Foremost among these should be ranged cocoa, which, although known here several centuries previously, only came into general use within the last forty years. One of the first to popularise this now indispensable adjunct to our table was Mr. James Epps, whose 'Prepared Cocoa' has gained such just repute for its excellent and nutritious character. Prepared originally on homœopathic principles, in a subtle and convenient form, and easy of digestion, it met a public demand, speedily became popular, until now Messrs. Epps produce over four millions of pounds of their cocoa a year, and their manufactory is the largest of its kind in this country."

"Cassell's Household Guide" says:—"We will now give an account of the process adopted by Messrs. James Epps and Co., manufacturers of dietetic articles at their works in the Euston-road, London."

THE "Morning Advertiser" says:—"In the middle of the seventeenth century an announcement appeared in one of the few journals of that period, to the effect that 'out of Hieloggate-street, at a Frenchman's house, is an excellent West India drink, called chocolate, to be sold at reasonable rates.' This is the first record we have of the introduction of cocoa into England. From it first flourished as a fashionable drink, and then, like all fashions, subsided. Nearly two centuries after, in 1832, the duties, which had been almost prohibitive, were greatly reduced, and one of the first to take advantage of re-establishing the popularity of cocoa was Messrs. James Epps and Co., the Homœopathic Chemists. Under the name of 'Prepared Cocoa' they introduced a soluble and convenient preparation, which required no boiling, and was palatable and highly nutritious. It met a public want, speedily became popular, and year by year has increased in demand, till the consumption now exceeds four millions of pounds yearly."

THE "Christian World" says:—"'If I am to take cocoa,' said I, 'I must know what it is made of; I must examine the process; I must delve into the mystery of its manufacture; I must see and judge for myself what are the ingredients of which it is composed.' With this view I made my way to the manufactory of James Epps and Co., in the Euston-road."

"John Bull" says:—"In no branches of industry are recent scientific and chemical discoveries more generally applied than in those upon which our food supply is so largely dependent. The luxuries of the last generation have in many cases become the daily necessaries of the present. A forcible illustration of this is to be found in the enormous increase in the consumption of cocoa year by year—in exact proportion to the increased facilities for its manufacture. An idea of the vast extent of this industry may be gained from the fact that one firm alone—that of Messrs. Epps and Co.—now sell over four millions of pounds annually. The 'Homœopathic Cocoa' of Messrs. Epps has, during the last few years it has been before the public, gained great and just repute, which its excellent quality and careful preparation certainly entitle it to. A cocoa in soluble form, and combining what are technically known as 'flesh-forming' and 'heat-giving' properties, is clearly an invaluable addition to our scanty list of dietetic foods. Such Messrs. Epps claim for their prepared cocoa, and such analysis and—most valuable of all—experience has proved it to be."

THE "Church Review" says:—"Although we cannot yet boast of a free breakfast-table, still the active legislation in furtherance of that object during the last half century leaves us much to be thankful for. A striking instance of the general good resulting from the removal of heavy imposts upon our food supply is afforded by the marvellous increase in the consumption of cocoa since 1833, up to which period an almost prohibitive duty was levied. In 1830 the total amount consumed in this country was less than half a million pounds yearly. At the present time one firm alone, that of Messrs. James Epps and Co., the Homœopathic Chemists, sell annually four million pounds."

THE "Civilian" says:—"In the seventeenth century, before either tea or coffee had found their way into the English markets, chocolate was a favourite beverage with the luxurious classes at that period; it then fetched an almost fabulous price per pound. To-day, when modern science and enterprise have placed it within the reach of every class, cocoa is not only still regarded as a delightful and refreshing drink, but is valued for its nutritive and dietetic qualities. One of the first, we believe, who may be credited with introducing cocoa in its present form is Mr. James Epps. Prepared on sound dietetic principles, Epps's Homœopathic Cocoa contains all the nutritive properties of the native pachi cocoa contains all the nutritive properties of the native pachi cocoa combined in a form that they are rendered thoroughly soluble, product in such a form that they are rendered thoroughly soluble, and, therefore, much more easy of digestion. The natural superabundance of fat present in raw cocoa is, moreover, not only abundance of fat present in raw cocoa is, moreover, not only counteracted, but made to serve one of the most desirable functions of sound diet. Messrs. Epps's works are now, perhaps, the largest in the country, the cocoa produced there amounting to many million pounds a year."

"Land and Water" says:—"Through the kindness of Messrs. Epps, I recently had an opportunity of seeing the many complicated and varied processes the cacao bean passes through ere it is sold for public use, and being interested and highly pleased with what I saw then, and being interested and highly pleased with what I saw during the visit to the manufactory, I thought a brief account of the cacao and the way it is manufactured by Messrs. Epps to fit it for a wholesome and nutritious beverage, might be likewise of interest to the readers of 'Land and Water.'"

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1878.

The week just closing will be memorable on more than one account. It opened tragically, with a criminal attempt upon the life of the King of Italy. His Majesty, with the Queen Margherita, and Signor Cairoli, his Prime Minister, was making his public entrance into Naples amid every demonstration of enthusiasm by the populace. He had dispensed with the escort of Cuirassiers who customarily rode on the side of the Royal carriage, probably for the purpose of displaying more impressively his complete confidence in his Neapolitan subjects. Whilst some persons in the crowd were engaged in presenting petitions, a man named Giovanni Passannante came up with a dagger hidden in the folds of a small red flag and struck at the King, who, seeing himself thus assailed, swung round his sheathed sword, and smote his intending assassin upon the head. The man, undismayed, returned to the assault. Signor Cairoli threw himself between the King and his assailant, caught the latter by his hair, received the dagger in his thigh, but would not release his grasp until the cynical desperado was secured by a municipal guard. The affair was one of a few moments only. It was not observed, in its true character, by the crowd, and the cortége reached the Palace without further impediment. Signor Cairoli's wound, although not by any means a trifle, does not appear to excite serious apprehension. Passanante declared to the Magistrates by whom he was examined that his sole motive for the attempted assassination of King Humbert was the loathing which he felt to Monarchy, and his ardent desire to further by any means a Universal Republic. He has not only failed, but has evoked from all parts of Europe an expression of indignant horror which will probably greatly strengthen the Institution which the dagger was uplifted to destroy. The popularity of the King is enhanced tenfold by this occurrence. The sympathy of the Italian people has gone out towards the Monarch and his Queen with that exuberance which only an attempt upon his life could have produced. Such crimes, however, are especially to be deplored. They are contagious. They attract the notice and fire the ambition of the few individuals in the community who are susceptible to their virus. Whether they result from this cause, or from conspiracy, they diffuse throughout the body politic a sense of insecurity highly detrimental to the healthful development of national progress. They seem to carry with them inferences which are not necessarily warranted by actual facts; and, perhaps in another sense than that expressed by our dramatic bard, they illustrate the confession of Henry IV. to his son—

Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown.

The Afghan trouble does not promise a satisfactory issue. From a military point of view every preparation is now complete. Indeed, whilst we write, warlike operations are already in process. Telegrams from India announce that the British troops crossed the frontier on Thursday morning. But it can hardly be said that the conscience of the British people is quite easy in prospect of the contemplated conflict with the Ameer of Cabul. The Afghan Committee over which Lord Lawrence presides (originally organised for the purpose of preventing the outbreak of hostilities on the North-Western Frontier of India before the merits of the case shall have been ascertained and the judgment of Parliament pronounced) proves the existence of a very considerable and influential minority, at least, who deprecate the war, as well as the proceedings of the Indian Government which have led to it. The Committee sought an interview by Deputation with Lord Beaconsfield, which the Prime Minister has declined, though he has promised the publication of the diplomatic papers calculated to throw light on the policy of the Government before the end of the month. The substance of these papers is very likely embodied in a document which has been issued. It is a despatch from the Secretary of State for India to the Governor-General of India in Council, recapitulating the policy which has been pursued by successive Governments of Great Britain towards Afghanistan, and explaining the motives of the present Government in their recent proceedings. It was, perhaps, too much to expect that the noble Lord would stay proceedings at the instance of a committee, however influentially constituted, at a moment fixed for the commencement of hostilities. It is clear, however, that in the present instance a popular approbation of the course pursued by the Indian Government (so far as it is known) has been but very feebly expressed, if at all. There has been nothing hitherto calculated to rouse public sentiment in the matter—no imminent danger threatens our Eastern possessions, no distinct affront has been offered to our national self-respect, no glory will be achieved by our success. Great expenditure of means, if not of men, is of necessity involved in this experimental expedition, and, after all, it is not at all improbable that the extent of it, as originally designed, will be largely controlled and limited by opinion at home.

It will not be denied by any that the "Afghan trouble" occurs at a very inopportune season. Neither India nor England can look hopefully in the face of increasing financial demands. The depression of trade and commerce is more serious than can be recollected by most men. Our seats of manufacturing industry are in a deplorable condition. Agriculture, notwithstanding a favourable wheat harvest, has almost ceased to be a remunerative occupation. Everywhere there is a restriction of employment. Almost everywhere pauperism is on the increase. Even the weather has assumed an unusually menacing aspect. Floods are not uncommon. They have occurred in several parts of the kingdom, as well as abroad, and have already caused an untold amount of suffering and a large destruction of property. The winter has yet to be passed through, and the general expectation appears to be that it will be a severe one. All these things tend to relax the elasticity of the public mind and indispose it for rushing blindfold into dangers the end of which none can pretend to foresee. For, perhaps, the most formidable feature of the present times is the absence of any augury of hope for the immediate future. It is a bad time for initiating bellicose measures, even with a view to a "scientific" rectification of "haphazard" frontiers. People are out of heart, and perhaps well may be, and are driven by the pressure of their circumstances to divert their sympathies, and even their attention, from Foreign to Home affairs. Let us hope that nothing worse may take place. The responsibility of this country has been rendered much heavier than it was during the last few years, and is getting to be oppressive. Our obligations appear to outgrow our means of fulfilling them.

The tenure by which we hold India is peculiar. It is partly military in its character, but it is predominantly moral. There is not a native Prince or Rajah who does not regard the engagements of the Indian Government as the surest guarantee he can hold for the permanence of his privileges. It is of importance to refrain from any course of action which may ultimately conduce to loosen this delicate tie. How the policy of Lord Lytton may affect it is at present merely matter of conjecture. But they who are most versed in Indian administration seem to be most confident in their judgment that the soundest, and therefore the safest, policy in the East, as well as in the West, is that which most closely conforms to the rule of right.

THE COURT.

The Queen was deeply grieved upon receiving the melancholy news on Saturday last of the death of her Majesty's beloved little grand-daughter Princess Mary of Hesse, aged four years, which took place rather suddenly the previous night at twelve o'clock from diphtheria. The Grand Duke of Hesse, with the Hereditary Grand Duke and the Princesses, who have all been suffering from the same malady, are now progressing satisfactorily. Her Majesty receives daily telegrams concerning the state of the Grand Ducal family. The Queen received a telegram on Saturday morning stating that the Sarmatian, with Princess Louise of Lorne and the Governor-General of Canada on board, which had been delayed by a heavy gale at Loch Foyle, in the county of Londonderry, sailed at half-past eleven o'clock the previous night. The Queen and Princess Beatrice attended Divine service on Sunday, performed at Balmoral by the Rev. A. Campbell. Her Majesty before leaving Balmoral received Captain Forbes Gordon, Lieutenant Norman Chalmers, and Lieutenant Gordon Money, of the 79th (Queen's Own) Cameron Highlanders, stationed at Ballater, who lunched at the castle. The Queen and Princess Beatrice have returned to Windsor Castle.

Queen Victoria, immediately on the news of the attack on King Humbert reaching her, telegraphed to Naples congratulating his Majesty on his escape, and at the same time Sir Augustus Paget received instructions to go at once to Naples and convey personally to the King and Queen of Italy the fullest expressions of her Majesty's regard.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud of Wales, attended Divine service at Sandringham church on Sunday. The service was performed by the Rev. F. A. J. Hervey, Rector, assisted by the Rev. J. Durot, M.A., Rector of North Lynn with Lynn Regis. The Prince received the Rev. J. B. Slight, M.A., Head Master of King's Lynn Grammar School, with Mr. E. A. Fitch, Undergraduate of Pembroke College, Cambridge, son of the Rev. Frederic Fitch, Vicar of Cromer, at Sandringham House on Monday, when Mr. Fitch was presented by the Prince with the gold medal which is annually given by his Royal Highness for the most proficient pupil of the King's Lynn Grammar School.

The Duke of Edinburgh landed at Halifax on Monday from the Black Prince. The Duke held a reception on Wednesday at the military head-quarters.

The Empress Eugénie's fête day was observed yesterday week, in the simplest manner, at Chiselhurst. The Empress, accompanied by her suite, attended Divine service in the Catholic School; and she received many telegrams and letters of felicitation, together with numerous bouquets.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGE.

Lieutenant-Colonel Laurence J. Oliphant, Grenadier Guards, was married to the Hon. Mary Gérard, eldest daughter of Lord and Lady Gerard, on Tuesday, at the Church of The Assumption, Warwick-street, Regent-street. The bridesmaids were the Hon. Catherine Gerard (sister of the bride), Miss Marie Hervey, Miss Luisa de Murrieta, and Miss Clarita de Murrieta. The bridegroom was accompanied by Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. C. Edgcumbe, his best man. The bride's dress was of ivory satin, trimmed with point d'Alençon and garnitures of orange-blossoms, with a veil of the same lace over a wreath of orange-blossoms. Her ornaments were diamonds. The bridesmaids' dresses were of ivory satin, trimmed with dark brown fur, and ivory felt bonnets, trimmed with satin to harmonise with their dresses. Each lady wore a gold brooch, with the word "Tinie" (by which name the bride is familiarly known to her most intimate friends) in diamonds, the gift of the bridegroom. The rite was performed by the Hon. and Right Rev. Mgr. Talbot, the bride being given away by her father. Lord and Lady Gerard afterwards received the wedding party at breakfast at their house in Grosvenor-square, after which Colonel Oliphant and his bride started for Wadhurst Park, Mr. C. de Murrieta's seat in Sussex, to pass the honeymoon. The bride's travelling costume was of beige cloth trimmed with sealskin, and a brown velvet bonnet to match. The wedding presents were very numerous. The Prince of Wales sent the bride a gold porte-bonheur studded with diamonds and rubies, and to Colonel Oliphant a jewelled horseshoe pin. The Duke and Duchess of Teck sent the bride an inlaid ivory and gold writing set. Lord Gerard's gifts to his daughter included two large double diamond marguerites, a pair of diamond earrings, a brougham and harness, and a flounce of old point d'Alençon; and Lady Gerard gave a dressing-bag with old silver fittings and an antique silver mirror. Colonel Oliphant presented his bride with a gold bracelet set with pearl and diamond stars, two diamond hoop rings, and a sapphire and diamond ring. The officers of the Grenadier Guards presented Colonel Oliphant and his bride with a travelling-bag and a dessert service, and Lord and Lady Gerard's household servants gave a gilt travelling clock.

DR. HANS VON BULOW'S RECITALS.

The first of Dr. Von Bülow's two pianoforte recitals took place at St. James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon, when he played the five last solo sonatas of Beethoven, from memory—an intellectual feat of an exceptional kind. The performance of each piece was a masterly display of technical skill and individuality of style, the chief specialty having been the interpretation of the leviathan work in B flat, op. 106—the longest and most elaborate of its kind extant. Each movement was admirably rendered, the interpretation of the final complex fugue having been marvellous for sustained power and clear enunciation. The sonata which preceded this, op. 101, in A major, and those which followed, op. 109, in E major; op. 110, in A flat; and op. 111, in C minor, were likewise rendered in masterly style, and the whole performance was one of remarkable interest, and was enthusiastically recognised as such by a large audience.

The second recital takes place next Wednesday afternoon.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

At the third of this season's concerts Mr. Sims Reeves again contributed to the attractions of the evening by his fine singing; his songs on this occasion having been Blumenthal's "The Message," and Bishop's "My pretty Jane," each of which was enthusiastically encored, a compliment that was only accepted in the second instance, when the singer substituted "Come into the garden, Maud." Madame Antoinette Sterling's fine voice and expressive style were very successfully displayed in Molloy's new song "Darby and Joan;" Mr. Cowen's "The Better Land," and Mr. Hullah's "The three fishers," each of which was redemanded. Madame Sherrington gave Roeckel's "A little mountain lad," Molloy's "Dresden china," and "Comin' thro' the rye" (encored); and Miss Mary Davies gave much effect to Cowen's song "At last," Cotsford Dick's successful new song "Olivia," and the Scotch ballad "Jock o' Hazeldean."

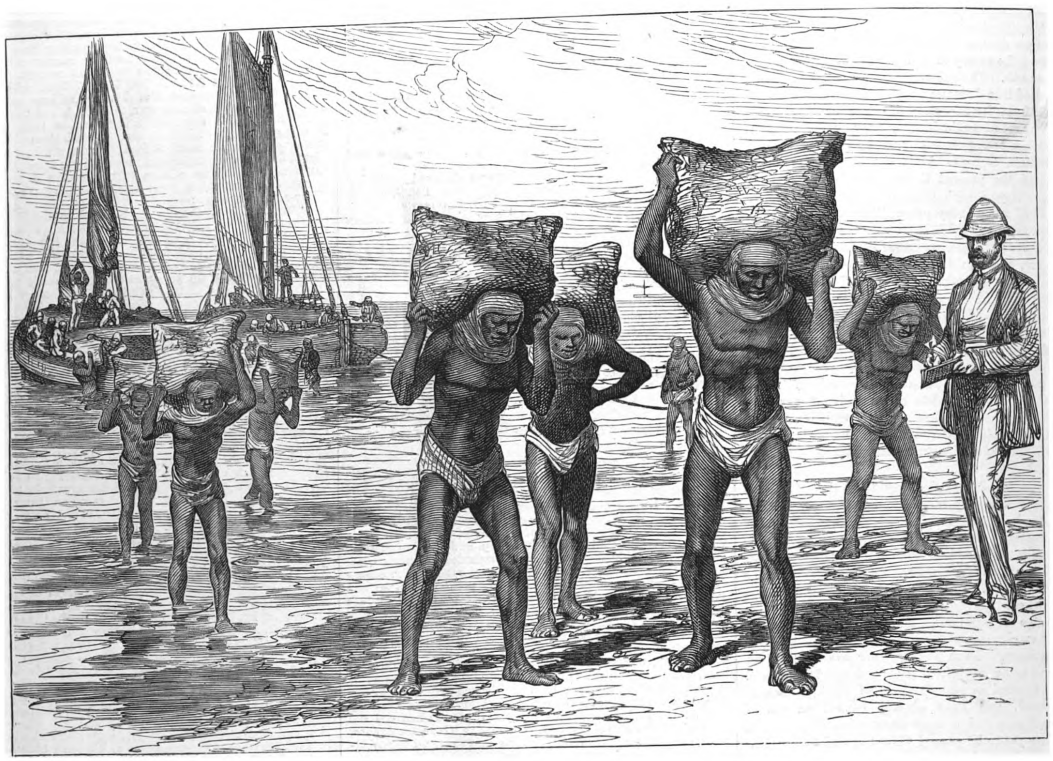
Among other prominent features of the evening were Mr. Lloyd's expressive delivery of Balfe's "Margaretta," Bishop's "Be mine, dear maid" (encored), and the old ballad, "Sally in our alley;" and Mr. Santley's fine declamation in Mazzoni's new song, "The wandering minstrel" (encored), and Hatton's popular "Simon the cellarer" (also encored). Mr. Maybrick was unable to appear, and was replaced by one of the gentlemen of the London Vocal Union, the members of which contributed some very agreeable part-singing.

Madame Arabella Goddard, who was prevented from appearing at the two previous concerts, played two pianoforte fantasias—Thalberg's "Don Pasquale" and Benedict's "Erin"—with brilliant execution. Mr. Sidney Naylor conducted as usual. St. James's Hall was crowded in every part.

THE KHOORD CABUL PASS.

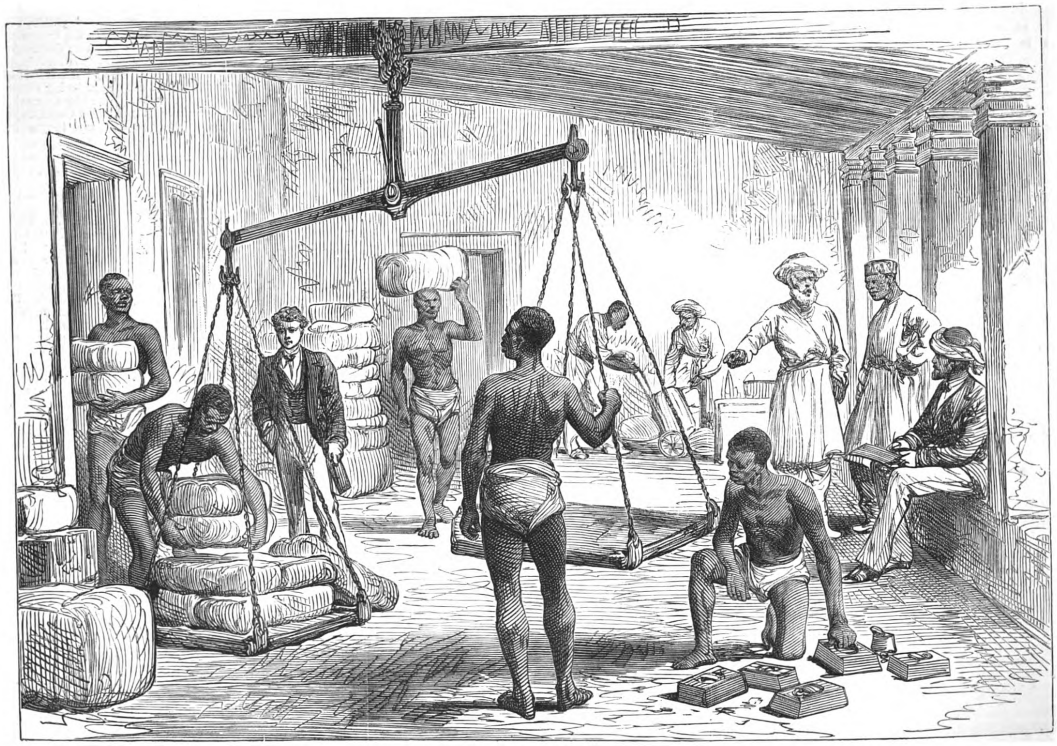
Twenty miles to the east from the city of Cabul, on the roads to Jellalabad and the Khyber Pass, there are some bad places, of forbidding aspect and of dismal repute, which were the scenes of a great disaster in the enforced retreat of the British and Indian troops from Cabul, under General Elphinstone, in January, 1842. The mountains, here ranging from 5000 ft. to 6000 ft. in height, are intersected by narrow ravines, the scenery of which is extremely wild and rugged. We are indebted to Major-General Sir Vincent Eyre, who was in command of a detachment of Horse Artillery in General Pollock's campaign of that year, for a Sketch of the Khoord Cabul Pass. This stern defile is five miles long, and was fiercely contested by Akhbar Khan, first with General Sale, and subsequently with General Pollock; besides which, it also witnessed the notorious frightful massacre of our retreating Cabul garrison. The following is an extract from a contemporary narrative of the terrible event which took place there, nearly thirty-seven years ago:—

"Akhbar Khan, whose violent hatred to the British had been sharpened not only by the conquest of his father's territories, but by his own exile and subsequent imprisonment in Bokhara, and by his wild fanaticism, demanded, on the third day of the retreat from Cabul, that the British should, when surrounded by the Ghazees under his command, make new terms with him, and promise not to proceed further until the withdrawal of the force under Sir R. Sale from Jellalabad was known; and he insisted on six hostages. Major Pottinger, who was lame from a wound, instantly offered to be one, and, at Akhbar Khan's orders, Captains Mackenzie and Lawrence were included. The Ghazees were, however, not restrained in their attacks, and a fearful slaughter followed on the movement towards Khoord Cabul. The column was attacked on all sides. The fourteen ladies were in the centre, but Mrs. Anderson and Mrs. Boyd had each a child carried off. Akhbar Khan, while the Ghazees were thus busy, professed his inability to restrain them, and on Jan. 9 demanded that the ladies should be placed under his protection. The miserable weather, the snowy wastes, the rough mountain tracks, and the month of January in the coldest region of Central Asia, compelled them to yield; the hostages halted for some days in that neighbourhood. The demand on General Sale to relinquish his post was made on Jan. 9, and on that day he refused to do so, unless by orders from the Supreme Government. This answer was taken back to Akhbar Khan. The unfortunate sepoys began again to move, and were again assailed. The sepoys, who form such good soldiers under the broiling sun of India, being enervated and stupefied by the cold, scarcely offered any resistance, and hundreds of them were soon dispatched by the Ghazees, but the Europeans and some brave men kept together until they reached the pass of Jugdulluk. Here General Elphinstone and Brigadier Skelton became hostages, and were detained two miles distant by Akhbar. General Elphinstone wrote a note in pencil to Brigadier Anquetil, 'March to-night; there is treachery.' The British troops marched early in the night; they came to the frightful mountain pass; it was barricaded; they forced the way and reached Jugdulluk, which they defended some time until Brigadier Anquetil was killed. All order was then lost, and confusion and separation, slaughter and destruction, ensued. Several officers who were well mounted attempted to make good their way into Jellalabad. Some of them arrived within three or four miles, when they were murdered and plundered, and their bodies left on the road. Only one officer, Dr. Brydon, of the 5th Bengal Native Infantry, though wounded in several places and exhausted, succeeded in reaching the place of safety in Jellalabad on the 13th. Of the fate of the other 4000 soldiers and 6000 camp followers nothing certain is known; many have been killed, others are dispersed, and as yet it is difficult to decide. The names of thirty-five officers have been published as killed from the commencement of the insurrection." We may add that the total number of those who perished—men, women, and children—has been estimated at nearly 26,000, including the troops and camp-followers attempting to return to India by different roads.



It need scarcely be remarked that this ferocious massacre was avenged, within a few months, by the advance of General Pollock, forcing the Khyber Pass, and relieving General Sale at Jellalabad, while Ghuzni was recaptured by General Nott from Candahar. The memories of the Khoord Cabul and Jugdulluk are, nevertheless, sufficiently gloomy, but they cannot yet be allowed to pass into oblivion.

SKETCHES OF AFRICAN TRAVEL.



The two Sketches of native African porters, busied with loads of European luggage, which appear on a page of this week's publication, are from the pencil of Mr. H. B. Thelwall, but were taken at two very different places. Port Elizabeth, in Algoa Bay, is a British seaport, on the coast of our South African provinces, and should be the commercial outlet of a well-settled and fertile agricultural district. Unfortunately, its roadstead is not a secure harbour, and the conveniences for loading and unloading leave much to be desired. The process of removing a cargo, in bags carried upon men's heads and shoulders, from the lighter which has taken this merchandise out of the ship, is both tedious and expensive to the consignees We pass on, above a thousand miles up the south-eastern shores of the continent, entering tropical latitudes, to arrive at Quillimane, on the East African coast of the Portuguese territory, in the Mozambique Channel, at the mouth of the Zambesi and Shiré Rivers. Here again, though so far past Kaffirland, we find the black fellows employed in the porterage of English calico bales, which have been brought into the Portuguese custom house for weighing, and for paying import duty, before the owners can take them up the country on behalf of the Lake Nyassa Mission. It should be observed that, among the unsophisticated negro populations of the interior, cotton cloth, preferably of bright and strong colours, is the most acceptable medium of barter. It is, in fact, the ordinary mercantile currency brought for the purchase of ivory and other African produce by European or Arabian traders. There is some disadvantage, as may be imagined, in having to pay one's way with huge quantities of Manchester piece-goods, which must be conveyed for months by a train of a hundred naked men walking behind you, all requiring their food and wages, for this and no other service. A purse or chest of coined money, not to say a bundle of notes or bills of exchange, would be much handier means of procuring what you want; but the conveniences of civilisation are not to be enjoyed in the wilderness of Central Africa.

THE AFGHAN WAR.

COMMENCEMENT OF HOSTILITIES.

As we had fully anticipated, war has actually been opened this week by the Government of the Empress Victoria of India, whose administration, being that of an Asiatic despotic monarchy, is to be carefully distinguished from the English Constitutional Government of our beloved Sovereign, the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland. This essential difference of political character must have been tacitly recognised, on Tuesday, in the Prime Minister's peremptory refusal to admit a deputation of his countrymen, headed by several Peers and Members of Parliament, who asked leave to present a Memorial for the immediate summoning of Parliament, meanwhile deferring the action of the Indian Executive, upon the question of the projected Afghan War. Lord Beaconsfield, in his letter of Tuesday, did not tell Lord Lawrence that, on Monday, a long despatch from Lord Cranbrook, the Secretary of State, went out to the Viceroy, instructing Lord Lytton to declare war. The opinions of such men as Lord Lawrence, Earl Grey, Lord Northbrook, and many other persons, highly experienced in civil and military administration, may be taken for what they are worth; "but," says Lord Beaconsfield, "I am at a loss to perceive what useful purpose would be served by a more extended expression of those opinions from a deputation, especially as the Government and the country have already so frequently and so recently had the advantage of copious explanations of them, both from your Lordship and others who act with you." The Premier goes on to say, "With regard to the assembling of Parliament, her Majesty's Government will, as a matter of course, be prepared, in the event of hostilities being commenced in India, to advise her Majesty to make such communication to Parliament as the letter and spirit of the Act of 1858 would seem to require." This means, according to the Act referred to, by which the Indian Government was vested in her Majesty, that a Message relating to the war is to be sent to Parliament next Session, or within three months. In the mean time, the war is to begin and to go on, as everybody knows, at the cost of British taxpayers; for, although it may technically be "commenced in India," by the issue of the Viceroy's proclamation at Lahore, it will be conducted in Afghanistan, being, as it is, an aggressive war of territorial conquest, for the acquisition of certain mountainous districts to make a new "scientific frontier."

The India Office published on Thursday morning a despatch from Lord Cranbrook to the Viceroy of India, dated last Monday, "November 18," in which the Government explains its war policy. It states that, notwithstanding the friendly advances made to him, the Ameer has maintained an attitude of unfriendly isolation, and ultimately, having two years ago declined to receive a British Envoy, even temporarily, on the ground that he could not guarantee his safety, nor thereafter be left with any excuse for declining to receive a Russian mission, has "welcomed with every appearance of ostentation an Embassy from the Czar, dispatched to his Court at a time when there were indications that an interruption of friendly relations between this country and Russia might be imminent." The despatch then refers to the refusal of the Ameer to receive Sir Neville Chamberlain's mission, and says that this conduct was wholly without justification. "By every bond of international courtesy," it adds, "as well as by the treaty engagements of 1855 existing between the two countries, binding him to be the friend of our friends, and the enemy of our enemies, the Ameer was bound to a line of conduct the reverse of that which he has adopted." The Government of India considered that this act deprived the Ameer of all further claim upon the forbearance of the British Government, and necessitated instant action. Her Majesty's Government, however, was unwilling to accept the "evasive letter" brought by Gholam Hussein Khan as Shere Ali's final answer, and determined to give him a short time for reconsideration. They demanded of him a full and suitable apology within a given time for the affront which he had offered; the reception of a permanent British mission within its territories, and reparation for any injury inflicted by him on the tribes who attended Sir Neville Chamberlain. Unless a clear and satisfactory reply were received from Shere Ali by Nov. 20, the Viceroy would be compelled "to consider his intentions as hostile, and to treat him as a declared enemy."

The British-Indian army has therefore commenced its invasion of Afghanistan, by crossing the frontier before daybreak on Thursday morning last. This was in the Khoorum Pass, advancing from the frontier station of Thull. The decisive step was taken, by a portion of General Roberts's force, at three o'clock on a cold starlit morning. The 10th Hussars crossed the River Ford, half a mile below the bridge, and took possession of the Southern Hills, cutting off the escape of the garrison of Kapatyanga. At the same time a company of the 29th Native Infantry slipped over the Khoorum River, a mile above Kapatyanga. At daybreak an advance force rushed across the bridge, advanced rapidly on the fort, and found the garrison had fled—only three children were left. It is stated that General Roberts observed the operations from a small fort on the British side. The Khoorum advance force has gone to take Fort Ahmed-ishah, five miles further up the valley.

The following are the precise details of the strength of the three divisions which are to operate against Afghanistan. These consist of the Quetta army, the Peshawur Valley Army, and the Khoorum column. The Quetta army consists of 12,590 men, of whom 3380 are Europeans; the Peshawur Valley Army of 16,364 men, of whom 7544 are Europeans; and the column of 5766 men, of whom 1816 are Europeans. The total strength of the three forces is thus 34,730 men, of whom 12,740 are Europeans. The Quetta army is now commanded by Major-General Biddulph, but the command will be taken by Lieutenant-General Donald Stewart on bringing up the Mooltan Division, for the advance to Candahar. The Peshawur Valley Army, led by General Sir Samuel Brown, as second to the Commander-in-Chief, General Sir F. Haines, comprises the Peshawur Moveable Column, of Brigadier-General Ross, and the Reserve at Hassan Abdul, under Major-General Maude, with the outposts. It is to march through the Khyber Pass. The Khoorum Column is under the command of Major-General Roberts, and is expected, after traversing the Khoorum Pass, to join the Peshawur Army on the road to Jellalabad.

It is expected that the Peshawur division will at once enter the Khyber Pass, attacking the fort of Ali Musjid, which stands upon a rock, five miles within the Pass, but is overlooked by neighbouring heights. Its position is well shown in the large Engraving we published a fortnight ago, from a sketch by Major C. Wilson, R.A., assisted by Major Cavagnari, Deputy Commissioner of Peshawur, showing the scene of the interview on Sept. 27 between Major Cavagnari and the Afghan Commandant, when Sir Neville Chamberlain's Mission party were denied passage on their road to Cabul. We are this week further indebted to Major Wilson for two Sketches, one showing the mouth of the Khyber Pass, taken by him on the 6th and the 10th ult., at the Advance Camp of the British force, at a place which is named "Hurri Singh ka Bourj," a short distance from the old Sikh fort of Jumrood. This name is derived from a famous Sikh chieftain, Hurri Singh, who was killed there fighting at the end of the war between the Sikhs of the Punjaub and the Afghans, when the Peshawur Valley was taken from the Ameer of Cabul by the celebrated conqueror Runjeet Singh of Lahore. The troops in the Advance Camp there and at Jumrood, six weeks ago, consisted of Major Manderson's Horse Artillery, Major Wilson's battery of Royal Artillery (heavy), one of Mountain Artillery, detachments of the 81st Infantry Regiment, 14th Bengal Native Infantry, 22nd Punjaub Infantry, Sappers and Miners, Sikhs, Guide Corps, and other detachments, under Brigadier Ross. The elephants with this force are likely to be very useful. Two or three of those animals appear in the Sketch; it is curious to see how cleverly they will cover their heads with straw against the heat of the sun.

In the Chamber on Monday last the election of M. de Fourtou, who was Minister of the Interior in the Cabinet of the Duc de Broglie, was declared invalid. An attack was made upon the Government on Tuesday from the Right in connection with a charge of favouring official candidates in the Hautes Pyrénées. A vote of want of confidence was pushed to a division, when it was negatived by 364 to 151.

The distance was fixed at thirty-five paces, and at the preconcerted signal each party fired one shot. Neither of the antagonists was hurt.

ITALY.

An attempt was made to assassinate the King as he was entering Naples in state on Sunday. The accounts given of the affair differ in some minor particulars. The version furnished by the Times' correspondent is that as the Royal carriage, in which were the King and Queen and the Prince of Naples, accompanied by Signor Cairoli, was entering the city a man who was among the trade associations which were drawn up with their banners, and who also carried a flag, suddenly lowered it and made a thrust at the King, wounding him slightly in the arm with a dagger with which he had armed the head of the staff. The King instantly drew his sword and struck the assassin on the head, and Signor Cairoli sprang to the ground and caught hold of the man, receiving at the same time a wound in the thigh. The captain of the Royal Cvirassiers secured the assassin, and, dragging him on to his horse, rode with him out of the crowd. Another account states that the assassin struck at his Majesty with a dagger hidden in the folds of a small red flag, and the King instantly swung round his sheathed sword and struck his assailant with the scabbard over the head. The assassin returned to the attack; the Queen cried out to Signor Cairoli to save the King, and as the man aimed a second blow the Prime Minister threw himself between him and the King, caught him by the hair, and received the dagger in his thigh, but held firmly on to his captive until he was secured by a municipal guard. The whole affair occupied but a few moments. The King afterwards appeared on the balcony of the Royal Palace, and, in answer to the enthusiastic cries of the people, rode, wounded as he was, through the principal streets of the city. King Humbert's health is stated to be such as to leave nothing to be desired. On Monday evening, in company with the Queen of Italy, he attended the performance at the San Carlo Theatre. A great demonstration of loyalty was made on Tuesday night before the Royal palace, the crowd which assembled being estimated at 80,000. King Humbert and Queen Margherita, together with Prince Amadeus, appeared on the balcony and expressed their thanks to the people. A Court dinner was given on Tuesday, at which several members of Parliament were present. On Wednesday the birthday of the Queen was celebrated. Extraordinary manifestations of the public joy at the escape of King Humbert were exhibited at Rome on Sunday night. On the Corso alone 50,000 persons assembled with flags and bands of music. In other Italian towns similar displays of popular loyalty have been made, and throughout the country the deepest indignation has been provoked by the murderous attack upon the King's life. The members of the Senate and Chamber of Deputies have forwarded congratulatory addresses to the King; and it is stated that he has received 4000 congratulatory telegrams.

The assassin is named Giovanni Passanante, is twenty-nine years of age, and is a cook by trade. He has confessed his crime, and declares that he was not instigated by any person to commit it. His general demeanour is one of cynical indifference. Several letters written by members of the International Society have been found at his house, and arrests of some Internationalists have in consequence been made.

At Florence on Monday, during the passage along the Via Nazionale of a procession forming part of a demonstration on account of the attempt on the life of the King, a bomb was thrown into the Corps of Veterans, by the explosion of which three men were killed and several slightly wounded. On the occasion of funeral honours being paid to Victor Emmanuel, the same body was the subject of a similar attack.

During a demonstration of students and citizens at Pisa on Tuesday evening in celebration of the Queen's birthday, a bomb was thrown amongst the crowd and exploded, but without doing much injury. The supposed author of the outrage was immediately seized, and with difficulty escaped the fury of the people.

Violent storms, extending over all Central Italy, and accompanied by torrents of rain, which continued without cessation for some days last week, caused an almost unparalleled extent of damage. All railway communication between Rome and the north was interrupted, and only one telegraph wire with Florence left standing. The Tiber overflowed its banks. The Ripetta, the Piazza of the Pantheon, Via Tordinona, the Piazza St. Angelo, Ghetto, and all the lower streets were inundated.

GERMANY.

The Prussian Diet was opened on Tuesday. Count Stolberg, the deputy of the Chancellor of the Empire, read the Speech from the Throne, which referred to the attempts upon the life of the Emperor William, and expressed a hope that the aberrations of Socialism would be vanquished by the co-operation of the powers upholding the State. The chief task before the Diet, the speech said, was the solution of the financial difficulties; and, until a remedy was provided by fresh taxation, the necessary resources would have to be furnished by a loan. At the sitting of the Lower House Herr von Beningsen, the President, referred to the attempt against King Humbert, and connected it with those against the Emperor, for whom three cheers were given with much enthusiasm. The subject was also referred to the Upper House. In Wednesday's sitting of the Lower House the former President and Vice-Presidents were re-elected by acclamation. Herr von Beningsen, the President, requested permission to express to the Emperor the sentiments of the House with regard to the painful events of the summer, and its participation in the general feeling of gratitude at his escape. The proposition was unanimously adopted. Herr Hobrecht, the Minister of Finance, then proceeded to lay the budget for the financial year 1878-9 before the House. He stated that the total deficit for 1878-9 was estimated at 73,750,000 marks. The Minister urged that to provide for this deficit the State should be relieved from the payment of its contribution to the Imperial expenses by the creation of special sources of income for the Empire itself, and by a reform in the system of communal taxation.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

It will be noted with general satisfaction that to-day (Saturday) is the closing one of the flat-racing season, for there is no disguising the fact that since the Newmarket Houghton Meeting sport all over the country has been of a poor description. The Thursday at Liverpool may be passed over almost without comment, though we note that Remorse carried his 8 st. 12 lb. home in gallant style in the Anglesey Nursery Plate, giving all sorts of weights to his eight opponents. Belphœbe had nothing but Whittlebury to beat in the Severn Cup, and though, with an advantage of 22 lb., he tried his hardest to cut her down, he had not the smallest chance when it came to racing at the finish. Belphœbe (9 st. 8 lb.) and Lord Clive (8 st. 10 lb.) were the most notable of the seven competitors for the Shrewsbury Cup; and the latter started favourite, though he had only a very slight call of Sunshade (6 st. 10 lb.). The heavy state of the ground was terribly against the top weights; and a long way from home the race was entirely confined to Sunshade and the Makeshift filly (6 st. 7 lb.), the former winning pretty easily by a length and a half. Jagellon (8 st. 11 lb.) was a very bad third, and the others trotted in at intervals. In receipt of 22 lb. from Julius Cæsar, Ambergris could scarcely fail to win the Newport Cup; and the gigantic son of Hermit has wound up his career on the turf in brilliant style with three consecutive victories.

This week, the last of the racing season of 1878, has been about the busiest of the year, as the Warwick, Manchester, and Kempton Park Meetings have all competed for the suffrages of the public. There has been no lack of horses or spectators at any of them, and yet little has taken place that is worth recording. The Midland Counties Handicap was the chief event at Warwick, and brought out seven runners, all of whom were backed at comparatively short prices. Red Archer (8 st. 12 lb.), the St. Leger impostor, carried top weight, but naturally was never dangerous with such a heavy impost; and the little-known Mistress of the Robes (6 st. 6 lb.), who had been well tried before leaving home, fairly ran away with the race, the disappointing Zucchero (8 st. 8 lb.) being placed second to her. A penalty of 16 lb. could not stop Avontes (11 st. 11 lb.) in the Great Autumn Welter Cup; and the Leamington Grand Annual Steeplechase produced a magnificent finish between the Irish horse Victor II. (10 st. 1 lb.) and Chilblain (10 st. 3 lb.). The former gained the verdict by a head, and Citizen (11 st. 2 lb.), who started a very hot favourite, was a poor third. A good field contested nearly every event at Manchester, and those two grand mares, Belphœbe (8 st. 12 lb.) and Placida (8 st. 12 lb.), ran in the Lancashire Cup. The latter seemed unable to act in the heavy ground, and finished absolutely last; but Belphœbe made a desperate struggle for victory, and only succumbed to Flotsam (7 st. 9 lb.) by a short head.

The Messrs. Tattersall held a somewhat important sale of blood stock at Albert-gate on Monday. Sheldrake, who promised to make a good hurdle-racer, went to Mr. Jousiffe for 800 gs.; and of Mr. Chaplin's four, Devotee reached just half that price, and Strike, who as a yearling cost 1500 gs., was now knocked down for 310 gs.

Some of the best coursing ever seen took place at the Altcar Club Meeting last week. Hares were not only plentiful, but, with scarcely an exception, ran strongly and well; and, except in one case, Mr. Hedley's judging and Wilkinson's slipping left nothing to be desired. Even in this one instance—the course between Safeguard and Myosotis for the Molyneux Stakes—Mr. Hedley was not to blame, as, from his position, it was impossible for him to see the whole of the spin. The Duke of Hamilton had matters pretty much his own way at the late Newmarket Champion Meeting; but even the performances of his kennel were eclipsed by those of the Earl of Stair at Altcar. The latter nobleman took two thirds of the Sefton Stakes by the aid of Stake Net, by Stranraer—Snowflake, and Sulphur, by Contango—Sweetbriar; he won the Croxteth Stakes with Silhouette, by Contango—Sweetbriar; the Altcar Club Cup with Sutler, by Bacchanal—Sweet Home; and the Molyneux Stakes with Safeguard, by Scamp—Sweet Home. Mr. Briggs was also in pretty good form, as his Brian, a very good young puppy by Donald—Ballet-Box, took one third of the Sefton Stakes; and Belle, by Blackburn—Topsy, ran up for the Croxteth Stakes. Braw Lass, who was backed so heavily for the last Waterloo Cup, won a couple of courses in the Altcar Club Cup, but was easily put out by Havoc in the second ties; and eventually old Handicraft ran up to Sutler, and looked like making a rare fight of it with him, had she not unluckily killed before she had time to wipe off the points that he had scored against her.

A second billiard tournament was begun at the Royal Aquarium, Westminster, on Saturday last. This time the play takes place on an ordinary match-table, and each heat is 500 up. Up to the time of writing, Joseph Bennett (ex-champion) and D. Richards have played splendidly, and the former appears pretty sure to win. We shall touch upon the chief features of the handicap next week.

The public are still apparently mad upon the subject of long-distance races; and this week it is the turn of the bicyclists, who are engaged in a six-days' race at the Agricultural Hall for the long-distance championship. The time for riding is confined to eighteen hours per day; and at midnight on Wednesday, or just half time, Cann had completed 613 miles 4 laps, and Edlin 586 miles 4 laps. These are the only two of the twelve original competitors who appear to have a chance of success, as Keen has retired, and Stanton is beaten off.

Lord Monck, Mr. Meldon, M.P., and Mr. David Plunket, M.P., were among the speakers. It was shown that the death-rate of Dublin was higher than any other city in the Empire. The Chief-Secretary promised that the subject should receive the anxious consideration of the Government.

THE MOUTH OF THE KHYBER PASS: A SKETCH BY MAJOR C. WILSO

., IN FRONT OF THE ADVANCE CAMP AT HURRI SINGH KA BOURJ.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

When the irreverent blacksmith in the story proposed to assault the itinerant preacher, he asked him whether he would "take it fighting" or "lying down." The reverend gentleman replied that he would "take it fighting;" and, to the astonishment and dismay of Mulciber, gave him a sound thrashing. The gallant King Humbert of Italy seems to have so much in common with the undaunted missionary just quoted that his Majesty declined to "take it lying down" when the rascally cook Passanante attempted to assassinate him. King Humbert took "it fighting;" parried with his arm the blow of Passavante's dagger, and swiftly administered with the hilt of his sabre a sounding thwack on the would-be murderer's skull. Passanante appears to have been subsequently cut down by a captain of cuirassiers, trampled under the hoofs of a charger, and beaten with sticks by some indignant students. Altogether the bloodthirsty coward had a bad time of it; still, the miscreant may be said to have taken high honours at cribbage. "One for his nob" (from the Royal sabre hilt) and "two for his heels."

I remember to have seen some fifteen years ago in Bedlam Edward Oxford, the whilom pot-boy, who fired a pistol at her Majesty in Hyde Park in 1840. When I saw him Oxford had been locked up as a criminal lunatic for five-and-twenty years. He was afterwards, by the Royal mercy, wholly released. The man had not at any time been mad; he was only slightly "cracked" with conceit and the desire to give himself importance; and he owned to me that his case would have been best met had he received a good horsewhipping. Public opinion from one end of the Continent to the other is irrevocably opposed to the infliction of corporal punishment; else a strikingly deterrent example might have been made of Hoedel by imprisoning him for life and giving him a sound flogging on every successive anniversary of his crime. By a similar process penal experimentalists once essayed to "put down" infanticide in Sweden. The schlague, however, has been abolished for good and all in Germany, so they were fain to get rid of Hoedel by chopping his head off. Passanante will, in all probability, be guillotined.

Prince Bismarck's "Table Talk," as reported by Herr Moritz Busch, continues to furnish food for alternately sarcastic and indignant comment in Parisian society and in the newspapers. I would not rashly attempt to cast the slightest doubt on the veracity of Moritz Busch; still, I own that I have experienced considerable difficulty in placing implicit credence in the story which he tells about the distinguished American General Sheridan. According to Herr Busch, when General Sheridan was a guest at Prince Bismarck's table at Versailles a conversation arose as to the conduct of the Bavarian troops in burning the village of Bazeilles, whereupon the American General (teste Herr Busch) remarked that the civil population in an enemy's country had no right to expect any clemency from an invading army; and that for his part he would leave them nothing but their eyes, with which they might weep over the miseries of war.

I am loth, I say, to believe that "Phil Sheridan," the Murat of the American Civil War, and as gallant, brilliant, accomplished, and humane a soldier as ever drew sabre, ever made the brutally epigrammatic remark imputed to him, and I shall be glad to see the gossip of Herr Moritz Busch authoritatively contradicted in the American press. I can, indeed, recall some formidably epigrammatic utterances made by Federal commanders during the Great Rebellion. It is true that General Ulysses Grant publicly declared that he would so lay waste the Secesh borders "that a crow flying across the Shenandoah Valley would have to carry his own rations with him;" still, the hero of Vicksburg did not say anything about making the peasantry weep. The farmers ousted by the Federal troops usually turned guerrillas or "bushwhackers" on the Confederate side.

Mem: The remark attributed to General Grant about the "last man dying in the last ditch" was made by William of Orange, our William III., nearly two hundred years ago. There is plenty of evidence in a book too little read in these days—the Memoirs of Sir William Temple—that the great Dutch warrior King could, on occasion, say very smart things. Temple narrates that William, when Prince of Orange, seeing a soldier who was running to the rear in the heat of a battle, gave him a smart cut over the nose with his sword, exclaiming, "Coquin! take that, in order that I may know thee again, and hang thee when the battle is over." I have an idea that the soldier so snipped over the nasal organ did not press into the front rank when the time came for distributing rewards for bravery.

There is a story of quite an opposite nature told of Napoleon I. and an orderly dragoon who was on horseback a short distance from the Emperor during an engagement. A shell struck the horse full in the chest, and literally blew him up, rider and all. "Le diable n'en reviendra pas:—the beggar will never come down again," quoth the Emperor, coolly. He put spurs to his charger and thought no more of the matter. But a few days afterwards, reviewing the cavalry division of his army, Napoleon observed a dragoon who was twisting his moustaches, bowing, and smiling, and grimacing in the most remarkable manner. "Who are you, and what is the matter with you," asked the Emperor, sternly. "May it please your Majesty," replied the trooper, saluting, "I am the beggar who came down again." He had escaped, wellnigh by a miracle, the fate of his horse; and somebody had repeated to him the Imperial comment when the shell exploded.

A la guerre comme à la guerre. Just now, when Jingoism is raising its blatant head again, and "harebrained chatterers" are prating so glibly about "a brush with the Afghans" and "hurling back the Russian hordes to their snow-clad steppes," I would, had I money enough, photograph and distribute, for the benefit of all and sundry, the wonderful etchings of Jacques Callot, the Horrors of War, and the ghastly aquatints of Francisco Goya, "Los Desastres de la Guerra." "I have seen it," writes the artist, underneath one of his most appalling pictures. Could I write four lines of poetry, I would translate into English, for popular reading, the magnificent "Ode à la Fortune" of Jean Baptiste Rousseau (not Jean Jacques), which contains one of the most terrific descriptions and one of the most eloquent denunciations of war ever penned. Many years have passed since I read that ode; but I will try to quote one of its most striking stanzas from memory:—

Quels traits me présentent vos fastes,
Impitoyables Conquérants!
Des vœux outrés, des projets vastes,
Des rois vaincus par des tyrans.
Des murs que la flamme ravage,
Des cités fumant de carnage;
Un peuple au fer abandonné;
Des mères, pales et sanglantes,
Arracher leurs filles tremblantes
Des bras d'un soldat effrêné.

There is glorious war, in a nutshell.

You will admit that I, or rather that wise old prophet, Nostradamus, was right in predicting the election of Mr. Frederick Leighton to the Presidential chair of the Royal Academy. Some of the French papers have gravely informed their readers that it is Mr. John Leighton who has been appointed "Directeur de l'Académie des Beaux Arts à Londres." This will be news, I should say, to the respected "Luke Limner." Another of the predictions of Nostradamus remains to be verified. He said something about the Good Queen making her loyal servant a Knight. It is a foregone conclusion, you may tell me, that the President of the Royal Academy should receive the honour of knighthood; but will anybody, or can anybody tell me whether the immediate successor of Sir Joshua Reynolds was ever "Sir" Benjamin West. Mr. Robert Browning, who knows more about the inner history of English art than any scholar living, might answer the question; but I am too much afraid of the author of "The Ring and the Book" to ask him.

It stated that the council recommended as vice-presidents the Marquis of Lorne and the Earl of Rosebery; and that the total number of members was now 606, against 563 last year. His Lordship dwelt upon the importance of the study of history, referring particularly to the love of historical studies which characterised the late Earl Russell, recently president of the society, and also pointed out the danger which attended a free State in which the passion for liberty existed without respect for the just rights of weaker nations or of subject or inferior races.—Dr. Charles Rogers, secretary to the Royal Historical Society, has been elected a foreign corresponding member of the Imperial Archæological Society of Russia.

The Lord Mayor presided on Monday at a meeting of the Council of the Hospital Sunday Fund. Wishing to remove the feeling which seemed to prevail that he was not favourable to the movement, he expressed his approval of the fund. As Lord Mayor, however, he was bound to consider the feelings of all parties connected with approved charitable agencies, and he thought the Mansion House was not the place where such an office should be established for a longer period than twelve months. It was only from a feeling of public duty that he had acted in the matter.

A Church mission has been held this week in York, under the sanction and control of the Archbishop.

At Downham, Isle of Ely, on Monday evening, after a successful meeting in aid of the Zenana Mission, presided over by the Rector, the parishioners presented the Rev. K. H. Smith with a handsome clock, as a tribute of respect, after three and a half years' faithful ministrations among them."

With reference to the new church at Bentley Mill, in the parish of South Weald, we are now asked to state that the Rev. C. A. Belli (whose munificence was noted in our last issue), finding that his first donation of £12,000 would be insufficient to build the church and parsonage and provide a suitable endowment, gave a further sum of £8000 in April last, making altogether the gift of £20,000.

The Rev. Dr. Plumptre, in preaching at St. Paul's Cathedral last Sunday morning on the subject of the impending conflict in Afghanistan, deprecated that war "with a light heart" which the voices of clamorous passion were eager to urge upon us, remarking that it was the duty of every minister of Christ to proclaim that they who "sow the wind" of an aggressive ambition should "reap the whirlwind" of a disastrous failure.

The Bishop of Salisbury opened the parish church of Buckland Newton, Dorset, on the 13th inst. The Early English chancel, which has trefoil hoods to its lancets, supported by Purbeck shafts, including seven memorial windows, was restored nine years ago, mainly by voluntary contributions. A mural decoration of the east end by Miss Gunning, daughter of the late Vicar, was added. The restoration of the church has now been completed, at a further cost of about £1800.

St. Michael's Church, Lewes, was reopened on Monday. The Bishop of Chichester officiated, and in his sermon said no loyal minister or member of the Church of England looked after prohibited usages or empty gestures, or used words borrowed from Romish sources and unknown to the great writers of our communion. He grieved when he observed these tendencies, because they were dangerous in themselves. They habituated men and women to modes of thought alien from our system, and encouraged religious disloyalty.

The parish church of Highbray, near Barnstaple, was recently reopened after a thorough restoration under the care of Mr. Ashworth. The work has cost £900, to which Sir T. D. Acland, M.P., and the Rector (the Rev. W. J. Edmunds) have largely contributed. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. At the luncheon (at which Sir Thomas presided) his Lordship said it would be a delight to any prelate to know that there was in his diocese a parish where such a spirit of harmony and goodwill prevailed as at Highbray—a remark in illustration of which it may stated that two years ago Sir Thomas Acland built a school, which is supported by a voluntary rate of twopence in the pound.

The Bishop of Chichester opened the parish church of Kirdford, Sussex, last Saturday, after restoration, at a cost of nearly £1000. It includes the rebuilding of the south wall of the nave, the removal of the galleries and pews, and entire renewal of the interior. The church has been paved with Minton's tiles, new floored, and fitted with open seats of uniform appearance. The ancient font and altar have been retained; but a reredos, after the design of Mr. Woodyer, the architect of the work, has been added, composed of Bath stone, Sussex marble, and alabaster. The altar-cloth, of dark crimson velvet, richly worked by hand in church embroidery, is the gift of Mrs. Barwell, of Barkford House, as well as the pulpit and lectern hangings.

On the 10th inst. the new Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, at Winderton, in the parish of Brailes, Warwickshire, which has been built and endowed by the Rev. Ernest Thoyts, Vicar of Honington, in the same county, at a cost of nearly £7000, as a memorial to his parents, was opened for Divine service. The little edifice is in the Early English style, with an arcaded porch, a circular apse, and a shingled spire. The architect is Mr. William Smith, of St. John-street, Adelphi, who is also restoring the mother church of Brailes. The windows, which are all of stained glass, are chiefly memorial, and have been executed by Lavers, Barraud, and Westlake. A fine triplet at the west end, representing scenes connected with Holy Baptism, has been inserted by the founder to the memory of his mother and his father, Mr. Mortimer Thoyts, late of Sulhamstead, Berks. One window, on the south side, was given by Mr. John Spencer, of Chelmscote, churchwarden of Brailes, in memory of his parents, who formerly resided at Winderton; and another, on the north side, by Mr Smith, the architect, in memory of one of his daughters, recently deceased. The font is a present from the Rev. F. Thoyts, Rector of Ashe, in Hampshire, a brother of the founder. The lectern was given by Mrs. Peel, widow of the late Rector of Rousham; and the site, which comprises three quarters of an acre, by the late Marquis of Northampton. It has been thought advisable to to defer the consecration of the church till the spring.

The Bishop spoke strongly of the importance of the mission in its connection with the University.

The following resolution endorsing the munificent proposal of Trinity College, Cambridge, to found a Professorship of History in that University to perpetuate the name of the late Bishop of St. David's, was passed by the Thirlwall Memorial Committee, at a meeting held at the Westminster Palace Hotel, last week—the Master of Trinity (the Rev. Dr. W. H. Thompson) presiding:—"The governing body of Trinity College, Cambridge, having announced that they are prepared to found a Professorship of History in the University, with an endowment of £500 a year, to be called the 'Thirlwall Professorship of History,' and, under certain conditions, with a fellowship annexed, provided that the Thirlwall Memorial Committee shall transfer to the college in trust the amount contributed by the subscribers to the memorial fund, resolved—'That, subject to the approval of the subscribers, the amount already contributed for this purpose, together with any further sums which may be subscribed, be handed over to the governing body of the college, to be applied towards making up the said endowment fund of £500 a year.'"

The subscriptions already received or promised for the extension of the buildings of University College, London, amount to upwards of £14,000.—At a meeting to be held in the Botanical Theatre, University College, Gower-street, on Tuesday evening, Dec. 3, an address on "The Use of Physiology to Medical Students" will be delivered by Dr. Michael Foster, M.A., F.R.S., Prælector in Physiology and Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

Lord Rosebery was elected on Saturday Lord Rector of Aberdeen University, by a majority over Mr. Cross, the Home Secretary. Lord Rosebery had a majority in three out of the four "nations" into which the University is divided. Mr. Cross had a majority in the "Angus" nation, consisting chiefly of English students.

The installation of Lord Selborne as Rector of the University of St. Andrews took place on Thursday. The ceremony took place in the Library Hall, which was well filled by the students and the public.

The Bishop of Melbourne has opened the new chapel of Trinity College, at Melbourne, and his Lordship's offer of £1000 towards the Endowment Fund has produced a like sum from the settlers in the western district. In a pastoral the Bishop urges that the quantum of religious teaching sanctioned by the London School Board might surely be allowed in the colony, and says of the existing system:—"What can be the effect of a merely godless education like this, but in commerce, feverish speculation and systematic knavery; in politics, selfish ambition, cruel animosity, and unscrupulous oppression; in social life, impurity, effeminacy, idleness, and inconstancy."

The Court of Common Council has resolved to remove the City of London School from its present position in Milk-street to a site at the east end of the Victoria Embankment.

At a public meeting held at Oldham yesterday week it was decided to erect a memorial to the late Mr. J. M. Cobbett, M.P.

At a meeting of corn merchants held at Dublin a resolution was passed adopting the hundredweight of 112 lb. as the standard weight of the trade in the sale of grain and flour in the Dublin market after Jan. 1 next. An amendment had been moved in favour of a cental, but this was lost, it being contended that the 112 lb. was more in accordance with the trade of the country.—At a meeting of the Liverpool corn trade on Tuesday resolutions were unanimously passed in favour of the cental as a standard weight.—Earl Spencer on Saturday last presided at a meeting of farmers, corn merchants, and millers at Northampton, when the following resolutions were carried:—"That grain of all kinds and the dry products thereof should be sold by weight only." "That the cental of one hundred imperial standard lbs. is the most convenient selling standard, and this meeting would be glad to see it become the legal denomination for general use."

Wednesday was the day appointed for a meeting of the Commission of the Established Church in Edinburgh, but as there was not a quorum of members no business was transacted. It has been arranged to nominate the Rev. Dr. Chrystal, of Auchinleck, as Moderator of the next General Assembly.—The Commission of the Free Church of Scotland met on Wednesday in Edinburgh. Dr. Adam, of Glasgow, reported that £82,000 of the £100,000 for Church extension had been subscribed. In presenting the report he said that there were about 500 congregations of the Church who had not yet reported, and these belonged to districts where there was the most need for Church extension. The consequence was that the whole work of Church extension was at a standstill. It was also, he considered, a wonderful thing that in times like the present the Free Church, without withdrawing contributions from one of its funds, had raised in twelve months the sum of nearly £42,000; he, however, held that, even though the whole sum had been subscribed, it would have been unwise now, when so many people were suffering from the monetary pressure, to call up the first instalment. Dr. Wilson reported that the contributions to the sustension fund had decreased by £4138, consisting principally in a deficiency of legacies. The Rev. James Chalmers Burns, of Kirkliston, was nominated as Moderator of the next General Assembly.

Extra Supplement.

BLOODHOUNDS ON THE TRAIL.

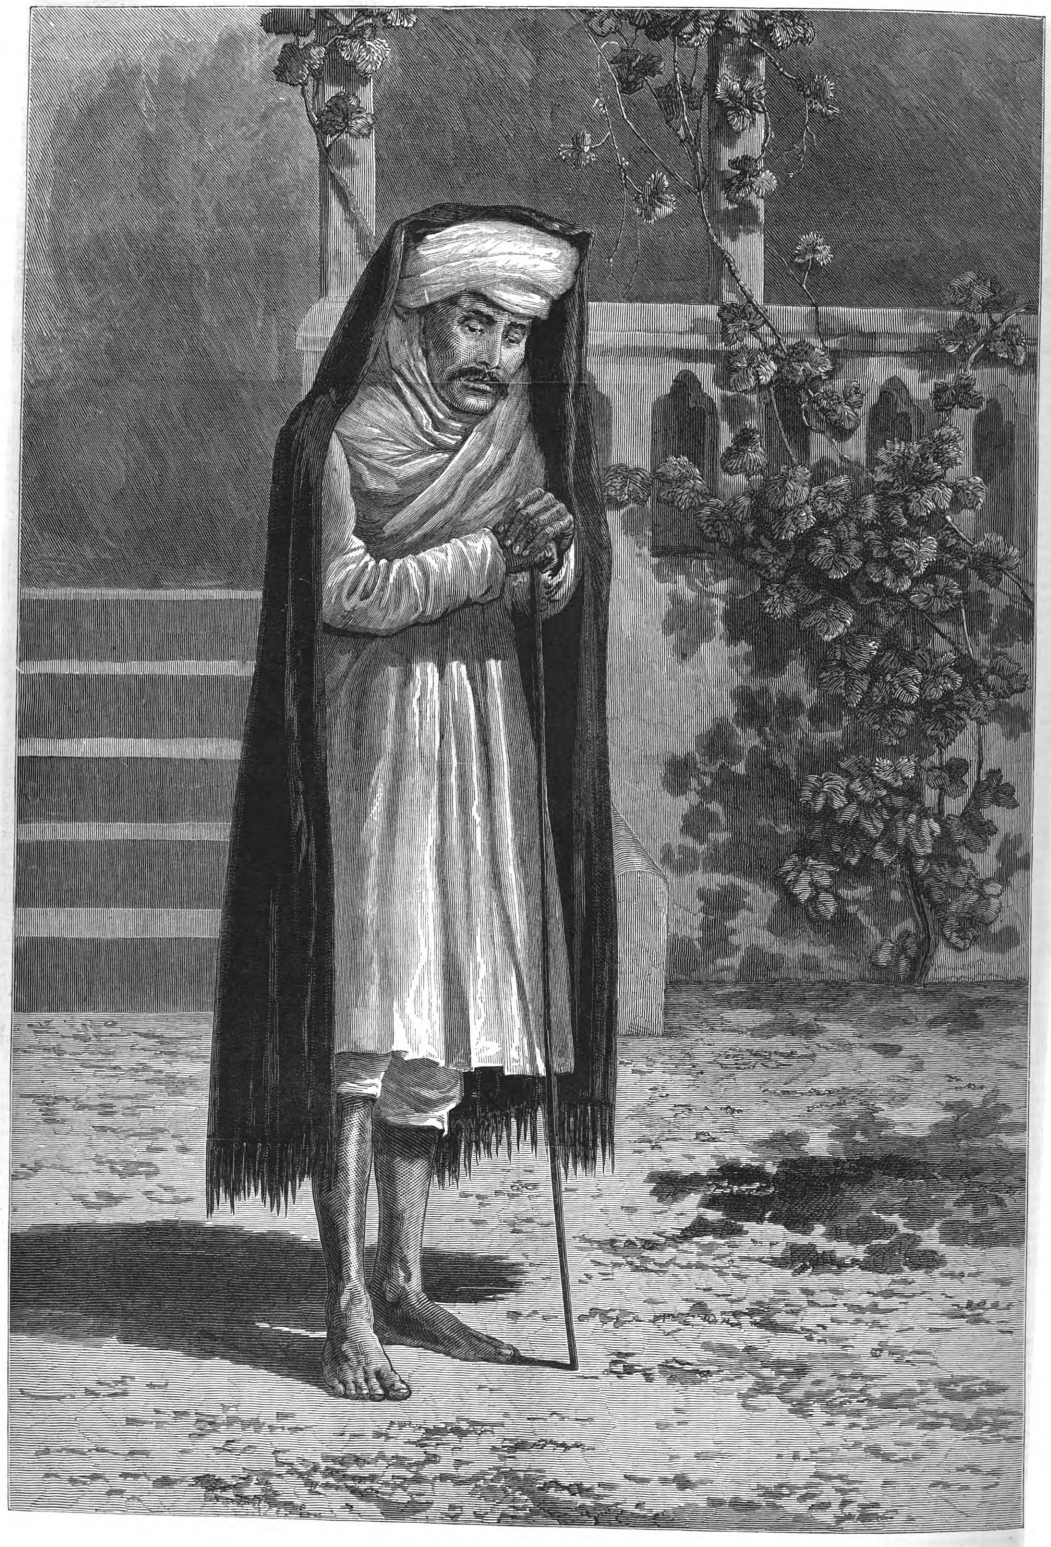
This drawing, by Mr. Goddard, who has before contributed to our Journal many spirited representations of animal life, gives an idea of the tremendous energy and intensity of purpose with which bloodhounds of the true breed will pursue their quest, sometimes for many miles, and during several days and nights, if permitted, following the scent of a fugitive man or beast—only a wounded stag, it may be, or an escaped criminal—a slave running from a tyrant master, or a spy in war-time lurking near the camp in a hostile country, or any other object of sufficient importance to be worth employing these powerful hunting-dogs. The bloodhound, in spite of his terrible name, is not a remarkably cruel and savage animal, but one of the most generous of the canine race; and we have seen him the beloved and affectionate playmate of little children on the parlour hearthrug, never causing the slightest alarm, and willing to watch Baby's cradle for hours together. He is certainly one of the noblest-looking of all dogs, as Sir Edwin Landseer's famous picture of "Dignity and Impudence" has taught the world to see; he has a mightly countenance and bearing, like a hero of the Court of Arthur, which commands our sincere respect; and we scarcely think of him as a brute, he seems to be such a perfect gentleman, honourable, grave, and valiant, and the soul of truth. This, however, is the individual character of the bloodhound, as he appears when admitted to human society. The hunting scene represented in our Engraving shows four or five of them in the full exercise of their native instincts and faculties, in the open field. They are very likely to come up with their game, whatever it be, after a brief course of further running.

AN INDIAN NIGHT WATCHMAN.

The sleepy figure delineated in our Artist's Sketch, of a man leaning upon his slender staff, and warmly wrapped up in the folds of his cotton garment, with turban and shawl covering head and shoulders, does not promise so much vigilance, outside the verandah of the Sahib's bungalow, as the Sahib's family and household property might seem to require. This must be a private watchman, not one of the "burkundaz," or regular public constables, who are kept on duty, as in European countries, for the official preservation of peace and good order. There has, indeed, been considerable improvement, of late years, in the organisation of the Indian police force. Two entertaining and instructive volumes, entitled "Life in the Mofussil; or, The Civilian in Lower Bengal," recently published by Messrs. Kegan Paul and Co., will tell the reader a good deal upon this subject, as well as upon other matters of detail in the judicial and municipal administration of India under British rule. We learn that, since 1861—at least in the Bengal Presidency—each of the large districts, with its own Civil Magistrate and Collector, has its own Superintendent of Police, an Englishman, of course, with a small army under his command, perhaps six hundred drilled constables, in uniform, and three thousand "chowkeydars" or village watchmen; the whole district being divided into a dozen sub-districts, each with its "thannah" or police-station, besides numerous outposts, in charge of inspectors and sub-inspectors. The public peace is well kept, in general, throughout British India; and there is little more risk of "dacoity," burglary or highway robbery, than in Great Britain or Ireland—including the suburban neighbourhood of Blackheath, near London.

THE RUINS OF SARDIS.

The view shown in our Engraving may be recollected among the Sketches of Oriental scenery exhibited by Mr. W. Simpson, our Special Artist, at Messrs. Colnaghi's, Pall-mall East, a few months ago. Sardis, where one of the Seven Churches of Asia, mentioned with solemn warnings in the Book of Revelations, was founded in the Apostolic time, is now a miserable Turkish village, about seventy miles inland from Smyrna. It was the rich and famous capital of the ancient kingdom of Lydia, one of whose monarchs, Crœsus, has been a proverbial example of wealth since the sixth century before Christ. Lydia was then conquered by the Persians under Cyrus; but the Ionian Greeks succeeded in recovering this city from Darius, with some help of the Athenians; and it became, in a later age, part of the Macedonian empire, and afterwards of the Roman. The Acropolis of Sardis, overlooking the valley of the Hermus, with its tributary stream the Pactolus, renowned for golden sands, has a very commanding aspect. It was crowned with a magnificent Ionic temple, the remains of which are extant, and there are traces of a grand theatre. Five miles north of Sardis, and near the lake named after King Gyges, are the tombs of the ancient Lydian Kings, amongst whom is Alyattes, the father of Crœsus. This potentate died in the year B.C. 562, after a reign of fifty-seven years. His sepulchre, which is described by Herodotus, was a vast mound of earth cased outside with stone, 3800 ft. in circumference—one of the largest of its kind. It has now the appearance of a natural hillock, conical in form, and commonly called the "Bin Tepe," beneath which King Alyattes may have long reposed, for aught we know, like the Agamemnon of Dr. Schliemann at Mycenæ, or the proudest of the Pharoahs, under his Royal Pyramid in Egypt.

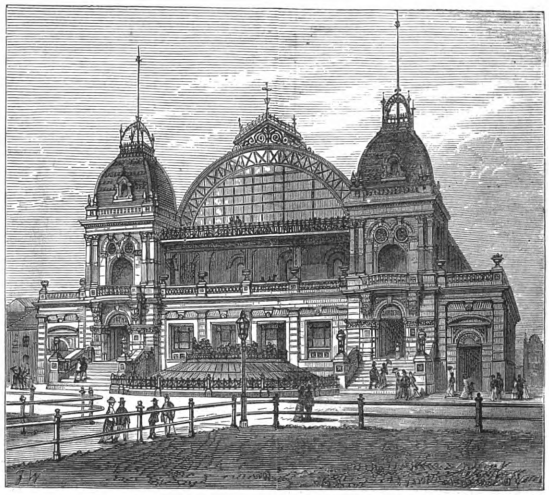


ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

The arrangements for the season before Easter are nearly completed. They include the Christmas course, by Professor Dewar, on "A Soap Bubble," beginning on Dec. 28. On the Tuesdays before Easter Professor E. A. Schäfer, the new Fullerian Professor of Physiology, will give twelve lectures on "Animal Development;" Thursdays, four lectures on "Electric Induction," by Mr. J. H. Gordon; and eight lectures on "Sound, including its Applications and Methods of Reproduction;" Saturdays, Professor H. G. Seeley on "Reptilian Life," Mr. Reginald W. Macan on "Lessing," Mr. Walter H. Pollock on "Richelieu and Colbert," and Mr. F. Seymour Haden on "Etching."

The Friday evening meetings will begin on Jan. 17, when Professor Tyndall will give a discourse on the Electric Light. Succeeding discourses will probably be given by Professor W. E. Ayrton, Mr. H. H. Statham, Rev. H. R. Haweis, Professors Roscoe and Huxley, Mr. E. B. Tylor, Professor Abel, Sir Henry C. Rawlinson, and Dr. Warren De la Rue.

Mr. John Westlake, Q.C., has been appointed Recorder of Lostwithiel, in the place of the late Mr. Nicholas Kendall.



Sir Thomas Wade, K.C.B., her Majesty's Minister to China, left London yesterday week for Paris, en route to China, via Marseilles. Several of the members of the Chinese Embassy were at the station to bid him farewell.

THE WESTERN UNIVERSITY, LONDON, ONTARIO.

The English Episcopalian Church, though not an Established Church in Canada, has there, we believe, at least half a million of adherents, and helps, by its social and religious influence, to make life in that colony more congenial to emigrant settlers from this country. In the Province of Toronto, and little beyond a hundred miles from the city of that name, which stands on the western shore of Lake Ontario, there is an inland city bearing the name of "London," situated on the river Thames. It is in the heart of the well-inhabited peninsula between Lakes Ontario, Erie, and Huron, probably the most fortunate and favoured part of Canada in respect to climate and soil. Here, at the lesser London of Canada West, is the episcopal residence of the Right Rev. Dr. Hellmuth, who presides over the Diocese of Huron, comprising thirteen counties and 148 townships, with a population of nearly 700,000 souls, and an extent of 12,000 square miles. The Bishop has, since his arrival there in 1861, by his personal exertions, and still more by his own pecuniary liberality at his private cost, founded several important educational institutions. We published, in the Number of this Journal for Feb. 19, 1870, an Illustration of the Hellmuth College for Boys, erected in 1865, to which Dr. Hellmuth, then only Dean and Rector of St. Paul's Cathedral in the colonial London, had devoted 80,000 dollars of his private fortune. It is now called "Dufferin College," after the late popular Governor-General of Canada. The Hellmuth Ladies' College, which had been formally opened by his Royal Highness Prince Arthur in September, 1869, was also described as having been erected by Dr. Hellmuth at the cost of 70,000 dollars; and a beautiful chapel has since been added. The Huron Theological College was established in 1862 by the joint efforts of Dr. Hellmuth and of the late Right Rev. Dr. Cronyn, his predecessor as Bishop of Huron, with the assistance of friends in England, one of whom, the Rev. Alfred Peache, endowed the Divinity Professorship with a gift of £5000. We have now to record the creation, by an Act of the Provincial Legislature, of a Western University of Canada, with its University College at London, which will, it is hoped, shortly be opened by the new Governor-General, the Marquis of Lorne, and by her Royal Highness Princess Louise. The University building, of which we give an Illustration, was originally known, since 1865, as the Collegiate Institute, but has latterly been called Hellmuth College, after its munificent founder. It is capable of accommodating more than a hundred students, and is now being altered, for its new destination as the University, by a colonial architect, Mr. Gordon Lloyd, of Sandwich and Detroit, under the directions of Bishop Hellmuth. Mr. Gordon Lloyd is nephew to Mr. Ewan Christian, the well-known church architect in England. The University charter bestows the prerogative of granting degrees, and other privileges of a University, for the Province of Ontario. The entire cost of establishing this University is estimated at £30,000, of which sum, we understand, about one third has been subscribed or given, £2200 being a fresh gift from the Bishop. The residents in the diocese have shown their zeal and liberality by raising, within a very short time, 35,000 dollars for the University. The Bishop of Huron is now in England, and is endeavouring to procure the requisite funds for its completion. We need say no more of his good works in Canada West; their value will no doubt be attested by visitors to that colony, as well as by colonists now in Great Britain. The Earl of Dufferin, while Governor-General, visited the Hellmuth Colleges, and has since annually presented medals of silver and bronze, to be competed for by the boys and girls of both colleges. We take this opportunity to give the Portrait of the Rev. Dr. Hellmuth himself. He is, we believe, a native of Poland, and of Jewish family, who was educated at Breslau, but embraced Christianity in 1841, then came to England, and went to Canada in 1844. He there entered the ministry of the English Episcopalian Church, and subsequently inherited a good private property, of which he has made, as we see, a very munificent use in Canada.

The Portrait is from a photograph by Mr. W. Williamson, of Toronto.

THE MORECAMBE AQUARIUM.

Three miles beyond the quaint little city of Lancaster, on the flat shore of Morecambe Bay, where a vast expanse, at high or at low tide, of shallow sea-water or shifting quicksands extends towards the distant mountains of the Lake country, there is a place now called Morecambe. It used to be called Poulton-le-Sands; and we remember it, a quarter of a century ago, merely a branch railway station with no traffic at all, a shut-up hotel, an ugly timber pier to which no boat was ever moored, and a dozen cottages, most of them vacant of tenants. But Morecambe has the finest possible air, and it is even possible to bathe at Morecambe when the tide comes in, and the far-off shores across the bay are beautiful in the remote prospect; but the place has few other attractions, and it was too distant from Manchester, which has found a more accessible and livelier watering-place at Blackpool; not to mention Southport and Lytham, on the Ribble estuary, or Rhyl and merry Llandudno, on the Welsh coast. But Morecambe is fortunately connected by the North-Western Railway, through the Settle and Skipton hill country, with Airedale, in the West Riding of York-shire; and the wealthy and populous manufacturing district of Bradford has discovered its nearest way to the Irish Sea, not much above fifty miles distant, at the sandy flats of Morecambe Bay. What Manchester had rejected, Bradford has taken up with such hearty and effectual favour, that the best part of the now rising village of Morecambe is the new residential quarter of Bradford. It comprises four departments—the baths, the aquarium, the winter garden, and the restaurant—each with a separate entrance in the front. There are two large swimming-baths for gentlemen and one for ladies, supplied with filtered sea-water, private lounge and slipper baths of warm water, medicated, sulphur, hot-air, and electricity baths, with the most perfect appliances. The winter garden is a hall 200 ft. long, 60 ft. wide, and 52 ft. high, with an arched roof of iron and glass, and is adorned with various plants, and with pictures and engravings; the aquarium consists of twenty-nine tanks, the largest 30 ft. long, ranged along the west side of the hall. Morecambe has gained by this establishment a valuable addition to her natural advantages, which the people of the West Riding seem to recognise. They are a hardy race, and not much afraid of the strong north-westerly gales, to which this open shore lies fully exposed.

Lieutenant-Colonel Knocker, on behalf of the members of the Granville Club, Dover, unveiled last Wednesday, in the presence of a large assembly, in the club-room, a fine lifesize portrait of the first president, Mr. Richard Dickeson, J.P., which had been presented by the members.

Colonel Inglefield, R.A., commanding the Hants Artillery Militia, has presented Captain Turnbull, R.A. (on resigning the adjutancy of that regiment) with a handsome silver-gilt tankard, on behalf of himself and the officers of the regiment, as a mark of their esteem and regard.

DEPARTURE OF THE MARQUIS OF LORNE AND PRINCESS LOUISE FROM LIVERPOOL FOR CANADA.

DEPARTURE OF PRINCESS LOUISE AND THE MARQUIS OF LORNE.

The departure from England of his Excellency the Marquis of Lorne, the new Governor-General of Canada, accompanied by his Marchioness, her Royal Highness Princess Louise, was the occasion of a farewell public ceremonial at Liverpool on Thursday week. The illustrious couple, having travelled by a special night train from London, with their Royal Highnesses the Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold, reached Liverpool about six in the morning. They were received on the platform of the railway station by the Mayor (Mr. Thomas B. Royden), the chairman of the watch committee, Major Greig, C.B., General Willes, and Colonel Daniels. Entering the carriages in waiting, the Royal party and their suite drove to the Adelphi Hotel. They were warmly cheered in their short passage to the hotel, a large crowd of spectators having assembled, in spite of the early hour and the keen frost. Ranelagh-street was brilliantly illuminated by the electric light thrown from the premises of Messrs. Lewis and Co., some of the neighbouring shops being also lighted up. The Adelphi Hotel was gaily decorated outside with bunting, and inside the entrance-hall there were festoons of flowers arranged in rich and dazzling profusion. The Royal party remained in the hotel, where a suite of rooms had been engaged, until ten o'clock. Having taken breakfast there, they drove to the Townhall, escorted by a detachment of the 5th Dragoons. The route was by way of Ranelagh-street, Church-street, Lord-street, and Castle-street, and was lined the whole distance by crowds of people, who heartily cheered the Marquis and the Princess and their illustrious relatives as they drove along. Punctual to the appointed time, a quarter past ten, the Royal party reached the Townhall, round which building a clear space was preserved by barricades, policemen, and volunteers. Having alighted, they were received by the Mayor, and were at once conducted up stairs, past a number of spectators, who lined the corridors and available places about the staircase, and into the large ball-room, where there was a crowded assembly of the leading inhabitants of Liverpool and the neighbourhood. Amongst those present were the Earl of Sefton, Sir Thomas Edwards-Moss, Sir A. B. Walker; Mr. David MacIver, M.P.; Mr. John Torr, M.P.; General Willes, commanding officer of the northern district; Colonel Berry, Colonel Govan, Captain Hare, Captain Cookson, Commander Elliott, Messrs. P. H. Rathbone, G. W. Moss, Clarke Aspinall, J. D. Rich, W. B. Forwood, N. Eckersley (High Sheriff), E. Whitley, and J. A. Tinné, as well as the members of the Town Council. There were, of course, a large number of ladies present. The assembly rose upon the announcement of the arrival of the distinguished visitors, who entered the room ushered in by the Mayor, and passed along a reserved space to a raised dais in the centre of the room. The Duke of Connaught led the way, and upon his arm leaned Princess Louise; Prince Leopold followed with the Mayoress, and the Marquis of Lorne came last, attended by members of his suite. Seats had been provided on the dais, but the Princess, her brothers, and the Marquis all remained standing during the whole of the proceedings, as did also the spectators. Without any delay the Mayor called on Mr. P. J. B. Aspinall, Q.C., the Recorder of Liverpool, to read the address of welcome which had been prepared by the Corporation. The address, which was elaborately illuminated, and bound in a crimson case ornamented with the arms of Liverpool and other devices, was then read by the Recorder. The address was then handed to the Marquis of Lorne, who passed it to his equerry. The Marquis then replied to the address in the customary terms; and, having thanked the Mayor personally on behalf of himself and the Princess, went on to say—

"I assure you that we shall not forget the attention we have received, or the great demonstration made by the people of Liverpool of the interest they feel in the good of Canada, and of the love borne by the old country for her children across the Atlantic. You who dwell at this great port, and see so many leave their native land for distant climes, will understand me when I say that we do not lightly leave you. The heart is often sad at leaving home when the ship is about to start and the anchor is being weighed, however hearty the farewell greetings of friends on shore. It is, however, the duty of those who go to look forward and not back; and it is pleasant to think that across the water we shall find ourselves among our own countrymen, having the same institutions as those we know here, and that under the same flag we shall find the same laws and the same determination to uphold and abide by them; the same love of liberty as here, and the same ability to guard it in honour and order; the same loyalty to the Throne for the same cause—because it is the creation of freemen, the bond of strength, and the symbol of the unity and dignity of the people. Where in the British North American provinces we do not find men of our own stock, we are fortunate in finding those who descend from the noble French race—that race whose gallantry we have for ages learnt to respect and admire, the friendship of whose sons, and their co-operation in the public life of Canada, which is adorned by their presence, is justly held to be essential to the welfare of the country; for nowhere is loyalty more true and firmly rooted than amongst the French Canadians, enjoying as we all do the freedom of equal laws and justice of constitutional rule. In conclusion, nothing has struck me more than the enthusiastic feeling manifested towards Canada among all classes of the community in England and Scotland wherever I have of late had an opportunity of hearing any expression of the public mind; crowds at any public gathering have always given cheers for Canada. This great gathering of to-day is a remarkable symptom of the same favourable augury; for a good augury I hold it to be that wherever there is any opportunity men in the old country are ready to call, 'Hurrah for Canada!' On the other side of the ocean they are as ready to call, 'Hurrah for the Old Country!' and these cries are no mere words of the lips, but come from the heart of great peoples. So long as the feelings which prompt these sayings endure—and endure I believe they will—we may look forward with confidence to the future, and know that those bonds of affection which have been knitted by God through the means of kinship and justice will not be sundered by disaster or weakened by time."

An address from the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce was then read by the President, Mr. W. B. Forwood; and, in his reply to this address, the Marquis of Lorne spoke further to the same encouraging effect. "It seems to me," he said, "but a short while since I last visited Canada; but in twelve years there is a great change to be seen. Twelve years ago the British North American provinces were only isolated colonies, bound together by no federal union, and lacking in the strength and deprived of the advantages of unity. Now the decrees of the central Parliament at Ottawa are passed by the representatives of peoples whose mandates are obeyed through all the broad zone of productive land which crosses that mighty continent, and the name of our Sovereign is hailed with the same affection as before, but by no mere collection of colonies, rather by a great federal people. It is for their welfare that you, on behalf of the merchants of Liverpool, express your confident hope, and the feelings of sympathy you have shown, will, I know, find a response on the other side of the Atlantic. I consider it of the highest value that such true expression of the affection entertained by the great commercial centres of England should be heard and known. The sentiment which makes the heart of the natives of these isles beat fast with the just pride of nationality when they see in far distant countries the flag of St. George, St. Andrew, and St. Patrick, is felt to the full by our colonists, who uphold the flag as speaking to them of the great days of old of which they, with us, are the heirs. This common loyalty to the Queen and pride in her ensign is a sure guarantee for the continued greatness of our country. You, gentlemen, have at heart the interests of commerce, and, as such, the peace and prosperity of the world. There is no better hope for this than in the unity between this kingdom and the great dependencies of the Crown."

After this ceremony in the Townhall, the Marquis and their Royal Highnesses showed themselves, on the balcony of the ball-room, to a great crowd of merchants, cotton-brokers, and other Liverpool men of business, on the "Exchange flags," or paved court of the Exchange, adjoining the Townhall. They were very heartily cheered. Having again entered the carriages, the Royal party drove to the landing-stage, the route being lined the whole way with a dense crowd of spectators. At the head of No. 4 bridge, leading to the stage, a guard of honour, consisting of one hundred men of the 11th Regiment, under the command of Colonel Corrie, was drawn up with their band, and received the party with a Royal salute and the National Anthem. Crimson cloth was stretched along the bridge and across the stage, and within the barrier a few members and officials of the dock board had assembled. The Mayor and Mr. T. D. Hornby received the Royal party as they alighted from the carriage in which all had ridden together. The appearance of Princess Louise, leaning on the arm of the Duke of Connaught, followed by her husband and Prince Leopold, was the signal for an outburst of cheering from the thousands congregated on the stage and the approaches to the bridge. Taking leave of the Mayor and Mr. Hornby, they went on board the special tender, the Stormcock. After a few minutes' delay the tender cast off and went alongside the Sarmatian, which was lying a short distance from the stage. Having arrived on board the Sarmatian, the Princess turned round and gazed at the shore for some time, and at the crowds on the stage and quay walls. The fine vessel moved slowly down to the river close to the Liverpool side, flying the Royal standard from the main and the Dominion flag of Canada from the foremast. As the vessel was moving away from her anchorage ground the band of the 11th Foot was marched down to the stage, and played the air, "Friends far from home," followed by some Scotch airs. The Duke of Connaught and Prince Leopold remained on board the Sarmatian until she was off New Brighton, when they took leave of the Princess and her husband, and returned in the tender to Liverpool, and thence to London.

We learn by telegraph from Halifax, Nova Scotia, that on Monday afternoon H.M.S. Black Prince, under command of his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, arrived at that port, in order to lead the naval squadron which will put to sea, towards the end of this week, to meet the Sarmatian and escort the Marquis of Lorne and Princess Louise into the harbour. At Halifax, in these days, a thousand labourers and mechanics are employed in erecting triumphal arches and decorations of all kinds for the reception of the new Governor-General and the Princess. The managers of the Intercolonial Railway are making extensive preparations for facilitating the journey to Rivière du Loup, and the oldest and most experienced officials have been appointed to take charge of the trains. This railway may be described as the eastern link of the great railway system, destined to stretch from the Atlantic to the Pacific, entirely through British possessions. But for the construction of this railway, the new Governor-General would have had to pass through United States territory, in Maine, in order to reach the seat of his rule. The whole railway journey to Montreal occupies about thirty-six hours, and the journey of the Viceregal party over this line may be looked upon as the formal inauguration of the new winter route into Canada. Our Special Artist, Mr. Melton Prior, has arrived from England on the opposite shore of the Atlantic, and will be ready to furnish us with Illustrations of the manner in which the Princess and her husband are to be greeted by the British North Americans, whose loyalty and hospitality are well known.

NOVELS.

Venus attired by the Graces is a meet parallel to the spectacle afforded when a popular writer's novel comes out adorned with illustrations contributed by "all the talents;" and such a spectacle—rare indeed—is afforded by Macleod of Dare, by William Black (Macmillan and Co.), a novel, in three volumes, to which a dozen artists of high standing, some with R.A. or A.R.A. attached to their names, have paid respect by travelling out of their usual line to contribute an illustrative drawing. Such a fact speaks considerably more than three volumes for an author's literary worth, though it may add little to the intrinsic attractions of his latest story, a romance concerning the Macleods of Dare. The tale, in many respects a noble and vigorous tale, may be read, though it was probably not intended to be satirical, as a satire upon that family, and, indeed, upon the whole race of Highlanders. It is a tale of love and revenge, of a love that maddened and of a revenge that was taken in a fashion unworthy of a man, let alone a modern gentleman, but not unworthy of a Byronic corsair, and quite in accordance with the many anecdotes which are told in the first volume about Highlanders in general and about the Macleods in particular, and which, tedious and purposeless as they appear at the time of telling, are perfectly justified in the sequel on the ground of a fixed intention, a preconceived purpose of preparing the reader for the ultimate catastrophe. Even thus regarded, there are many persons to whom the anecdotes are likely to appear more numerous than necessary for any other object than that of filling space, and who will think that art would have been better served by the choice of a single powerful, significant, premonitory example borrowed from the personal history of the Macleods alone. Of the revenge itself, one may say that it is sufficiently heroic in character to escape a charge of being cowardly, and even to assume a specious appearance of self-sacrifice, the self-sacrifice of a lunatic or, what is much the same thing, a jilted Highlander. Sir Keith Macleod, of Dare, the last male of his family, falls in love with an English actress, who, having visited his proud home in the Highlands, repents of having promised to be his wife, and throws him over for an English painter with a Jewish name. This, of course, is more than any Highlander, especially a Macleod, can bear; and we know that "to be wroth with one we love doth work like madness in the brain," a statement which Sir Keith proceeds to verify in a tragic and even diabolical manner. How he saved both himself and her from what he considered degradation must be discovered from the novel itself. It is written, whenever the scene is laid in the Highlands, and sometimes when it is laid elsewhere, a little in Ossian's vein, true grandeur alternating with windiness and rhapsody; and here and there, when the phenomena of nature and the relations of men with the elements are described, in the author's own masterly, impressive style, with the grasp of one who has studied sea, and mountain, and sky with something more than the merely artistic interest, and with all the artistic appreciation, of the poet and the painter. The story opens with a sketch of Castle Dare and its inmates; and by a few fine touches the reader is made to understand the peculiarities of a Highland household, with their pride and poverty, their stateliness and condescension, their reserve and affection, and, as regards the behaviour of inferiors towards superiors, their dog-like mixture of fidelity, obedience, petulance, familiarity. It is among the servitors, indeed, that the reader will find the most interesting types of character, the most striking sentiments, and the most amusing conversation. Macleod himself, for all his manliness and honesty, and notwithstanding his tragic fate, is not calculated to command unqualified admiration or sympathy; he talks a great deal too much for a man of action, and in his speech he shows almost as much tendency towards length as in his pedigree.

Excellent entertainment for novel-readers is to be found in the three volumes entitled Less Black than we're Painted, by James Payn (Chatto and Windus), a story in which the author of "Lost Sir Massingberd," and of many another more or less popular romance, displays some of his best characteristics. Here we have his gift of humour and his happy knack of hitting off human nature with a few neat touches—sympathetic, playful, ironical, or simply descriptive—very strikingly exhibited. He sketches with equal ease, equal fidelity, and equal drollery, High Church and Low Church, a French youth and an English youth, a proud squire and a low gamekeeper, a highly amusing but highly reprehensible old master of foxhounds; and he is especially successful, as he always is, in his delineation of womankind, whether old or young, whether plain or pretty, whether aristocratic, or merely ladylike, or truly woman-like, or downright vulgar. That the tale is loosely put together, and that many of the incidents are pitchforked into the pages after a fashion which suggests either a lack of definite purpose at the commencement or an oblivion of that purpose in the course of construction is the impression created by a tolerably careful perusal; but, if a sense of dissatisfaction with the whole as a work of art be unavoidable at the conclusion, that does not interfere with the satisfaction derived from a study of the component parts. As for the fundamental idea of the story, there is nothing new, no doubt, in the bare fact of a love-affair between a high-born youth and a low-born maiden; but there is a great deal that is new in the way in which the course of that love is depicted and traced to its issue, not to its conclusion. What that issue is must be discovered from the novel itself. Of the youth it will be sufficient to state that he is a young fellow of generous impulses, but deficient in mental and moral stability; that his chief weakness is a mania for spending money, even to his last shilling, and that his redeeming characteristic is constancy in love. Of the maiden it will be sufficient to state that she does honour to the author who created her, and who has already won for himself a considerable reputation for his delicate and charming creations of similar, and yet dissimilar, heroines. As regards her, however, there is just one point on which it is permissible to question the author's psychological truthfulness. It is quite impossible to believe that such a girl as he has represented her to have been would have dressed as he has represented her to have been dressed in the scene in which the camera obscura is employed with such serious and yet laughable results. It is almost as certain as life and death that such a girl, with such instincts, with such inborn refinement, with such intuitive perception of grace and fitness, would no more have dreamed of putting on such "things" than of appearing in public as Phryne appeared before her judges. For let it be noted that it is the heroine's innate dignity which, notwithstanding her occasional outbursts of ordinary passion, sustains her through life and commands the reader's favour and sympathy. Of her aunt, Susan Parkes, the dwarfish, disfigured, unselfish, angelic Christian, the goddess of the hungry little cripples, the miraculous flute-player, readers will probably have not enough, and yet too much; not enough, so far as she herself is concerned, and too much, so far as the necessities of the story are concerned; for she is one of the characters who tend to bear out what has already been hinted about the want of artistic mechanism, about the unequal adaptation of agencies to the completion of a fixed purpose. Sister Edith is not unlikely to obtain most suffrages as a portrait true to life, to womanhood, to the lights and shadows of human nature; and her aunt, Lady Earnshaw, will be accepted as an admirable specimen of a fine old English gentlewoman—eccentric, no doubt, but warm-hearted, shrewd, and sensible. On the other hand, the language which the author puts into the mouths of people occasionally sounds strange, as is often the case in his novels, and unlike the language of real life; and in one scene, at least, he exhibits an incapacity—which he not unfrequently exhibits—for sustained gravity and for restraining his ingenuity within such bounds as are required for solemnity. On the whole, however, he, who is always entertaining, has seldom produced a more entertaining book.

A few pages instead of two volumes would have sufficed to put a reader in possession of all the story that there is to tell in Auld Lang Syne, by the author of the "Wreck of the Grosvenor" (Sampson Low and Co.), a novel which, for all its crudeness and diffuseness, contains scenes and passages suggestive of latent power. The style of writing is noticeably deficient in ease and freedom; it is full of mannerism and affectation, and in spite of a certain exuberance in description, suggests the image of literature in a strait waistcoat. The title is justified by the main incident, the sudden disappearance of a young gentleman, who is carried off by a "press-gang." Now, the young gentleman was, at the very time, on his way to confess before the face of a sweet young woman's parents the fact that he had for some weeks been secretly married to her. Hence mystery, undeserved shame, parental ire, and general disturbance. The moral of the story, if any, is that young women, when they consent to a secret marriage in London, should at least make a note of the church (or its office) at which they are married, and of the date at which the interesting ceremony takes place; for parents, as well as other people, are apt to look very blank at a daughter who is perfectly certain that she was married one day, but knows neither when nor where and has no written evidence to produce.

Colonel F. H. Rich, reporting to the Board of Trade on the circumstances of a collision which took place at the Holyhead station on Aug. 31, says it was caused by "the simultaneous carelessness of all three guards" of the passenger-train.

The annual meeting of the National Education Union was held at Manchester on Monday. Mr. W. Egerton, M.P., Mr. Birley, M.P., Sir J. Kennaway, M.P., and others strongly urged that there was still a pressing necessity for the union, and it was resolved that the committee should pay special attention to the rating of elementary schools, the remission and payment of fees by school boards and guardians, and the lavish expenditure upon board schools.

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The specialty of last week was the first appearance here on Saturday of Mdlle. Ambre as Violetta in "La Traviata." The young lady, who comes from Oran, in Algeria, belongs to a distinguished Moorish family, and has recently achieved much success in Paris, where she first appeared in the same character as that chosen for her London début. She has a good stage presence; and her acting, after the nervousness of her first entry had subsided, was earnest and forcible, yet natural. Her voice is a bright and flexible soprano, reaching easily to D flat in alt, and her execution and intonation are true. She soon established her success by her excellent delivery of the scena "Ah! fors' è lui" in the first act, the "andantino" of which was given with much sentiment and refinement, the concluding "allegro" having been a fine display of brilliant bravura singing. In the duet with the elder Germont and in that with her lover, Alfredo, in the second act, Mdlle. Ambre sustained the highly favourable impression previously made, and confirmed her success by her excellent performance in the final dying scene, in which genuine pathos was realised without exaggeration. The débutante bids fair to prove a great acquisition to our opera stage. Signori Runcio and Mendioroz both sang effectively in the characters, respectively, of the elder and younger Germont. "La Traviata" was to be repeated on Thursday, with the second appearance of Mdlle. Ambre.

"Il Flauto Magico" was given on Monday, for the first time this season, with a cast in most respects similar to that of previous occasions. As Pamina, Mdlle. Alwina Valleria repeated a performance the merits of which were commented on during the past summer season, and Mdlle. Marimon's brilliant execution of the bravura music of the Queen of Night was again a special feature. Signor Mendioroz was a vivacious Papageno; and other parts were filled by Signor Carrion (Tamino), Herr Behrens (Sarastro), and Signor Rinaldini (Monostatos); the co-operation of Madame Trebelli, Mdlle. Bauermeister, and several members of the company, in subordinate characters, having contributed to the general efficiency.

The other announcements of the week were repetition performances: "Carmen" on Tuesday and this (Saturday) evening; "Dinorah" on Wednesday, "Der Freischütz" on Friday, "Faust" being promised for this (Saturday) afternoon.

At last Saturday's Crystal Palace concert Mr. George Magrath made his first appearance there. Of this young American gentleman's special executive powers as a pianist we have several times had occasion to speak, and have again to record his success on Saturday, when his performance consisted of Rubinstein's concerto in D minor (No. 4). The solo portion of the concerto presents some of the greatest difficulties to be found in modern pianoforte music, having been written specially for the display of its composer's exceptional powers as a bravura pianist. Mr. Magrath's successful accomplishment of so arduous a task gave fresh evidence of his executive skill, and the impression produced was so favourable that he was recalled to the platform after the close of his performance. Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Beethoven's symphony in C minor, and two pieces of ballet music from M. de Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah," were the other instrumental portions of the programme. Madame Pappenheim and Mr. Barton McGuckin were the vocalists.

A series of weekly Saturday evening concerts was inaugurated at St. James's Hall last week, the programmes being modelled after those of the London Ballad Concerts. The performances were of a similar popular character, having consisted chiefly of songs and ballads by past and present composers, most of which were encored. The vocalists were Mesdames Sherrington, Osgood, Nouver, Patey; Misses Helen Meason, Annie Butterworth; Messrs. V. Rigby, W. Clifford, R. Abercrombie, and Maybrick. Mr. Abercrombie appeared in lieu of Mr. E. Lloyd, who was indisposed, another substitution having been that of Signor Tito Mattei, who contributed some brilliant pianoforte solos, in place of Madame Arabella Goddard, who is still suffering from an inflamed finger. A duet for harmonium and pianoforte was well played by Messrs. J. M. Coward and H. M. Higgs; and an effective cornet solo was executed by Mr. Howard Reynolds. Mr. Ganz and Mr. Thouless were the conductors.

Mr. Joseph Barnby, the conductor of the Albert Hall Choral Society, was presented on Monday evening, by the members of the choir, with a service of silver plate, of the value of £200, in recognition of his "professional talents, and of the courtesy and patience with which those talents had been exercised for their instruction and recreation."

We had occasion last year to speak of the excellent concerts given by the Hackney Choral Association at the Shoreditch Townhall. A new series of performances began there on Monday evening, again under the conductorship of Mr. E. Prout, through whose judgment and skill these concerts have assumed their present high and special position. The efficient chorus-singing of the society was specially displayed in Schumann's elaborate and difficult music to the third part of "Faust." An exceptionally good band (comprising many of our best instrumentalists) gave effect to the important orchestral details of Schumann's score, and to a selection from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, in which, also, the female members of the choir proved their high efficiency. Other less important items completed an interesting programme. Mr. Prout conducted with great ability.

Dr. Hans von Bülow was the pianist at this week's Monday Popular Concert, his solo performance having been Schumann's Fantasia in C (op. 17,) in which his special powers and individuality of style were grandly displayed; as also in Brousart's trio in G minor, and Schubert's rondo brillant for piano and violin. The quartet party consisted, as before, of Madame Norman-Néruda, Mr. L. Ries, Mr. Zerbini, and Signor Piatti. Mrs. Davison produced a marked impression by her fine singing in Mr. Sullivan's "Orpheus with his lute," and Rubinstein's "Du bist wie eine Blume." Mr. Zerbini was the accompanyist.

An interesting concert (to which we have previously drawn attention) was given on Tuesday evening at St. James's Hall by the Normal College and Academy for the Blind, the pupils and professors of which excellent establishment were associated with a fine orchestra of about eighty instrumentalists, the performances having been conducted by Dr. Hans von Bulow, whose symphonic ballad, "Des Sängers Fluch," was given for the first in London. The text of this work is based on a poem by Uhland. The music consists of a series of orchestral passages, of a generally gloomy character, in which there is some clever writing in the eccentric style of Liszt. Another novelty was the "Danse Macabre" ("Todtentanz") of Franz Liszt, a paraphrase of "Dies Iræ," for piano and orchestra, comprising some skilful treatment of the hymn referred to, but also containing much that is wild and incoherent. The excessively difficult pianoforte part was brilliantly executed by Mr. Frits Hartvigson. Besides conducting with his well-known energy these pieces and a fine performance of Beethoven's symphony in C minor, Dr. von Bülow played Beethoven's solo sonata in E flat (from op. 31) with great energy and passion. Another solo performance—in this case with orchestral accompaniments—was Beethoven's romance in F, for violin, very expressively rendered by Prince Alexander of Hesse, a sightless violinist and pupil of the college. The concert opened with Gade's graceful "Spring-Song," for solo voices, orchestra, and pianoforte. The vocalists were also pupils of the college, the pianoforte part having been well sustained by Master Schwier. During the evening the "Slumber Song" from Bach's Christmas oratorio was expressively sung by Miss Reece, and two part-songs (by Robert Franz and Sterndale Bennett) were well rendered by pupils of the college. The concert was a very interesting one, and it is to be hoped will bring aid to the funds of the excellent institution at Upper Norwood.

The first of two pianoforte recitals was given by Dr. von Bülow at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, when his programme comprised the last five solo sonatas of Beethoven. A notice of the performance appears in another part of this issue.

The third of the present series of London Ballad Concerts took place at St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening, when the programme was again of an interesting and varied nature.

The second of Mr. J. S. Shedlock's "Classical Musical Evenings" took place on Wednesday at the Royal Academy of Music, the first part of the programme comprising a selection from Weber's pianoforte music, the second portion including Schumann's pianoforte trio in D minor.

The opening of the forty-seventh season of the Sacred Harmonic Society was announced for yesterday (Friday) evening, with performances of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," the solo singers announced being Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Suter, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson.

A new series of Madame Jenny Viard-Louis's excellent orchestral concerts, at St. James's Hall, is to begin on Tuesday next, conducted, as before, by Mr. Weist Hill.

The programme of the Brixton Choral Society's concert on Wednesday next comprises Dr. Stainer's sacred cantata, "The Daughter of Jairus," and Haydn's First Mass. Dr. Stainer's cantata was written for, and produced with great success at, the Worcester Festival in September last, as recorded by us at the time.

According to the Morning Post, it has been finally determined that the works at the new opera-house on the Thames Embankment, which have been at a stand for more than two years, are to be actively resumed, and the building completed for its original purpose in time for the opera season of 1880.

Our excellent prima donna, Madame Rose Hersee, has been engaged to appear at Melbourne in March next. It is said that the terms agreed on with the manager of the Melbourne Opera-House company, Mr. W. S. Lyster, are for a sum of £5200. Madame Hersee's husband, Mr. Arthur Howell, accompanies her, in the capacity of stage manager to the Melbourne establishment, an office which he recently held in the Carl Rosa Opera company. There can be no doubt that Madame Hersee will meet with a success in Australia similar to that which she has justly gained in this country by her versatile powers and accomplishments.

We adverted last week to the premature death of Mr. J. L. Wadmore, the young baritone singer, who had recently gained a distinguished position in his profession. It is grievous to hear that his career of success had been too brief to admit of his leaving any provision for his widow and child, for whom a subscription is now being raised. The honorary treasurers are Messrs. Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co., 84, New Bond-street, and W. Gill, Esq., Royal Academy of Music, Tenterden-street, Hanover-square; the hon. secretaries being H. Guy, Esq., and S. Lucas, Esq., at the first-named address. Subscriptions are received by these gentlemen.

THEATRES.

At Drury Lane an entirely new bill has been presented to the public, beginning on Saturday, and evidently designed to continue until Christmas. The programme commences with a new comic ballad, entitled "The Plantation." It is supported by the celebrated Lauri family, and is a sort of negro festival, in which a host of Ethiopian auxiliaries form themselves into picturesque groups, shouting, singing, and dancing in the most eccentric manner. The second piece is the compressed version of Colman's comedy, "The Jealous Wife," in which Mrs. Hermann Vezin sustains with great force and comic vis the principal rôle of Mrs. Oakley. Mr. Oakley is fairly interpreted by Mr. J. C. Cowper, and the Major by Mr. John Ryder. Many characters and much dialogue are necessarily omitted; nevertheless, full effect is given to the central figures, and great amusement is derived from the concentrated interest and rapid progress of the general action. At half-past eight the stage is ready for the celebrated drama of "Belphegor," in which Mr. Charles Dillon won his earliest London successes. This actor is the prince of Bohemians, and thoroughly exhibits the famous mountebank in his various phases, humorous and pathetic. His command over the feelings of his audience is extraordinary, and placed him immediately in the first rank of our actors. The course of events has now given him the front position, and doubtless the national drama must for some time to come acknowledge him as its leader. We trust that he will take full advantage of the opportunity, and aim at the highest obtainable results. The very important part of Fanfaronade is thoroughly impersonated by Mr. S. Calhaem. Miss Wallis's Madeline, too, is very fairly executed; and the villanous part of Laverennes is effectively interpreted by Mr. Howard Russell. Mr. John C. Cowper looks sufficiently aristocratic as the Duc de Montbazon, and Miss Hudspeth as Zephyrina is charming. The general get-up, accessories, and costumes are magnificent. The performance on Saturday excited unwonted enthusiasm, and the curtain fell to the most demonstrative applause.

Some interesting revivals have varied the programme of the Gaiety. Mr. Edward Terry has given new life to "Paul Pry," and Miss Kate Lawler appears to advantage as the contriving waiting-woman Phœbe. The cast on the whole is satisfactory. Mr. H. J. Byron has also modified his version of Diavolo and the brigands, and reproduces it under the title of "Young Fra Diavolo, the Terror of Terracina." There is much ingenious condensation in this improved version, and a variety of hits that are new. Miss E. Farren is inimitable as the heroine. Miss Kate Vaughan appears as Zerlina, and Mr. T. Squire and Miss Amalia are amusing as Sir Simpleton and Lady Simon. Mr Edward Terry and Mr. E. W. Royce exaggerate the two rogues, Beppo and Giacomo, with advantage. The accessorial characters are brilliantly costumed; and the accompanying music, by Herr Meyer Lutz, is exceedingly good. The scenery by Mr. Banks is ingenious as well as appropriate.

Hamilton's Panorama at the Holborn Amphitheatre—which it is announced is henceforth to be known as "Hamilton's Royal Amphitheatre"—assumes that the passengers, being seated in their handsomely-fitted compartments, start, under the guidance of Mr. Winter Haigh, from Euston-square Terminus, and, reaching Liverpool, embark on board a first class steamer, from which they land at New York, cross and recross the great American Continent, and return home viâ Queenstown, all in the space of 120 minutes—a speed unprecedented in the annals of travelling. Vast tracts are traversed of prairie and mountain ranges, which the pencils of such scenic artists as Telbin, O'Connor, Fenton, and others equally well known to the London public, have made realistic. Allegorical pictures are added appealing to the patriotism of peoples, and there are some really surprisingly sudden changes of effect—as, for instance, in the case of the City of Boston in Flames to the city of Boston snow buried; or the Falls of Niagara on a summer evening to the same volumes of water under the fearful aspect of a winter sky. Throughout the tour appropriate music, both vocal and instrumental, accompanies the voyageurs. It is matter for remark that the greatest applause is bestowed upon the negro humourists and melodists introduced into the plantation-scenes, some of whose performances are most absurd. At the close a "Panstereorama of Passing Events" at once transports the spectators from the Western to the Eastern Hemisphere, including a view of the blowing up of a Turkish monitor by a torpedo, the riding at anchor of the British fleet in the Dardanelles, the hoisting of the British flag in Cyprus, and the landing of the British troops in our latest dependency.

The will (dated Sept. 28, 1874) with a codicil (dated April 10, 1875) of Mr. John Hewetson, formerly of Newland, but late of Lansdowne-terrace, Kingston-on-Hull, who died on the 17th ult., was proved on the 5th inst. by the Rev. There are legacies to servants; and the residue of his real and personal estate he leaves to his said two sons.

The will, as contained in papers A, B, and C (dated Aug. 17 and 18, 1878) of Mr. Thomas Ball, late of Nottingham, banker, who died on Aug. 19 last, was proved on the 8th inst. by William Ball, the brother, William Lings, the nephew, and Thomas Isaac Birkin, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £30,000. Among the legacies may be mentioned £100 to the Nottingham General Hospital and £50 to the Congregational Church at Ilkeston; his farm and lands at East Norton the testator devises to the use of his brother William Ball for life, with remainder to his son John. The residue of the personalty is directed to be laid out in the purchase of realty, to be settled on the same uses as those declared of his freehold property.

An intimation has been received from the solicitor to the executors of the late Miss Alice Atkinson, of Giggleswick, near Settle, stating that she has bequeathed £100, free of duty, to the National Education Union.

A decree was issued in Chancery yesterday week for the administration of the estate of the late Dr. Fraser, of Hampstead. He had bequeathed £10,000 to the Edinburgh University, but revoked it on learning that in its medical schools vivisection was practised, and then transferred the bequest to the Scottish Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

ART.

Under the name of "Muralis," or "Sunbury Wall Decoration" (so called from the place of its manufacture), Mr. Frederick Watson, the inventor of linoleum, has introduced a new and highly interesting modification of that material, many examples of the application of which—to the walls, frieze, cornice, and dado of a room, to screens, &c.—may now be seen in the inventor's house in Berners-street. We need not hesitate to say that "Muralis" is destined to play a very important part in the present revival (which was so much needed) of the arts of internal wall embellishment; and we commend it to the attention of architects, artists, decorators, and upholsterers, as, under certain conditions, a desirable substitute for paper-hangings, wainscoting, stamped leather, carton-pierre, papier-maché, plaster ornaments, tiles, and, in some cases, even for wood carving. Linseed oil, Mr. Ruskin tells us, is one of the most durable of natural products—thatis, when oxidised by long exposure to the air, or by boiling with a small admixture of oxide of lead; and the perfect preservation of many works of the oldest of Old Masters is a sufficient proof of the assertion. Muralis is composed of oxidised linseed oil combined with fibre rolledon to a cotton fabric. While still soft it is stamped with metal dies, which, of course, may be prepared with intaglios of any pattern in any style, and of considerable boldness or depth. The reliefs thus yielded reflect light from their edges and embossed faces, and, as the reliefs may be of various planes, the light may further be reflected from additional angles of incidence, thereby producing a very agreeable "broken" effect. The texture or surface of the material itself being, moreover, neither too dull or matte on the one hand, nor too lustrous or obtrusive on the other, a subdued yet rich effect is obtained, which furnishes, as may be required, breadths of quiet ornamentation, like the background of a picture, or an admirable basis for parcels-gilding, or colouration by printing, or picking out by hand. The self-colour of the material appears to be (though we presume it may widely vary) a warm grey, approaching fawn-colour, which would furnish a telling foil for black and gold. Almost the only treatment of the material which struck us as mistaken in taste was the imitation of wood-carving. The reliefs, it need not be said, have not the charm of hand-work, and the monotonous stain has none of the textural marking and play of colour of the natural wood. One great advantage of Muralis is its durability. It is almost as little susceptible to damage as gutta-percha, hence it is peculiarly adapted for dados. But it has many other recommendations as regards convenience, cleanliness, and hygiene. It is nearly impermeable to damp—entirely so when fixed by a waterproof cement. It is a bad conductor alike of cold and heat. It may be washed with water or dilute acid—a most important consideration where there is any suspicion of infection. Last, not least, it is, in proportion to its decorative value, comparatively inexpensive.

In the direction of art, and its rapidly-increasing applications to industry, will probably be—nay, have been—found the best and widest openings for improving the social position of women, by furnishing elegant and congenial occupation, or suitable and remunerative employment. This consideration induced us, in May last, to draw attention to the advantages presented by an "Art College for Women," then recently established at Rome—that marvellous city

OBITUARY.

MARCHIONESS DE CASTEJA.

Eliza Margaret de Biandos Scarisbrick, Marchioness de Castéja, wife of Léon Rémy de Biandos, Marquis de Castéja, died on the 13th inst., at her seat, Scarisbrick Hall, near Ormskirk. This lady, a great landed proprietor in Lancashire, was born Jan. 26, 1810, second daughter of Sir Thomas Windsor Hunloke, Bart., of Wingerworth Hall, Derbyshire, by Anne Eccleston, his wife, sister and heiress of Charles Scarisbrick, Esq., who was reputed one of the wealthiest commoners in England. The Marchioness came into possession of the Scarisbrick estate at the death of her mother, March 6, 1872, and has always been noted for her charitable munificence, and for the costly improvements undertaken on her estates. Her death was sudden. Her remains were removed for interment in the family mausoleum at Wingerworth. She leaves no issue.

The meeting was presided over by the Earl of Chichester, Lord Lieutenant of Sussex. A report was submitted of the good done by the institution during the past year, including the treatment of 1454 in-patients and 7676 out-patients from all parts of the country; and it was resolved to signalise the jubilee year by starting a fund for the establishment of a convalescent home in connection with the institution.

A correspondent of Social Notes states that she will give a prize of ten guineas for an essay on the subject of servants' clubs, considered in relation to domestic service—viz., the effects of such clubs as at present constituted in producing many of the evils complained of with reference to the undue independence of servants, and the difficulties experienced by employers in maintaining good order and efficiency in their households. The authors should also consider whether the evil influences of such clubs would be more effectually met and corrected by legal enactment or by some combined action on the part of employers of domestic servants. The essays, which should be of moderate length, must be sent to the office of Social Notes on or before Jan. 1, with a signature, and in a sealed envelope the real name and address of the writer with the signature.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

BOAZ (Bayswater).—We are unable to follow your method without the aid of diagrams. The puzzle of the Eight Queens was, however, elaborately treated by the late Major Jaenisch, in his work on the application of Mathematical Analysis to the Game of Chess. It is there stated that the puzzle can be solved in ninety-two different ways—a conclusion that appears to differ from yours.

T G (Smethwick).—Thanks for the problem.

MINUTES and PERSEVERANCE.—The question—What is the best first move in a game of chess? is a larger one than you appear to suppose. The one most in favour is P to K 4th, and that is decidedly preferable to playing either of the Knights.

PROBLEM No. 1814.

By W. GRIMSHAW.

(From the forthcoming work, "Chess Chips.")

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play, and mate in two moves.

THE COUNTIES CHESS ASSOCIATION.

The following Game occurred in the last Tourney of this Associat'on between Mr. E. THOROLD, the winner of the first prize, and the Rev. Mr. EARNSHAW.

(King's Gambit declined.)

WHITE (Mr. T.)	BLACK (Mr. E.)
1 P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. P to K B 4th	B to B 4th
3. Kt to K B 3rd	B to Q 3rd
4. P to Q 4th	P takes P

This move is rarely adopted in practice, and it is certainly inferior to 4. B to B 4th.

5. B to Q 3rd

The Handbook gives the following continuation:—

a. Kt takes P	Kt to K B 3rd
6. Kt to Q B 3rd	B to K Kt 5th
7. B to K 2nd	B takes Kt
8. Q take B	B takes B
9. Kt takes B	Q to K 2nd
10. Kt to Q B 3rd	Kt to Q B 3rd, and Black has the better game.

5.	Kt to Q B 3rd
6. P to Q R 3rd	B to K Kt 5th

6. K Kt to K 2nd, followed by 7. P to B 4th, appears to lead to a speedier as well as safer development of the pieces.

7. Castles	K Kt to K 2nd
8. P to K R 3rd	B takes Kt
9. Q takes B	P to Q R 3rd
10. K to R 2nd	P to K R 4th
11. P to Q Kt 4th	B to Kt 3rd
12. P to Kt 5th	P takes P
13. B takes P	Kt to Kt 3rd
14. P to B 3rd	K to B sq

Castling does not now offer a very inviting prospect, but the King would have been safer on the other side of the board.

WHITE (Mr. T.)	BLACK (Mr. E.)
15. B takes Kt	P takes B
16. B to Kt 2nd	Q to Q 2nd
17. P takes P	Kt to K 2nd
11. P to B 5th	Kt to B sq
19. P to K 5th	P to Q 4th
20. P to Q R 4th	K to K sq
21. P to R 5th	B to R 2nd

We can see no objection to taking the Pawn with Rook.

22. Kt to Q 2nd	Kt to K 2nd
23. Kt to Kt 3rd	P to Kt 4th
24. B to R 3rd	P to Kt 5th
25. Q to B 4th	Q to B sq

Black, although undoubtedly a strong player, has drifted into a position that is barren of resource, and cannot hope for anything beyond deferring the defeat now impending.

26. Q R to K sq	Q to Q sq
27. P to B 6th

The beginning of the end.

27.	Kt to Kt 3rd
28. Q to Kt 5th	R to Q Kt sq
29. P to K 6th

Threatening 30. Q takes Kt, and, should the Queen be captured, 31. P to B 7th, mate.

29.	R to R 2nd
30. P takes P (ch)	K takes P
31. R to K 7th (ch), and Black resigned.

CHESS INTELLIGENCE.

Mr. J. P. Taylor, the well-known composer of problems, has a little work in the press to be issued before the end of the year. The title of the volume is "Chess Chips," and it comprises a collection of two-move problems, end-games, brief and brilliant games, and an introductory essay by Professor Tomlinson, F.R.S.

A number of friends of Herr Zukertort celebrated that chess-master's victory in the late Paris tournament by a dinner held at the Criterion on the 14th inst. No official intimation of the affair was sent to the press.

A match was played last week between the Bryanston and Finsbury Working Men's Chess Clubs, which resulted in the former winning with a score of seven games to three.

A prospectus has been issued proposing to establish a chess club in connection with the Royal Aquarium. The subscription is fixed at two guineas per annum and the entrance-fee at half a guinea, and members of the chess club will be entitled to free admission to the Aquarium and the billiard and reading rooms. Names will be received by Mr. Edward Marks, secretary of the Royal Aquarium Society, Broadway Chambers, Westminster.

The annual meeting of the City and County of Dublin Chess Club was held on Wednesday last—Captain Melhado presiding on the occasion. The report of the honorary secretary, Major Shaw, described the prosperous condition and cheering prospects of the association, and it was unanimously adopted. The annual tournament of the club is to be commenced immediately, and during its progress a professional blindfold player will be invited from London.

The chess library of the late Professor Allen, of Philadelphia, the biographer of Philidor, is offered for sale by the executors at the price of three thousand dollars. This collection includes some of the rarest works upon the history, theory and practice of the game, besides complete sets of periodical chess publications, cuttings of newspaper chess columns and a singularly interesting collection of letters by eminent players and writers. Of the RARE works, Damian-s "Libro imparare," &c., published at Rome in 1512, and supposed to be the original edition, is the most curious, if only because it was largely "compiled" from the still rarer Lucena, whose work was the second practical one upon the subject of chess. The MS. of Jacobus de Cessolis is of course a copy, as one is to be found in all the great national libraries of Europe, and the original is said to be in the library of the University of Padua. The catalogue is itself a valuable contribution to chess literature, the character and contents of many of the works being minutely described.

THE VOLUNTEERS.

Last Saturday evening the Lord Mayor, who was accompanied by the Lady Mayoress, Mr. Sheriff Burt, and Mr. Sheriff Bevan, presided at the Guildhall at the annual distribution of the prizes won in drill and shooting by the 2nd London during the past volunteer year. The challenge prizes, presented by the City companies, with silver jewels, were awarded to Sergeant H. J. Brown, Corporal W. White, and Sergeant W. J. Lowden; the latter also taking the first battalion prize, given by the ward of Farringdon Without, and the badge and three stars as best shot in the battalion. The gold badge and medal were awarded to Corporal W. White. Fourteen cups were awarded for the largest attendances at the principal parades; there were forty-five battalion prizes, nearly one hundred company prizes, ten silver company badges, and thirty-two marksmen's badges. At the close of the distribution Colonel Vickers mentioned the services which the staff had rendered in the management of the battalion, especially remarking on the assistance of Captain Nevinson and Sergeant-Major Spooner, the latter being awarded a testimonial. The statistics of the regiment which were issued show that the maximum establishment is 1000; enrolled, 841; efficient, 796; non-efficient, 45; proficient—officers, 18; sergeants, 50; and present at the last official inspection, 673.

The resignation by Lord Elcho of his command of the London Scottish Rifles, which he has held almost since the organisation of the force he was so largely instrumental in promoting nearly twenty years since, having been received at the War Office and announced in the Gazette, the gallant officer has issued his last order to the regiment, which, after announcing his resignation, goes on as follows:—"It is now nearly twenty years since Lord Elcho, at the commencement of the volunteer movement, was invited to take and accepted the command of the corps of Scotchmen then about to be formed in London. The position in which he was thus placed by the favour of his countrymen, and which he has so long held, has been to him a never-failing source of pride and satisfaction; as, indeed, it could not fail to be. In efficiency, discipline, and appearance the London Scottish are admitted to be inferior to no volunteer regiment in the metropolis or the kingdom; and the commanding officer has on all occasions received, not only ready and zealous obedience on parade, but kindness, courtesy, and forbearance at all times from every member of the corps, whether in matters connected with regimental management or in others of a more social nature. It been with sincere regret that the commanding officer has felt himself unable of late years to be so actively connected with the regiment as he had previously been, and it is with keen sorrow that he now, for the good of the corps, resigns the command. But though thus ceasing to hold the active command of the London Scottish, he has the satisfaction of stating that his connection with the regiment will not be severed, as he has good hope that he may have the honour of being appointed its honorary Colonel." In conclusion, Lord Elcho expressed his satisfaction that "in Major Lumsden the regiment will have as its commanding officer one who has done good and zealous service as a commissioned officer from its first formation, and who for the last three years has successfully commanded it on parade."

The distribution of prizes won during the season at great gun and carbine practice by the first Sussex Artillery took place on the 14th inst., at the head-quarters of the corps, Brighton, the drill-hall of which was tastefully decorated with flags and military devices. The prizes, of the aggregate value of £250, were awarded by Colonel Ravenhill, R.A., of the School of Gunnery, Shoeburyness. A vocal and instrumental entertainment was subsequently given to the visitors, of whom there between 200 and 300 present.

The High Court of Justiciary in Edinburgh has refused to grant the applications made for bail by the directors, manager, and secretary of the City of Glasgow Bank.

Owen Roberts, a lunatic, is in custody at Llangefri, charged with attempting to shoot Miss Pritchard, daughter of an Anglesey magistrate, living at Trescawen. Armed with a gun and revolver, he went to Miss Pritchard's residence, and, upon her coming to the hall door, he fired at her, but missed. A gamekeeper disabled him by a shot, and he was arrested.

The Liverpool Mercury says that a noteworthy instance of commercial morality is announced by Mr. Peter Bancroft, of that town. On Saturday last he received an unsigned letter, in which was inclosed a bank-note for £1000. The only information vouchsafed by the sender was that the bank-note was the amount of an old debt and accumulated interest, which he was sorry not to have been in a position to forward to Mr. Bancroft before. Mr. Bancroft has not the slightest idea from whom he has received this conscience money.

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.
SIR G. DUNCAN GIBB, Bart., M.D., Physician to the Westminster Hospital.
"The value of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL as a therapeutic agent in a number of diseases, chiefly of an exhaustive character, has been admitted by the world of medicine; but, in addition, I have found it a remedy of great power in the treatment of Affections of the Throat and Larynx, many especially in Consumption of the latter, where it is the only medicine which can be relied on, and will sustain life when everything else fails."
DR. SINCLAIR COGHILL, Physician Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor.
"I have convinced myself that in Tubercular and the various forms of Strumous Disease, Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL possesses greater therapeutic efficacy than any other Cod-Liver Oil with which I am acquainted. It was especially noted in a large number of cases in which the patients protested they had never been able to retain or digest other Cod-Liver Oil, but that Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL was not only tolerated, but Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL was not only tolerated, but taken readily, and with marked benefit."
LENNOX BROWNE, Esq., F.R.C.S.E., Senior Surgeon Central London Throat and Ear Hospital.
"The action of Dr. de Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil has proved, in my own experience, particularly valuable, not only in those diseases for which it was originally employed, but also in many cases of weakness of the Singing and Speaking Voice, dependent on Bronchial or Laryngeal Irritation, and in all forms of Strumous Enlargement of Glands, and Discharges from the Ear."
DR. PROSSER JAMES, Lecturer on Materia Medica, London Hospital.
"DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL contains the whole of the active ingredients of the remedy, and is easily digested. Hence its value, not only in Diseases of the Throat and Lungs, but in a great number of cases to which the Profession is extending its use."
DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL is sold ONLY in capsuled IMPERIAL Half-Pints, 2s. 6d.; Pints, 4s. 9d.; Quarts, 9s.; by all respectable Chemists and Druggists throughout the world. SOLE CONSIGNEES,

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1878.

It was very gratifying to the British public to receive on Monday morning tidings of the safe arrival of the Sarmatian at Halifax, and of the welfare of all the Viceregal Party on board. That she had experienced an unusually stormy passage even for this time of the year could hardly be regarded as a matter for surprise. The Captain of the stout and noble craft would not, perhaps, have allowed that it was, at any part of the voyage, in absolute danger; but when the wind blows a hurricane in the North Atlantic, when seas break over the ship, stem and stern, when trysail and foretopsail are carried away, and the smoking-room on deck is stove in, there would necessarily be some peril to be confronted, as well as much discomfort to be endured. Neptune has no respect of persons. The Princess Louise and many of her suite suffered severely, but towards the close of the voyage she rapidly improved in health, and had so far recovered before she landed at Halifax with her husband, the Marquis of Lorne, as to be strong enough to meet the fatigue of a grand official and popular reception. The welcome given to the Viceroy and the Princess was peculiarly, and perhaps to some extent noisily, hearty; and the noble Marquis formally entered upon the responsibility of his office and took the customary oaths under circumstances of advantage and scenes of rejoicing that augur well both for himself and for the colony which he has gone out to govern.

He needed every adventitious aid to obliterate from the minds of the Canadian people the poignant regret which they felt for the retirement of Lord Dufferin. Few instances are on record of such profound and even affectionate harmony as that which existed between the noble Lord and the people over whom he had presided in the name of her Majesty. His administrative aptitude, his reverential regard for constitutional principles, his cheerful temperament, his winning eloquence, and the thoroughness with which, heart and soul, he threw himself into the broad current of Canadian feeling, had won for him a place in their confidence, and even in their affections, altogether unique. When he left them at the expiration of his official term almost every inhabitant in the Dominion mourned over his loss as if it had been that of a personal friend. Not only in Ottawa, the Seat of the Viceregal Government, but in Toronto, in Montreal, even in Quebec, the influence of his presence, or his name, seemed to be irresistible. So entirely did he identify himself with the country, so chastely did he keep himself disentangled from party politics, so serenely did he soar above the clashing interests of faction which prevailed beneath him, that all looked to him with more than common loyalty, and through him, of course, to the Sovereign whom he represented. It would have been a difficult and discouraging task for any ordinary man, however wisely chosen, or however intellectually and morally qualified, to take his place, unless he could have brought to it recommendations equivalent in their practical effect to those which bound Lord Dufferin in the strongest ties to the Canadian people. Happily, the Marquis of Lorne presented to the Colony such an equivalent in the person of Princess Louise, his wife. The arrangement carried with it special advantages on both sides. The Colonists, no doubt, fully appreciated the compliment paid to them by committing to their trust and loyalty the happiness, for some time to come, of a daughter of Queen Victoria, and the position conferred upon the Marquis of Lorne and the responsibility which he has been induced by the Government of the United Kingdom to accept, raise him at once out of that neutral sphere in which, since his marriage, he has been compelled to move. There is room, of course, for a little disappointment on both sides. But there is no reason for apprehending that on either side there will be any development of feeling tending to other than loyal and grateful relations.

The Marquis of Lorne will find his post no easy one. Politico-religious differences in Canada are even now exerting a disintegrating force. There will be no lack of strong temptations to the Governor-General to take sides with the majority. The noble Lord, however, has proved himself by his publications to possess a highly cultivated intellect and poetic sympathies. He will probably have made himself thoroughly master of the duties which his high position will entail upon him. The Princess Louise cannot but have been a deeply interested observer of the irreproachable constitutional principles and practice of her Royal Mother; and in some respects, perhaps, her tact will serve to guide and her experience to strengthen the hands of the Noble Marquis in his ministration of public affairs. Still, the well-being of Canada will, doubtless, depend more upon the tone of social influence diffused through it by the presence and action of her Majesty's Representive than by any political events with which he may be called to deal. It is to be hoped that no slight advantage will result to the people of the Dominion by the new ties thus auspiciously formed. Where rulers and people are both intent upon reciprocating towards each other the highest manifestations of esteem and trust, there can hardly be left much room for disappointment.

Our Canadian kinsfolk have given strong proof of their attachment to the home country and their enthusiastic loyalty to the Queen. For the present, at any rate, they show no disposition to separate their interests from those of the United Kingdom. They are as free and independent as any country can wish to be. Their subjection to Imperial control is almost nominal. They are rough, perhaps, in some of their manners, but they are hearty, and are quite susceptible to those subtle influences which may serve to sway beneficially their political action, and to refine, as well as purify, their public movements. We congratulate them upon the evidence given by their mother country, its Government, and its Queen that there subsists, on the part of the British public, a lively interest in the progress of the Dominion. They will not any longer, we suppose, suspect that they are regarded as "poor relations." And, it is certain, that Great Britain will not fail to take a more than ordinary interest in the affairs of a splendid colony over the government of which the Queen's son-in-law, conjugally associated with her beloved daughter, is called to preside.

A fancy-dress ball was given at Brighton on Wednesday evening, under the auspices of the International Gun and Polo Club. This was the fifth year of the ball, and it far surpassed the previous ones. The lady patronesses of this fashionable gathering at the Royal Pavilion included the Baroness de Penedo, Mdlle. Musurus, Countess Marie Münster, the Duchess of Hamilton, the Duchess of Manchester, Marchioness Camden, the Countess of Scarborough, and Viscountess Combermere. Among the stewards were the Ambassadors and Ministers from Austria-Hungary, Germany, France, Belgium, Spain, Turkey, Persia, Brazil, Japan, the Duke of Hamilton, Earl de Grey, Viscount St. Vincent, Sir G. Chetwynd, the Earls of Hardwicke, Scarborough, and Yarborough, and about a hundred other noblemen and gentlemen. The guests numbered nearly eight hundred.

A series of windows representing the Te Deum have been placed in the Church of All Saints', Bradford, at a cost of more than £1500, the major part of which has been borne by Mr. F. S. Powell, the patron.

Last Saturday afternoon the foundation-stone of the district church of St. George, Lewisham, was laid by Mrs. George Parker, whose husband, of Lewisham House, Lewisham, has given £8000, the entire cost of the building.

The Bishop of Carlisle has withdrawn the license of the Rev. Michael Haslam, Curate of Maryport, for having protested vehemently in the parish against the impropriety of fruit having been placed on the holy table at a harvest festival.

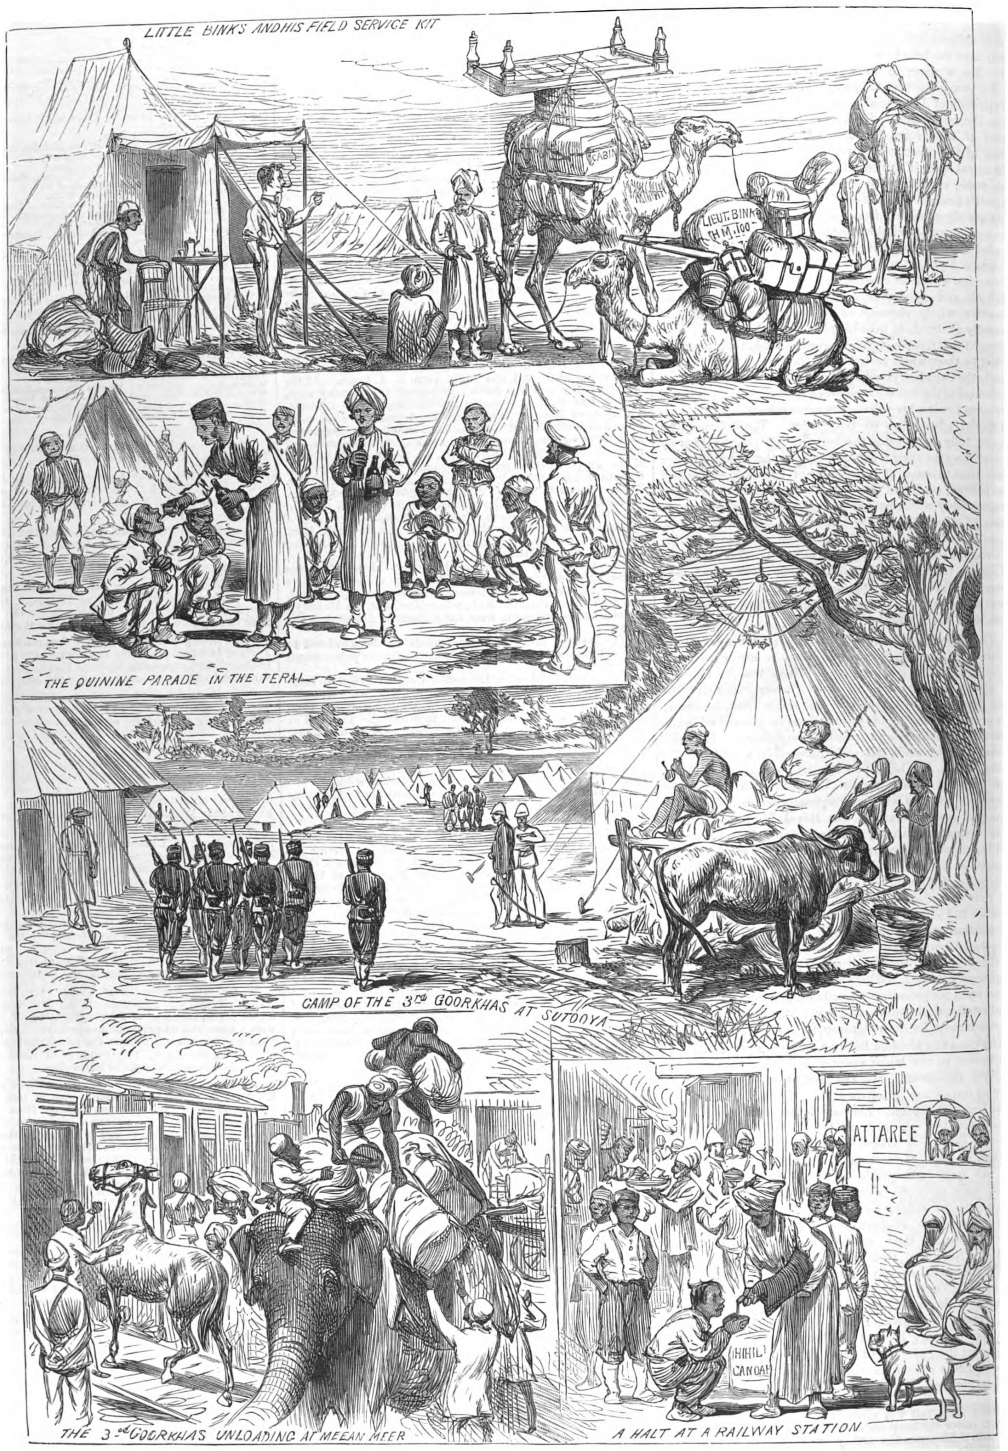
The Bishop of Calcutta (Dr. Johnson) has written to the Dean of Lichfield promising £50 towards the proposed "Selwyn College," and expressing his hope that he may be able to raise funds in India for an exhibition for the college.

The Chester Courant has authority for stating that the Liverpool Bishopric Fund has now reached over £70,000, and, notwithstanding the badness of the times, the promoters of the bishopric entertain but little doubts that the required balance will soon be raised.

The Archbishop of York addressed a meeting last Saturday night in connection with the York Church Mission. His Grace said the position of a working man was now higher than it had ever been, both politically and socially. The drinking habits of the labouring classes had, however, largely increased.

The Vice-Chairman of the London School Board (the Rev. John Rodgers, M.A.) is about to deliver a course of monthly sermons, especially addressed to school teachers, at his church, St. Thomas Charterhouse, Goswell-street, E.C. The first of the course will be preached on Sunday evening next.

The beautiful little church at Wentbridge, erected at the sole cost of Mrs. Barton, of Stapleton Park, in memory of her late husband, Mr. J. Hope Barton, for some years master of the Badsworth Hunt, was consecrated by the Archbishop of York on the 7th inst. The church, which is most picturesquely situated, is built in the Early English style of architecture, from the designs of Mr. A. Bloomfield.



The Rev. E. Norton Eldrid, Curate of St. John the Baptist, Kentish Town, was presented on the 28th inst. with a testimonial, from members of the congregation, of £45 in money, with a memorial on parchment expressive of their high appreciation of his ministrations in the parish during the last year; also, from the choir, two volumes of music, and a glass épergne from members of the bible-class.

Dean Stanley preached in Westminster Abbey on Sunday afternoon for the first time since his return from the United States. In the course of his sermon the Dean remarked that we could not throw off the responsibilities which the past as well as the present had thrown upon us. Our far-reaching lines of ancestry and our wide-spreading dominions were around us like the mountains standing around Jerusalem. There was a vast area of hearers—flesh of our flesh, and blood of our blood, who watched us with a preternatural sensitiveness. All the good or evil of our doing might aid in raising or depressing these our brethren. Far more to them than any flattery or censure would be the examples of honest trade, of pure statesmanship, and of pure religious life and teaching; for they look with respect and regard upon these shores from which they took their reluctant departure, and which they still dearly love.

A banquet was given at Belfast on Tuesday evening to the Earl of Dufferin, on the occasion of his return from Canada, and in appreciation of the administrative ability which he had displayed during his tenure of the Governor-Generalship of the Dominion. Sir John Preston, the Mayor, presided, and the company numbered about 400.

THE AFGHAN WAR: SKETCHES ON THE LINE OF MARCH BY LIEUTENANT C. PULLEY, OF THE 3RD GOORKHAS.

THE AFGHAN WAR: CABUL EXPEDITIONARY FORCE ON THE MARCH—QUARTER GUARD OF THE 3RD GOORKHAS.
SKETCH BY LIEUTENANT C. PULLEY, OF THE 3RD GOORKHAS.

THE AFGHAN WAR.

THE MOUNTAIN PASSES FORCED.

We announced last week the actual beginning of what many eminent and experienced statesmen declare to be an ill-advised and unjustifiable war in Afghanistan. The Government of the Indian Empire, disposing, as it does nowadays, of the military and financial resources of Great Britain, has invaded the dominions of a neighbouring independent Prince, upon a pretext sought and procured by the mission of an Envoy unacceptable to him, for the purpose, which is avowed in this country by the Prime Minister, of annexing to India the Afghan frontier territory. This act has been so far accomplished in one week's hostile operations, which commenced on the night of Wednesday week; and the Khyber Pass, the Khoorum Pass, and the valley of Peshin, on the road from Quetta towards Candahar, have been gained by a three-fold advance of British-Indian army divisions, with no very serious resistance. In capturing the fort of Ali Musjid, at the entrance to the Khyber Pass, a dozen men were killed on our side, with two officers, Major Birch and Lieutenant Fitzgerald, while some forty were wounded. The advance is to be continued to the fortress of Jellalabad, which is not expected to offer a resolute defence; and with this conquest, and with the occupation, probably unopposed, of the city of Candahar, it is intended to close the winter campaign. But there is something ominous in the tempting facility with which the ruler of Cabul has allowed this hasty advance into his dominions, and it seems likely that the real conflict is yet reserved for a future opportunity, little being yet known of the amount or the position of his forces.

The Viceroy of India, Lord Lytton, who arrived at Lahore from Simla on Tuesday week, did not get an answer next day from Shere Ali to his threatening ultimatum, but lost not an hour in publishing his declaration of war, as Lord Cranbrook, the Secretary of State for India, had instructed him to do by the despatch of Monday, noticed in our last, the purport of which must have reached India by telegraph. The Viceroy's proclamation recounts the history of the relations between the Indian Government and the Ameer of Afghanistan during the last ten years, refers to the Umballa visit, and to the assistance which the Ameer has received from the British Government from time to time, and points out that the Afghans have enjoyed the benefits of free trade with India. For all these acts there has been no return except ill will and discourtesy. The Ameer has also openly and assiduously attempted, both by words and deeds, to stir up religious hatred and to incite war against the British Empire in India; and, although he has repelled all efforts to bring about amicable intercourse with the Indian Government, he nevertheless formally received a Russian Embassy. Finally, while the Russian Embassy was still at Cabul, he forcibly repulsed an English Envoy, of whose coming he had timely notice. Since then all efforts to promote friendly relations have been met with open indignity and defiance. The Ameer, mistaking for weakness the long forbearance of the British Government, has thus deliberately incurred its just resentment. With the Sirdars and the people of Afghanistan the Indian Government have no quarrel, as they have given no offence. The independence of Afghanistan will yet be respected, but the Government of India can never tolerate that any other Power should interfere in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. The proclamation concludes as follows:—"Upon the Ameer Shere Ali alone rests the responsibility of having exchanged the friendship for the hostility of the Empress of India."

Lieutenant-General Sir Samuel Browne, commanding the Peshawur Valley force, entered the Khyber district early on Thursday morning last week, with his head-quarters and the 3rd brigade of the 1st division. Ali Musjid fort, the scene of the repulse of Sir Neville Chamberlain's mission, was the first objective point. Sir S. Browne, himself advancing to a front attack, dispatched the 1st and 2nd brigades, under Brigadier-General Macpherson and General Tytler, by a circuitous route to occupy a hill above, and a village behind the fort, and thus to outflank and cut off the retreat of the garrison. Sir S. Browne reached the fort before noon, and occupied the Shagai ridge, opposite Ali Musjid, without opposition. A sharp artillery fight began at noon, lasting about four hours. The enemy's artillery was well served, and inflicted some loss on our troops; but it was soon silenced by the fire of our heavy batteries. The 3rd brigade, under General Appleyard, was pushed up close to the fort; but the attack was held back pending the arrival in position of General Macpherson's outflanking column. During the Thursday night our troops bivouacked before the fort, and all were prepared for the attack at dawn. Daybreak, however, showed that the enemy had evacuated Ali Musjid under cover of night, and the British troops marched in unopposed. The enemy had abandoned tents, mules, and twenty-two pieces of artillery. The victory was not bloodless. Our loss was from thirty to forty killed and wounded, including Major Birch and Lieutenant Fitzgerald, of the 27th Native Infantry, killed, and Captain Maclean, of the 14th Sikhs, wounded. A portion of the garrison was cut off and captured by the 2nd brigade, under General Tytler. The Afreedis intercepted 500 of the Ameer's troops, seizing their arms and clothing; but whether these men were fugitives from Ali Musjid is uncertain.

The fall of Ali Musjid having removed the first obstacle to the advance of the Peshawur column, Sir S. Browne, having remained there during Friday night, pushed on on Saturday towards Dakka and Jellalabad. General Macpherson's brigade met with difficulties, but at length reached the pass above Ali Musjid. Both his and Tytler's brigade rejoined the main advance. The occupation of Dakka, on the Cabul river, at the western end of the Khyber Pass, took place unopposed; while the chief of the Mohmunds, a native tribe inhabiting Lalpoora, opposite Dakka, with all the district north of the Khyber, hastened to come in and offer his submission. This example was followed by the headmen of all the villages in the Khoord Khyber district. It is said that Mir Akhor, the Afghan Governor, with General Ghoolam Haidar, escaped from Ali Musjid by the Choora Pass, leaving the garrison, with sick and wounded, to be taken prisoners. One despatch states that General Tytler's brigade had cut off the retreat of the Ameer's troops and captured many prisoners. Major Cavagnari reports that the Afreedis had intercepted 500 men of the Afghan army, and taken from them their arms and clothing. The Times' correspondent, in his weekly telegram, says that it is improbable that any advance beyond Jellalabad will be made till the spring. General Roberts's column will not probably go beyond the Khoorum Fort, and the Quetta column will merely occupy Candahar, and remain there for the winter.

The Khoorum advance force, under Major-General Roberts, assembled at Thull, in the Kohat district, about seventy miles from Kohat town, and found itself on Afghan soil immediately after beginning its march. Kapuyan Fort, on the Afghan side of the border, an insignificant position, was found deserted. Marching eight miles further, General Roberts came to Ahmadshana, where he occupied another fort, which also showed marks of having been recently evacuated. Halting there, he convoked an assembly of the hill tribes, and arranged with them for the supply of forage and fuel. At daybreak on Saturday the head-quarters of this division moved to a place called Hazari Pir, about twenty miles from Kapuyan. The road immediately beyond Ahmadshana was terribly bad, boulders of rock, several tons in weight, blocking up the way. The Royal Horse Artillery was unable to advance for several hours, until the pioneers had blasted a way. It is officially reported that the Khoorum fort was occupied on Monday, and the Afghans have retired to Peiwar, and may take a stand there.

We are indebted to Lieutenant Charles Pulley, Adjutant of the 3rd Goorkhas, who contributed Sketches of the Imperial Durbar Camp at Delhi, about the beginning of 1877, for those we now publish, illustrating the recent movements of his regiment, as part of the Cabul Expeditionary Force, to join the Mooltan Division, for the advance through Quetta to Candahar, under the command of General Sir Donald Stewart. The 3rd Goorkhas, commanded by Colonel Paterson, and 600 strong of all ranks, left Almorah on the 12th ult., proceeding by the route of Bareilly, Meerut, and Lahore, to the permanent camp of Meean Meer, a few miles from Lahore, whence it would pass to Mooltan. They had to march through the Teral, which is very pestilential at this season: one of the sketches was taken during this march, another shows the regimental camp at Sutooya; and there are some of various incidents on the march. That of the Quarter Guard will give a good idea of the Goorkha sepoy; in the left foreground is the "ghurrie," or gong, which strikes the hour for the guard. The "doctor sahib's" parade, while marching through a fever-haunted district, where every man was daily dosed with quinine by the regimental surgeons, is also worthy of notice. Lieutenant "Binks," an officer of small stature with a large amount of luggage, the allowance being 160 lb. weight, including camp equipage, makes a figure in these sketches. The regiment was conveyed from Bareilly to Lahore by a special railway train, starting from Bareilly on the 21st, at three in the afternoon, with hearty cheers for the Queen. At Meerut the Goorkhas were met and cheered by the Artillerymen, climbing upon the waggons and guns, as is seen in our Illustration. They reached Lahore at mid-day on the 23rd, after a long and tedious journey.

The correspondence respecting the relations between the British Government and that of Afghanistan since the accession of the Ameer Shere Ali Khan, published by order of the Secretary of State for India, has been sent out from the India Office. The papers occupy 260 pages, and the documents contained begin with the treaty of 1855 with Dost Mahomed and conclude with Lord Cranbrook's despatch published last week.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Chamber of Deputies yesterday week continued the debate on the Budget, and discussed the estimates of the Ministry of Public Instruction. M. Bardoux, the Minister for that department, explained the results already obtained and those still to be expected from the reforms in the educational system, and his speech was frequently interrupted by cheers from the Left. The whole of the estimates were subsequently adopted. On Saturday the Chamber disposed of the Ecclesiastical, the Agricultural, and Commercial, together with a portion of the Finance Estimates. In the Ecclesiastical Estimates, M. Bardoux had proposed an increase of 326,000f.—200,000f. for raising the stipends of aged priests from 900f. to 1000f.; 112,000f. for a corresponding advance to Protestant pastors, and 14,000f. to Jewish rabbis—but the proposal was rejected by the House by 268 to 193. It was objected by those who opposed the augmentation that, poor as is the stipend allowed to the clergy, it is more than is given by the State to the schoolmasters and even to some of the Juges de Paix and Judges of First Instance. In Monday's sitting, M. de Kerjegu questioned the Government in regard to the appointment of laymen in the place of teachers belonging to religious congregations. M. Dufaure, the Minister of Justice, replied that the question had been submitted to the consideration of the Council of State, and its decision must be awaited. The Government would see that the law was carried out. The estimates of the Ministers of Finance and Public Works were subsequently adopted. The War Estimates were voted on Tuesday.

The Legitimist journals publish a letter which the Comte de Chambord has addressed to M. de Mun (whose election was invalidated for corrupt practices and intimidation) congratulating him upon his recent speech in the Chamber, and wishing him success in his appeal to the Breton electors. The Count, in conclusion, says:—"Among those dear working people, surrounded by so many flatterers and so few real friends, you can, better than any other, serve me as an interpreter. I always hear with joy their cry of faith and hope. Let them know that I love them too dearly to flatter them. I never cease repeating to them that for France to be saved God must return as Master, that I may reign as King. Confidence, my dear De Mun! Never forget that the future is to the men of faith and courage!"

ITALY.

In the Chamber of Deputies on the 21st inst. Signor Zanardelli, Minister of the Interior, made a formal communication of the attempt on the life of the King at Naples, and stated that the Government intended taking the measures it deemed necessary against secret revolutionary societies. The President then, amid much cheering, proposed that an address should be presented to the King; that all the members of the House should go the railway station to receive his Majesty on his return to Rome; and that the President and Vice-Presidents of the Chamber should proceed to Naples. This proposition was adopted by acclamation. Similar proceedings took place in the Senate.

The King went on the 22nd inst. to visit Signor Cairoli, who is still ordered to bed, and conferred upon him the Gold Medal for Military Valour, with many expressions of gratitude and affection. Afterwards his Majesty went out shooting in the park of Capodimonte, accompanied by Generals Medici and Bertole Viale.

The King and Queen returned to Rome on Sunday. Their Majesties were met at the railway station by the Senators, Deputies, and the magistrates, and then went in a state carriage to the Quirinal, amid enthusiastic applause. After reaching the palace they had to appear four times on the balcony, in response to the appeals of the crowd. The city was profusely decorated with flags, and was illuminated at night. On Monday the King and Queen formally received the Senators and Deputies. To the latter his Majesty said he hoped that, in concert with the Parliament, he should be able to restore the tranquillity which Italy needed in order to proceed on its path of progress.

In the Cortes on Monday the debate on the Press Bill was resumed. Señor Castelar, in a speech lasting two hours, attacked the measure, and described it as a menace against liberty of thought and conscience. Señor Canovas del Castillo, in reply, maintained that the State had a right to defend itself against calumnious attacks. He argued that the bill would regulate thought so as to prevent abuse.

It provides that the Indian Budget shall bear an annual charge of 6,000,000 fl. as repayment to the Central Government of the costs of administration. The colony will further be required to furnish the sums necessary for the payment of the Rentes and the redemption of the loans concluded by the State on behalf of the Indies. The colonial bonds will be regulated by special legislative measures. So far as they are not required to cover colonial deficits they will be devoted before all to public works in the Indian possessions, and to the extraordinary redemption of the colonial debts.

GERMANY.

The Berlin correspondent of the Standard states that the Emperor William is to return to Berlin on Dec. 5. Great preparations are being made to give a most solemn reception to his Majesty.

In Wednesday's sitting of the Prussian Chamber of Deputies a letter from the Emperor William was read thanking the members for the address of sympathy which they recently sent to his Majesty and announcing that, being now restored to health, he intended to resume the duties of his position shortly. The discussion of the Budget was then continued.

A great party meeting was held at Berlin on Sunday by the German Progressists, in order to take into consideration the modification and remodelling of the party programme of 1861, which up to that period has been the only authentic record concerning the aspirations of the Prussian Progressists. Herr Virchow welcomed the meeting by a long speech, in which he reviewed the historical development of the party.

The Landsthing on Tuesday resolved unanimously to proceed to the second reading of the bill remitting temporarily the contribution of Santa Cruz to the State expenditure. In the course of the debate Count Frijis, a former Minister, and M. Kriejer expressed their approbation, amidst the universal applause of the House, of the general attitude of the Government towards the West Indian colonies, and at the same time pointed out how unadvisable a Parliamentary trial of strength would be in a matter which owed its origin to so terrible a disaster as that which had occurred in Santa Cruz.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

In the Austrian Delegation yesterday week the Minister for Foreign Affairs, in reply to a question, stated that it was true Russia had asked Turkey to conclude a separate Convention respecting the points of the San Stefano Treaty unaffected by the Berlin Treaty, and had declared that she would evacuate Eastern Roumelia three months after the conclusion of that Convention. Austria had been asked by several Governments what her views were on the subject, and had declared that such a Convention was exclusively a Russo-Turkish question. The evacuation of Turkish territory could, however, in no case be made conditional upon the conclusion of a new treaty. The Minister added that no official confirmation had been received of the report that Russian officers and soldiers were being enrolled in the Bulgarian militia The Delegation adopted the ordinary estimates of the War Department in accordance with the proposals of the committee, at the same time rejecting two motions for the establishment of an independent battalion of Engineers and for the appointment of a second Captain to each battalion of troops. The extraordinary estimates were then discussed, and, after a long debate, lasting several hours, in which Counts Bylandt and Andrassy took part, a motion proposing that 1,712,000 fl. should be expended in adapting the Werndl rifles to cartridges of increased strength was adopted by 30 against 23 votes. The Finance Committee of the delegation decided on Monday, by 14 votes to 6, not to discuss the demand of the Government for a supplementary credit to meet the costs of the occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1878, on the ground that the Government omitted to ask for an indemnity from Parliament, and that the Treaty of Berlin has not yet received the sanction of the Reichsrath. Count Andrassy (the telegram says) endeavoured in vain to overcome the resolution of the Delegation. In Thursday's sitting Count Andrassy announced that, in view of the opposition of the Budget Committee, he withdrew the bill for a supplementary credit.

The Lower House of the Hungarian Diet on Wednesday concluded the general discussion of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. After twelve days' debate, the Address drawn up by a Committee of the House was accepted by 202 votes against 180.

On Tuesday night, while Count Andrassy and a large number of the members of the Delegation were present at a soirée at the palace of Herr Tisza at Pesth, a bomb, filled with dynamite, was exploded near the building, the windows of which were shattered by the concussion. No clue as to the perpetrator of the outrage has been discovered.

The Town Council of Trieste was on Tuesday dissolved by an Imperial order, in consequence, it is believed, of the attitude of the majority of the members towards the Italian party.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY.

The Emperor will arrive at St. Petersburg on Dec. 3, and about the same time General Kaufmann and his Staff are expected to reach the capital.

Advices from Orenburg received at St. Petersburg states that, in consequence of the concentration of the Chinese forces on the Russian frontier and the reported pacification of Khotan, the Russian fort of Maryn has been strongly reinforced. The Chinese, it is stated, having suffered severely in putting down the insurrection, and being enraged at the flight into Russian territory of the principal insurgents, have increased and reinforced their outposts. It is further added that they have assassinated the youngest son of Yakub Beg.

From a statement in the Golos of St. Petersburg it appears that the Budget for 1877 shows an excess of expenditure over revenue of 465,542,069 roubles. An extra sum of 6,000,000 roubles is to be devoted in 1879 to purposes of naval construction.

Privy Councillor Schulz, Director of the Police Section of the Imperial Russian Chancellery, has sent in his resignation, on account of his health being entirely broken down.

The Russian authorities have drawn up provisional regulations for the free port of Batoum, to be applied pending the establishment of definitive legislative enactments. The Custom House of Batoum has already been opened.

Russia has yielded to the representations of the Roumanian Government that it would not permit its troops to enter the Dobrudscha under conditions differing from those stipulated in article 22 of the Berlin Treaty. The Roumanian troops crossed the Danube at Braila on Tuesday afternoon; and Prince Charles issued a proclamation to the people of the Dobrudscha promising protection to all, without distinction of race or creed, and abolishing the dimes and other taxes.

According to statements made in official circles at St. Petersburg, the Emperor summoned Prince Dondoukoff-Korsakoff to Livadia for the purpose of instructing him in the most emphatic terms to adhere strictly to the directions given him with regard to carrying out the organisation of Bulgaria in accordance with the Treaty of Berlin, and further to request him not to leave any doubt on this point in his personal intercourse with the Bulgarians. A St. Petersburg telegram in the Morning Post states that the Czar has also forbidden the Prince's candidature for the princedom of Bulgaria. A Bulgarian Assembly is to meet at Tirnova on Dec 27, in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin. After preparing the organic laws of Bulgaria, it will elect a Prince.

Pursuant to the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin, a Bulgarian Assembly, composed of Bishops, public functionaries, and notables, has been summoned to meet at Tirnova on Dec. 27, for the purpose of preparing the organic laws of Bulgaria.

The Eastern Roumelian Commission discussed on Saturday the question of the future official language of the province. The Russians proposed that it should be Bulgarian, while other Commissioners were of opinion that Bulgarian and Turkish should have an equal footing, and that Greek should be privileged. The result of the discussion was that Baron de King was appointed to draw up the article in the shape of a compromise on the basis proposed by the Conference of Constantinople. A Times' telegram says that the rumours that the Turkish project has been adopted with slight modifications are baseless. It has not been discussed.

The Porte has concluded a loan of £630,000 with the Ottoman Bank, and another of £1,000,000 with Messrs Zarifi. The Council of Ministers has agreed to a decision in favour of the payment of 2 per cent interest on the public debt, without any reduction of the capital, as soon as the condition of the finances shall permit of that course being taken.

GREECE.

A bill has been passed by the Chamber basing the conscription for the army henceforth on the Prussian system.

A Times' telegram from Pesth says that the British Cabinet has joined the other Powers in expressing its readiness to support the initiative taken by the French Government as to the Greek question, so that a step in this direction on the part of all the Powers may soon follow.

ROUMANIA.

The opening of the Roumanian Chambers on Wednesday fitly followed the occupation of the Dobrudscha by the troops of the Principality. The address of Prince Charles was also an appropriate sequel to the proclamation which, as stated above, he has addressed to his new subjects. In his Speech from the Throne the Prince, after referring to the annexation of the Dobrudscha, which had taken place on the previous day, said that the neighbouring Powers had established diplomatic relations with Roumania, in conformity with the conditions of its newly-acquired independence. He was convinced that the other Powers would follow this example, and that an Assembly would be elected which would remodel the Constitution, and thus enable the country to respond to the expectations of Europe.

CANADA.

The Sarmatian, with the Marquis of Lorne and Princess Louise on board, arrived in the harbour of Halifax last Saturday night at half past nine o'clock. The passage across the Atlantic was a very rough one, and Princess Louise suffered somewhat severely, and was only able to appear on deck once during the voyage. As soon as the Sarmatian had anchored, the Duke of Edinburgh went on board. The Marquis of Lorne and the Princess spent the night at the Admiral's house, where they remained in seclusion on Sunday.

The Marquis of Lorne and Princess Louise landed at Halifax on Monday afternoon, amid enthusiastic cheers from the people and salutes from the war-ships in the harbour. A procession was formed, which went through the principal streets to the Province Building, where the Marquis was sworn in as Governor-General. The Duke of Edinburgh was present in naval uniform. In reply to an address presented to him by the Corporation of the town, the Marquis of Lorne thanked the people of Halifax for their devotion to the Throne, and said that in that town the Duke of Kent had passed many years of a soldier's life, and there two of his grandchildren had come that day. At the conclusion of the ceremony, the procession was re-formed, and went by a circuitous route to the Admiralty House. Much enthusiasm was shown by the crowds which thronged the streets, and at night the city was illuminated. The Daily News' correspondent says that the chief of the Micmacs, with a dozen of his tribe, asked permission to walk in the procession behind the daughter of the Queen of England. The Princess Louise held a Drawingroom at Halifax on Monday night, and it was largely attended. On Tuesday the Marquis of Lorne held a Levée. He afterwards received and replied to a considerable number of addresses from corporate bodies and societies. At night there was a general illumination.

The Times' Correspondent at Moncton, New Brunswick, gives some particulars of the Governor-General's progress after leaving Halifax:—

The Viceregal party left that town for Montreal at eleven on Wednesday morning. The Duke of Edinburgh accompanied the Princess to the station, where a large concourse of people was assembled. The weather all day has been lovely, and the whole country throughout the course of the journey was bathed in sunshine, looking as if it were early spring. His Excellency received addresses from a number of towns on his route, to which he made replies which, though necessarily showing a sameness in substance, yet contained each some characteristic utterance. At Truro, a town of 5000 inhabitants, his Excellency, after thanking the deputation for the expressions of loyalty they had given to her Majesty and her representatives, said the people gave evidence of being energetic and progressive—characteristics which, he added, applied to the country generally, so far as he had yet seen it. At Amherst, a town of 2000 inhabitants, his Excellency said:—"In leaving at this place the province of Nova Scotia, we wish to renew our thanks for the hearty greeting given us by all the inhabitants of the province. You have alluded in generous terms to her Majesty having elected me as Governor-General of the Dominion. Such a position is always one of anxiety; but it is a great encouragement to undertaking the task and endeavouring to win the approval of the people of Canada by unremitting attention to their interests, when sympathy and kindness are extended to the occupant of this high office. All classes in Nova Scotia have contributed to assure me of this friendly disposition; and I esteem it a matter of great good fortune that I am called to represent her Majesty among so loyal and noble a community." At this place (Moncton), containing 5000 inhabitants, his Excellency said:—"It would have been a satisfaction to us had we been able to make a more extended tour in New Brunswick, and we shall look forward to the day when we shall visit your capital and chief centres of population. The season of the year and the necessity of our reaching the capital of Canada speedily have prevented us this year from doing us we should have wished, but we shall look upon you as representing the province in bidding us welcome and in renewing the assurance of your fidelity to the Government of our Sovereign."

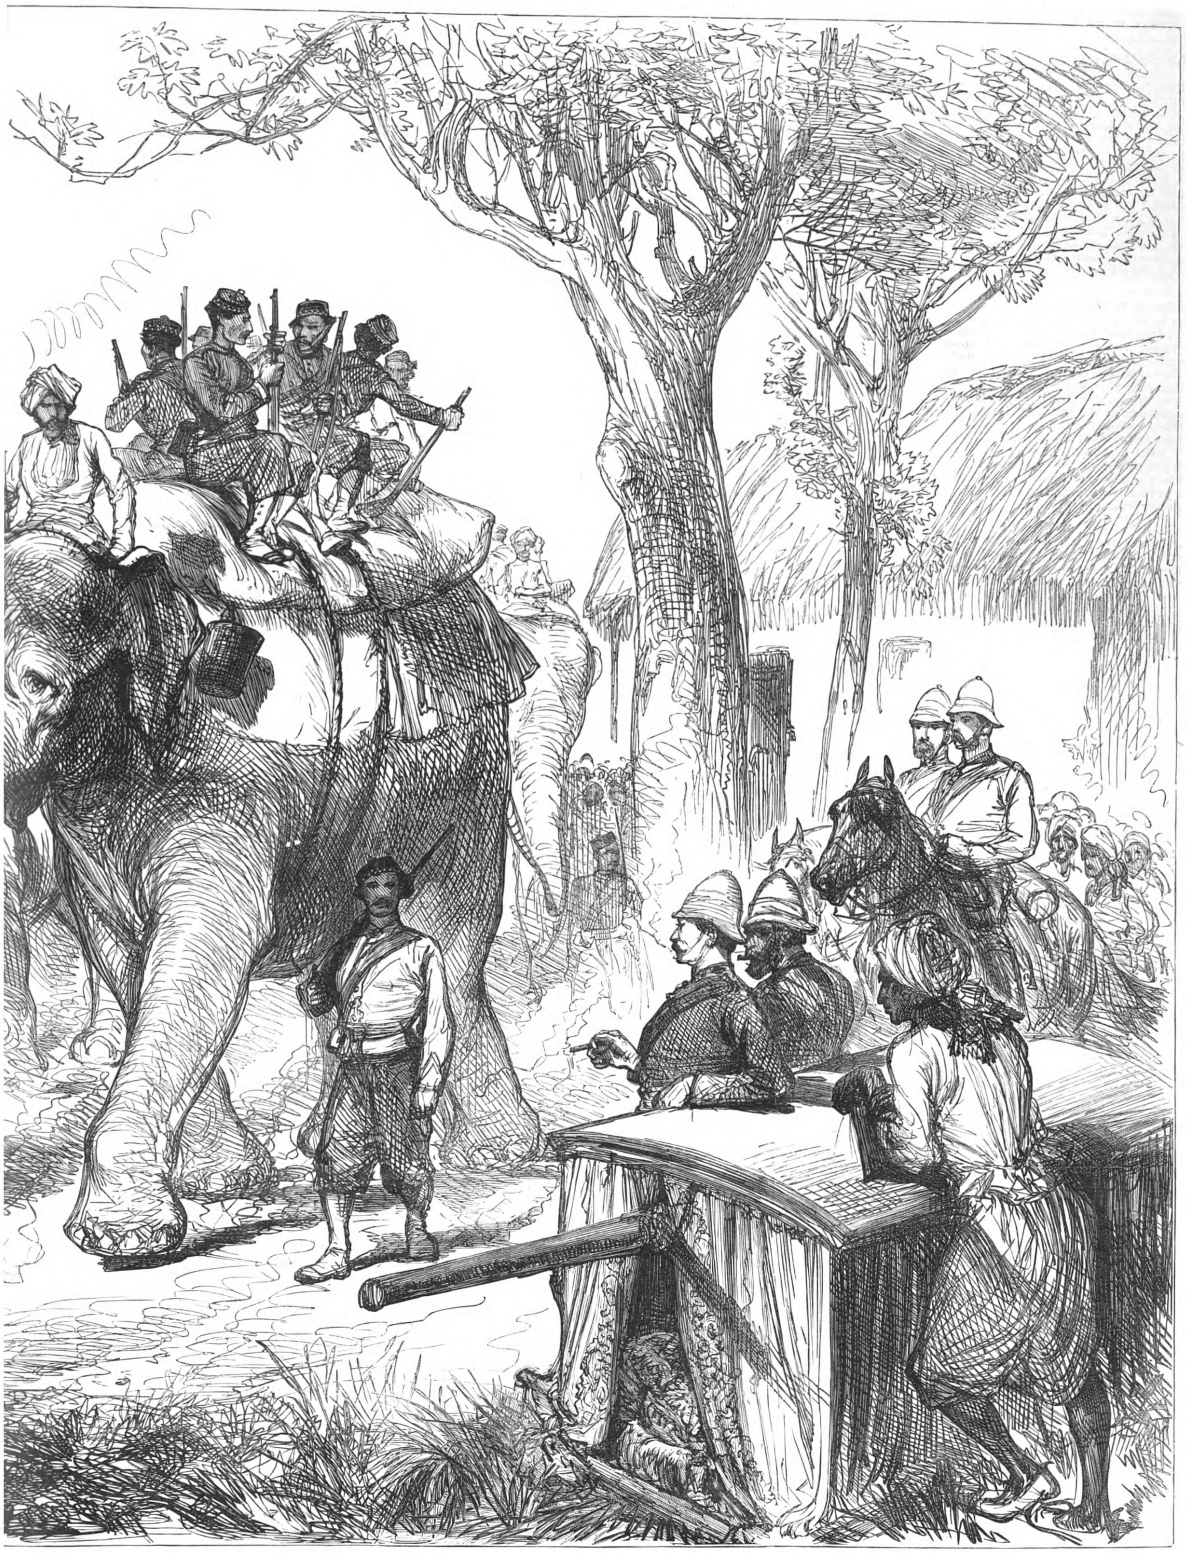
A meeting was held in the Guildhall at Exeter on Tuesday, under the presidency of the Mayor, to consider a proposal of the Town Council to purchase the gas-works. The total outlay which the purchase of the works will involve is estimated at from £200,000 to £300,000. For a long time past complaints have been made as to the quality of the gas supplied by the company. The meeting, after a warm discussion, decided not to purchase the works, and a poll was demanded.



A meeting of the association which has been formed in Lancashire to extend the singing in public schools into the teaching of music was held on Tuesday in Owens College, Manchester, the Dean of Manchester presiding. There were also present Lord Wilton and Sir Henry Cole. Resolutions were adopted approving of the preliminary steps which had been taken for the establishment of a local association for promoting music as an art especially useful to the joint culture and recreation of all classes, resolving that a committee should be formed; that as soon as practicable, and when the time is favourable, a school of music should be established in Manchester, where teachers may be trained for teaching music in public elementary schools; that free scholarships shall be awarded by public competition, which might be held at some musical class already existing in the city, and urging that a deputation should wait upon the Corporation of Manchester and request that they should use their influence to promote music as well as the opening of the libraries and parks.

Another terrible disaster has occurred in the Channel. At midnight on Monday a collision took place between the German mail-steamer Pommerania and an iron barque, the Moel Eilian, which was in ballast. The steamer gradually filled and sank. The Moel Eilian was too much damaged herself to render any assistance, having a large hole in her bows; but she made for Dover, where she is now in dock. The Pommerania had boats sufficient to save all who were on board, who are believed to have numbered 220, but one of them was swamped, and two others were crushed. Others were floated; and 172 persons were saved by a Scotch steamer, the Glengarry, which was passing, and saw the rockets from the mail-steamer. Other steamers are said to have passed near the scene of the collision, and it is hoped that a few more lives may have been saved by their means. Amongst those who it was thought had perished was the captain of the Pommerania, who, although there was plenty of time for him to enter one of the boats, refused to do so, and remained standing on the bridge till the vessel sank; but a Lloyd's telegram from Maasluis states that he arrived there in the City of Amsterdam on Tuesday night, having been picked up by that vessel. Mr. Thomas Blight, one of the passengers who was rescued, leaving by the last boat, and who holds a master's certificate from the Board of Trade, says that every life might have been saved if proper order had been maintained, and the sailors had refrained from rushing to the boats. The total number of persons missing from the wreck of the Pommerania is, according to the latest reports, between forty and fifty.—Whilst a crowded ferry-boat was crossing the Mersey on Tuesday morning, a fog prevailing at the time, she came into collision with a ship lying at anchor in the river, and several persons were drowned.

THE AFGHAN WAR; CABUL EXPEDITIONARY FOR

FROM A SKETCH BY LIE

GOORKHAS ON THE MARCH THROUGH THE TERAI.

D. PULLEY, 3RD GOORKHAS.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

"The rain it raineth every day." In its fullest force I feel the truth of that poetical reminder, now that I have returned from Paris, and have renewed my acquaintance with that fine old British Institution the London mud. It rains likewise, in Paris, from time to time, galore; still the Parisian rain does not habitually get mixed with the fog; and the rain and fog, mingled with sooty and mephitic smoke, are not beaten by the wind from the chimneys of houses which are not lofty enough, down your throat and into your lungs, congesting them while General Cold Weather is getting his red-hot arrows of Bronchitis ready.

It is impossible to rebuild so vast a city as London en bloc, else it might be possible to persuade modern architects that it is both absurd, wasteful, and mischievous, to cover acres and acres of ground with mean little hovels one or two storeys high (or rather low) instead of building tall and handsome blocks of four, five, and six storeys. The constitutional notion of an Englishman's house being his castle may have something to do with our persistency in dwelling in brick-and-mortar boxes scarcely big enough, as the saying is, "to swing a cat in;" but surely, if I have a "flat" or a set of chambers where I can "sport my oak" or close my outer door against unwelcome intruders, I can be as castellated in my domicile as the dweller in an ugly squat cube containing six or eight rooms. We have Queen Anne's Mansions and the "flats" in Victoria-street for the rich, and Peabody lodging-houses for the poor; but I want to see towering Insulæ or "blocks" of chambers, externally handsome and internally comfortable, for the smaller middle classes.

Mem: When the late M. Guizot came to London as Ambassador to the Court of St. James's, the first thing which struck him in driving through that London which he subsequently qualified as "no longer a city, but a province covered with houses," was the miserable meanness, paltriness, and exiguity of the dwelling-houses in the central districts of the town. That was more than forty years ago; yet Seven Dials and Soho exist intact. There is not the slightest reason why a new boulevard, as magnificent as the Avenue de l'Opéra in Paris, should not be constructed from Charing-cross, right through the Dials, to Tottenham-court-road; but I suppose that it would be "un-English" to suggest that the new thoroughfare should not be filled with gin-palaces, simply because so many licensed public-houses already exist on the site to be cleared and rebuilt upon. Give the publicans compensation, and let them take their liquor-bars elsewhere.

The legal world seems to be full of actions and rumours of actions for libel. Hawks are picking out hawks' eyes, wolf is eating wolf, managers are suing journalists, and artists are going to law with critics, in a to me apparently frenzied manner. On Monday and Tuesday, in the Exchequer, came off the great libel case of Whistler v. Ruskin. Mr. Ruskin, in the occult publication entitled "Fors Clavigera," had said some hard things about Mr. Whistler's "nocturnes," "symphonies," and "arrangements." Mr. Whistler, exasperated at being called a coxcomb and a cockney, and accused of ignorance, impudence, and of flinging a pot of paint in the face of the public, brought his action against his critic. He claimed a thousand pounds damages; and the jury gave him a farthing: the learned Judge (Mr. Baron Huddleston) declining to grant costs against the defendant. Into the merits of the case it is no business of mine to enter. I can only express my deep regret that the suit was ever brought at all. Mr. James Whistler happens to have been for many years a valued friend of mine; and I think that I can to some extent apprehend the scope and meaning of his "nocturnes" and "arrangements." "Do you see that star?" asked Napoleon, pointing upwards, to a diplomatist who was venturous enough to animadvert on his Imperial Majesty's policy. "No, Sire!" replied the astonished Ambassador, staring at a very substantial wooden ceiling. "I see it," tranquilly replied Napoleon. Mr. Whistler, never doubt it, sees many things in his own pictures utterly invisible to ordinary amateurs of art.

On the other hand, everybody recognises in Mr. John Ruskin not only an illustrious master of English prose and a consummate critic, but a blameless, magnanimous English gentleman, with a heart of gold. His whole long life through he has been doing good. Well I remember, many years ago, when, in the daily paper with which I was (and am still) connected, I was pleading the cause of a poor young girl who had been seized upon by the Sheriff's officers and locked up in gaol on some wretched matter of a lawyer's costs, that within half a dozen hours of the publication of our appeal a cheque for the sum necessary for the captive's release was forwarded to us by John Ruskin. I have not the honour to know him personally; but I feel sure that he would shrink from inflicting pain, by word or deed, upon anybody. Very possibly the hard epithets which he applied to Mr. Whistler were used strictly in a "Pickwickian" sense. From a similarly "Pickwickian" point of view the Elder Pugin, in a pamphlet on church decoration, once argued that "the man who objected to rood-screens was a miscreant and a villain." Now, I have a rooted objection to rood-screens, because they shut out the laity from the altar. I knew the Elder Pugin and revered him; but I cannot remember that he ever called me, personally, a miscreant or a villain.

Mem: I went down to Westminster Hall on Tuesday afternoon to see the close of the Whistler-Ruskin case. It was about 3.30 p.m., and growing rapidly dark; almost too dark to discern the stately presence of Lady Diana Huddleston and Lady Holker, who were sitting on the bench by the side of the learned Judge. Candles were called for, and brought in by a careful usher. But they gave but a flickering and partial light, and left three fourths of the court in November darkness. Counsel for the plaintiff spoke out of Cimmerian depths, and the voice of counsel for the defence was as one speaking from the abode of Chaos and Old Night. A gruesome spectacle. I could make out, however, on the bench a sumptuous picture, a portrait of a Venetian Doge, by Titian. This picture had been sent down by Mr. Ruskin in order that the jury might see what a really finished work of art was like. But—O vanity of earthly things!—close to the glittering frame of the Titian there was suspended a most commonplace looking coil of old junk. A very uninteresting case about a contract for rope was being tried while the jury in Whistler v. Ruskin were considering their verdict; and the coil of old junk was part and parcel of the evidence.

"And if I am a humbug," said an Irish servant of a "carneying" nature to me once, "shure, are n't some of the nicest people in the wurld humbugs?" With that postulate I thoroughly agree. The same rule may be applied to that style of writing which is satirically styled "gushing." Some of the nicest authors, male and female, whom I know are "gushers;" and I have, myself (so kindly critics tell me), shown, upon occasion, a propensity to "gush." Still I do not think that in the way of "buncombe," "high falutin," and "tall talk," I could ever rise to the altitude or sink to the bathos of the following wonderful paragraph, which appeared in the Times of Thursday touching the recent appearance of Madame Adelina Patti at the Opernhaus, Berlin:—

> Pessimism, Nihilism, and all other grumbling fancies of the sort are scattered to the winds by the sweet voice of the accomplished artist. Life, which popular philosophers declare to be worth nothing, is suddenly converted into a supreme blessing, admitting, as it does, of emotions such as are awakened by Patti. The soul, which only yesterday doubted its own existence, is to-day made conscious of its reality by the charm and melodious sentiment of an accomplished singer. There might be better methods of realising the transcendental, yet art is one among others.

"Cogito; ergo sum," said the old metaphysician. The formula should be altered to "I hear Patti; therefore I exist." But how will it be if you cannot afford twenty marks for a seat in the stalls at the Berlin Opera-House to hear this enchanting "psycho-euthymist?"

To "come down souse," as Edmund Burke phrased it in his famous speech in Parliament on Junius—to descend to the plain level of fact, it would seem that there are other means existing in the German capital just now of a nature to remind you very forcibly of the fact of your being a living, breathing, sentient, and cogitating entity. The police force in Berlin is to be increased in such a ratio as to provide one policeman for every seventy inhabitants. In London the proportion of police constables to the civil population is about one in four hundred. This tremendous augmentation in the ranks of the Berlinese polizei is intended as a step towards the putting down of Socialism by enabling the authorities to exercise a stricter supervision over theatres, coffee-houses, hotels, beer-cellars, newspaper-offices, and the like. So that when you are worried about your passport or feel a policeman's grasp on your collar you will not need to hear La Diva Adelina to be convinced that you are an Entity. It will be sufficient for you to reflect, "They are going to 'run me in;' therefore I exist."

Faithful to my promise not to interfere with the solution of the French Puzzles in the World, I may (I hope without offence) point out that among the "Puzzles" propounded in the current number of the vivacious periodical alluded to, is to name the two shortest and best papers in the works of St. Evremond. I do hope (with the selfishness of a bibliomane) that everybody does not possess a copy of the writings of that delightful essayist and letter writer, "the little old man in the black silk coif" who was carried every morning in a sedan chair through Pall-mall to the house of the Duchess of Mazarin. He always brought with him a pat of butter, made in his own little dairy, for her Grace's breakfast. Next to "Howel's Letters," St. Evremond is the most charming of all reading when you wish to be thoroughly idle. I have a buxom little edition in five volumes, vellum extra, of the writings of the witty Anglo-French gentleman who was appointed by Charles II. to the burlesque governorship of Duck Island in St. James's Park, and I do not intend to lend my St. Evremond to anybody. Still, to students fortunate enough to have picked him up on a bookstall, or patient enough to unearth him in the British Museum reading-room, I may hint that in one particular St. Evremond will well repay the perusal of the curious scholar. A certain letter in the series contains the very strongest inferential evidence as to the name of the "French boy" who sang "love songs in that glorious gallery" at Whitehall on the Sunday evening preceding the death of the Merry Monarch. My Macaulay is at the binder's; but I cannot remember that the illustrious historian has told us who the "French boy" really was.

NEW BOOKS.

Language scarcely enables one to adequately commend such a book as Tent Work in Palestine, by Claude Reignier Conder, R.E. (Richard Bentley and Son), for the subject is so deeply interesting, and the two volumes in which it is treated testify to so much conscientious labour and perilous adventure, to say nothing of the minor matters, such as perspicuous and intelligent description, liberality and excellence in the case of the illustrations, clearness of type, and general sightliness, that nothing but personal inspection and intimate acquaintance can give a proper idea of the ungrudging spirit in which compendation ought to be awarded. The volumes are illustrated by J. W. Whymper; and they contain a narrative of which it is easy to give an account in a few words. Most people have heard of the Palestine Exploration Fund, though they may not be aware that the committee of that fund, acting under the advice of previous experienced explorers, undertook, and actually commenced, at the end of the year 1871 or the beginning of 1872, "the Survey of Western Palestine, to the scale of one inch to the mile, the object being the complete examination of the whole country, with an amount of accuracy equal to that of Ordnance work." The surveying party was originally under the command of Captain Stewart, R.E., who, unfortunately, was soon invalided home; he was, however, promptly succeeded by Lieutenant Conder, R.E., who "returned to England in September, 1875, having surveyed 4700 square miles," and who, leaving the remaining 1300 square miles to be finished, as they were last year by Lieutenant Kitchener, has published, under the auspices of the committee, who, be it well understood, "do not, collectively, adopt the conclusions of any of their officers," a "personal history of his work, without specially entering on the scientific results." If anybody should ask what was the main object with which the survey of Palestine was undertaken, the reply is: "to collect materials in illustration of the Bible," to compare the information acquired upon the very soil of the "land" with the accounts given and the references made in the "book." Few Englishmen, however "enlightened," can fail to be deeply stirred at the bare mention of that land, which has been for ages known as the "holy land," or of that book which still holds its place as the "book of books;" and there will be a sense of relief in many thousands of hearts when it is seen how hopefully and confidently the leader of the surveying expedition can speak "of the historic and authentic character of the Sacred Volume" from his own personal observation and comparison. As for the work accomplished by the expedition, the story is in many respects quite incredible; not, of course, that there is any intention here of throwing doubt upon the narrator's veracity, but that the facts recorded are simply stupendous. The work, we are told, was "carried out by a party never stronger than five as regards Europeans," and it has now been completed in little over five years. And what was the work? Why, a thorough survey of 6000 square miles, "from Dan to Beersheba, and from Jordan to the Mediterranean," the task of identification of places being superadded to the labour of actual surveying. And the feat was achieved by the few labourers, camping out for the most part, amid perils almost as numerous and as disheartening as those which St. Paul has enumerated in the memorable list of the dangers he encountered. In one portion of the narrative we are astonished to read that a thousand square miles were surveyed in eleven weeks, a rate of progress which, if the remark be pardonable as the expression of honest wonderment, could scarcely have been surpassed by the celebrated Munchausen. Howbeit a still more astounding rate of progress, but over a shorter distance, is, if memory may be trusted, recorded in one of the chapters. As regards the expenditure, it is melancholy to reflect that the leader of the expedition should have "received letters complaining of the expense of the Survey," and that those letters should have been "the last drop in the cup" of the troubles which were then confronting him, so that he himself was worried into the fever from which his comrades were suffering; but it is easy to believe that the outlay must have been large, though, to judge from the account given, the sum spent to defray the personal charges of the party cannot have amounted to more than an almost inappreciable fraction of the whole. In that respect, not only economy, but something like parsimony, appears to have been studied. Of this, however, readers can form their own opinion. That the little band of surveyors worked with their lives in their hands is quite evident; but the most serious affair in which they were engaged occurred in July, 1875, at Safed, in Upper Galilee. A camping-ground had been chosen to the north of Safed, and the tents had been about half set up, when a highly respectable old Sheikh began to throw stones, as if he had been a mere Christian child taking shots at a railway train. The Sheikh was immediately confronted by the leader of the expedition, who was minded to try polite expostulation, but, before he could carry out his intention, was seized by the throat and roughly shaken—an insult which could not be endured in the eyesight of the surrounding natives, and which caused the Sheikh to be twice knocked clean off his legs with the fist after the English fashion. Hereupon the Maronites who were in attendance upon the Englishmen seized the Sheikh and bound him; while the Sheikh, on his part, shouted for his people, fierce recriminations commenced between the Maronite and Moslem bystanders; and, in the twinkling of an eye, there commenced one of those "fanatical riots" which the surveying party had constantly endeavoured, hitherto successfully, to avoid. Nail-studded clubs, battle-axes, hunting-crops, stones, and firearms were employed; ominous shouts of "Allah! Allah!" and of "Din! Din Muhammed" were raised; and blood began to flow. But, as comedy ever lurks in the chinks of tragedy, the leader of the expedition shook with laughter, even at this critical moment, to see himself "supported by Sergeant Armstrong, who stood at 'the charge,' armed with the legs of the camera-obscura!" It was no laughing matter, however, as may be gathered from the fact that not one of the surveying party escaped injury, although no life appears to have been lost, and from the punishment inflicted, after an inquiry and trial, upon the Sheikh and his abettors. He "was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment; his slave, who was proved to have used various weapons, to two years of hard labour; and several other offenders to shorter terms. The sum of £270 was also paid, as a fine, to the Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund." Thus was the honour of the British lion vindicated; and the volumes may now be left to fulfil, as they are pretty sure to do, the expectations which may have been excited. Let it be gratefully stated, however, in conclusion, that there is not only an index, but an index at the end of each volume.

The sixteenth edition of Haydn's Dictionary of Dates, by Benjamin Vincent, Librarian to the Royal Institution of Great Britain, has just been published, brought down to the present autumn. Exactly two years have elapsed since the publication of the last edition, and almost every page of the new volume affords evidence of the vigilant diligence of the editor in the work of revision, and in the record of the multiplicity of events of a very varied character that have taken place during the time that has passed. Nothing incidental to our common humanity of any importance appears to be omitted, and few persons can be aware of the daily labour and prompt judgment indispensably required to maintain the value of a work of this nature. From its scope and size, also, it is very open to criticism, and information useful to some may be justly regarded as superfluous by others. The editor, however, in his motto, expresses his hope that "the ignorant may learn and the learned may like to be reminded," and in his preface gratefully acknowledges corrections and suggestions received. In the present edition the political history of the chief countries of the world has been continued in the tables, the more important events being noticed in separate articles. These include the paramount Eastern Question; the negotiations preliminary and subsequent to the Russo-Turkish war; the battles and sieges; the Treaties of San Stefano and Berlin; the Anglo-Turkish Convention; the occupation of Cyprus, Bosnia, Bessarabia, and Batoum; and the great Constitutional struggles in France; the attempted assassinations of the Emperor of Germany; the Presidential election and party conflicts in the United States; and the Kaffir War. In regard to our own country we duly noted a great number of official changes, including the Cabinet Ministers, the Bishops, Judges, Governors of colonies, and other functionaries, the progress of the revenue, trade, the Bank of England, the affairs of the Army and Navy, the latest Acts of Parliament, &c. In Ecclesiastical matters we have the Pan-Anglican Conference and Church Congresses, the new bishoprics, the prosecution of Messrs. Tooth, Mackonochie, and Edwards, the Holy Cross Society, and the newly-founded Reformed Episcopal Church. Attention has been specially given to educational progress; and that topographical history has not been neglected will be seen in the articles on London, Edinburgh, Dublin, Liverpool, Manchester, and other important places. As might be expected from the official position of the editor, science has received particular attention, as shown in the articles on the telephone, microphone, phonograph, electric light, Mars' satellites, planets, radiometer, new chemical elements, otheoscope, phoneidoscope, spontaneous generation, the germ theory of disease, and weights and measures. As regards Archæology we may refer to the articles on obelisks (including Cleopatra's Needle), Babylon, Nineveh, and Mycenæ. In the present edition extra attention has been given to philanthropic and religious societies, including the Mansion House funds, Hospital Sundays and Saturdays, and their results; and, in relation to geographical discovery, we have the Arctic Expedition, and Mr. H. Stanley's journey through Africa. One very painful part of the editor's duty has been to record the Indian and Chinese famines, wrecks (the Eurydice, Princess Alice, &c.), railway accidents, coal explosions (Abercarne, &c.); and also various articles relating to crime; trials, including the turf and lease frauds, police detectives, the Penge case, the Albert Assurance Company, and Artisans' Dwellings Company officials, Madame Rachel, &c. Among miscellaneous articles may be mentioned a list of assassinations and attempts, the Brissa Prize, the Library Association, the Paris Exhibition, the Hibbert fund, pedestrian and swimming feats, the University boat-race and Derby winners, Colorado beetle, Mennonites and Molokani, Lazzarites, Opportunists; Albert, Davy, and Faraday medals; Caxton celebration, Index Society, &c., in all which the editor has endeavoured to answer not only the question when? but also where? how? and why? as far as his limited space permitted.

Under the presidency of Colonel Beresford, M.P., a meeting of watermen and lightermen was held at the City Terminus Hotel, Cannon-street, last Saturday, to protest against the report issued by the Board of Trade relative to the Princess Alice inquiry, and to adopt measures for opposing the proposed new Thames Navigation Bill.

On Tuesday evening the Hon. Evelyn Ashley, M.P., opened a new co-operative literary institute intended for the instruction and amusement of the inhabitants of the Shaftesbury estate; and, being affiliated with the Working Men's Club and Institute Union, the new institute had already received 127 applications for membership.

In the Admiralty Court on Wednesday morning an action for damages brought by the London Steam-Boat Company, the owners of the Princess Alice, against Messrs. The Company of Haberdashers have given £10 10s. in aid of the funds of the Royal Albert Orphan Asylum.—This company has forwarded £50 10s. to the Mansion House Fund for the promotion of the holding of the Royal Agricultural Show at Kilburn next year; and the General Omnibus Company have stated their willingness to offer a prize of £25 for the best horse suitable for omnibus work.

At a meeting of the Hospital Sunday Fund Committee held on Monday, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, the president, vice-president, and secretary were empowered to engage a suitable room or rooms for an office, the rental not to exceed £100 per annum. It was resolved to ask the Duke of Bedford and the Rev. Canon Fleming to fill the vacancies caused by the death of Earl Russell and the Rev. Mr. Hoyse. It is proposed that Hospital Sunday shall be the third Sunday in June next.

The committee of the China Famine Relief Fund have issued a balance-sheet showing that the total amount raised in connection with the fund is £32,303. A further sum of about £16,000 has been contributed through various missionary societies in England, and has been sent direct to China. Mr. Forrest, the British Acting Consul at Tien-Tsin, speaks confidently of the favourable impression made on the Chinese by the sympathy which England has shown them in their need.

The weekly return of metropolitan pauperism shows that the total number of paupers at the end of the third week in November was 80,665, of whom 41,704 were in workhouses, and 38,961 received outdoor relief. Compared with the corresponding week in 1877, these figures show an increase of 178; but as compared 1876 and 1875 they show a decrease of 1056 and 3791 respectively. The number of vagrants relieved on the last day of the week was 926, of whom 665 were men, 219 women, and 42 children under sixteen.

On Monday evening the existing method of lighting by gas and by one form of the electric light (the Jablochkoff) was subjected to a species of competition at Billingsgate Market, in the presence of a considerable number of spectators. There was some difference of opinion as to the practical efficiency of the new mode of lighting; but it seems to be generally agreed that for the riverside and the street-lighting the experiment succeeded, but as regards the interior of the market many persons doubted the superiority of the light to gas.

The appeal of Colonel Dawkins to the House of Lords against a demurrer allowed by Vice-Chancellor Malins in a suit instituted by him against Lord Penrhyn, his cousin, for the recovery of a fourth part of Penrhyn Castle and the lands belonging to it, which he claimed under the will of John Pennant, deceased, the respondent's father, was heard on Wednesday. The Lords Justices of the Appeal Court had sustained the Vice-Chancellor's judgment, and the House of Lords now dismissed the appeal with costs.

A meeting of the council of the Charity Organisation Society was held on Wednesday in the hall of the Inner Temple, the objects being that a knowledge of the aims of the society should be more widely known, and that the Bar of the country should advocate its importance. Mr. Baron Pollock, who presided, mentioned some details respecting London charities, and argued the need of this society from the fact that four million pounds were annually given for charitable purposes in the metropolis. Sir H. James, M.P., moved a resolution approving of the society, which was seconded by Mr. Forsyth, M.P., supported by other members of Parliament, and adopted.

Baroness Burdett-Coutts, in distributing the prizes to the successful students at the St. Stephen's Schools, Westminster, on Tuesday evening, referred to the Elementary Education Act of 1870, observing that she could not but regard it as a very strong expression of the piety and patriotism of the country. Among the principal awards were those to Frederick C. Pendry (silver medal and certificate presented by the Carriage-makers' Company), and to George William Irons, who had won the Prince Consort's prize of twenty-five guineas, with a certificate, being the highest prize in Great Britain awarded by the Society of Arts to members of evening classes and mechanics' institutions.

A tutor named Weston was summoned at the Clerkenwell Police Court for not sending his son, aged seven, to school. The defendant, who stated that he was a properly qualified tutor, having passed his examinations at the London University, said he preferred to teach his boy at home, as he found that he got into bad company at the board school. The School Board officer said the defendant had no time to teach the boy, as he was out all day. The magistrate dismissed the summons, observing that the Act did not specify the time at which children should be taught, and said that the father, who was properly qualified to teach, might give his son lessons at five in the morning if it suited him.

On Monday evening the first of the three courses of lectures named after their founder, the late Dr. Cantor, which are given every year under the auspices of the Society of Arts, was begun in the theatre of the society's house, John-street, Adelphi. These lectures are especially devoted to the practical treatment, on a scientific basis, of manufactures and handicrafts, and kindred subjects. Those now in process of delivery are on "Mathematical Instruments," particular attention being paid to the methods of their construction and use.

The Master of the Rolls had before him on Tuesday an action in which Signor Bettini, the operatic singer, sought to enforce a payment of £2000 by his wife, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, under a deed of separation. The arrangement as to division of property stipulated that a palace in Rome, freed from incumbrance by the sale of another property in Paris, should be Signor Bettini's share. The Paris property, however, did not realise enough by £2000 to clear the palace, and Signor Bettini sought for an order upon his wife's trustees to make up the deficiency. His Lordship, having heard the arguments, strongly advised the parties to arrange the matter between themselves, and adjourned the case for a week in order to enable them to do so.

The Metropolitan Board of Works decided yesterday week, as a concession to the fire insurance companies, to station a steam fire-engine temporarily in Watling-street. It was explained that, in respect to the provision of new Fire Brigade stations in the City, the Board was doing all that was possible within its prescribed limits of the produce of a halfpenny rate; and that no inconvenience or injury had been sustained by the City during the six months that the central station had been in Southwark.—The chairman, engineer, and several members of the Board went down the Thames last Saturday, and took samples of the water at the time when it would be most likely to be contaminated with sewage from the outfall works at Crossness. Their object is to decide the question raised by Captain Calver in his report to the Thames Conservators, and by others, whether the discharge into the river is injurious.

Last Saturday the Court of Appeal gave judgment in a case which had been argued before it, affecting the religion of the children of Mr. and Mrs. Agar-Ellis. The father is a Protestant and the mother a Roman Catholic, and the question was whether a promise made by Mr. Agar-Ellis before his marriage, that the children of the union should be brought up as Roman Catholics, could be retracted by him now. Vice-Chancellor Malins had decided that the children should be educated in the doctrines of the Church of England, and against this decision Mrs. Agar-Ellis appealed. Lords Justices James, Baggallay, and Thesiger now held that the whole responsibility of the children's education should be thrown upon the father, and that no order should be made as to the religion in which they should be brought up.

There were 2530 births and 1547 deaths registered in London last week. The deaths included 18 from measles, 11 from diphtheria, 31 from whooping-cough, 24 from different forms of fever, and 15 from diarrhœa. The fatal cases of scarlet fever, which had steadily increased from 24 to 64 in the nine preceding weeks, declined to 54 last week, and were 38 below the corrected average. The deaths from measles were 32 below the average. Whooping-cough fatality was also considerably below the average. The deaths referred to diphtheria were 2 less than those in the previous week. The fatal cases of fever showed a marked decline from the numbers in recent weeks, and were 17 below the corrected average. The deaths referred to lung diseases, which had been 434 and 431 in the two previous weeks, further declined to 428 last week, and were 40 below the corrected weekly average; 277 resulted from bronchitis and 107 from pneumonia. In Greater London 3124 births and 1846 deaths were registered. The mean temperature was 40·6 deg., and 1·2 deg. below the average in the corresponding week of sixty years. The duration of registered bright sunshine in the week was 11·8 hours, the sun being above the horizon during 60 hours.

At the Sailors' Home, in Well-street, London Docks, on Saturday last the committee of the Shipwrecked Mariners' Society presented Captain T. M. Almond, master of the ship Decapolis, with a gold medal, and the crew with silver medals, for their heroic conduct in saving the crew of the Eblana on Oct. 10. The crew consisted of Martin Pearce Organ, Frederick Christiesen, William Quirk, August Hausen, William Adamson, David Stephen, George Herbert Adamson, Harry Saunders, and G. W. R. Bourne, apprentice, who, in addition to the medal, received a sextant, as the committee considered his conduct most praiseworthy in volunteering to go with each boat to the rescue of the unfortunate men on the Eblana. Captain the Hon. Francis Maude, R.N., chairman of the committee of the Shipwrecked Mariners' Society, occupied the chair, and before presenting the prizes referred to the gallant conduct of the captain and crew of the Decapolis on the occasion in question. He also said that their services had met with the warm approval of the Board of Trade. He afterwards incidentally alluded to the advantages of the Shipwrecked Mariners' Society, which he urged all sailors to become members of. They had now 50,000 members, who brought in between £7000 and £8000, but they really received nearly three times as much in return.

At the meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, held on Monday evening in Burlington-gardens, a paper was read by the Rev. J. P. Farler upon "Usambara, East Africa, and the Adjoining Country." After a brief review of the travels of Dr. Krapf, Messrs. Burton and Speke, and Mr. New in the country under notice, Mr. Farler went on to describe Usambara, which has been called the Switzerland of Africa, and which forms a link in the great East Coast range extending from Abyssinia and Natal. A large portion of the paper was occupied with an examination of the country in its physical aspects, a description of the manners and customs of the natives, and a comprehensive survey of its history so far as it has been recorded. The paper took the form to some extent of a personal narrative of the journey of the writer to Mpwapwa, where, he said, he frequently met men who had been to Uzaga and the Masai country, through which land, he considered, was to be found the only feasible way to opening up the equatorial lakes. Such an expedition as this Mr. Farler considered quite practicable, and he offered to assist any attempt in this direction by procuring the right men and obtaining introductions from one native chief to another. After a discussion, in which Sir T. F. Buxton, who is aiding the construction of a road to that portion of the African continent, took part, the proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the reader of the paper and a similar compliment to the chairman.

The Extra Supplement.

NORWICH CATHEDRAL.

The good old city of Norwich, to which our attention has been directed by the disastrous flood of last week, the subject of two Illustrations in this Number, owes its prosperity to Flemish Protestant woollen manufacturers. But it has been a Bishop's See from the reign of William Rufus, in the year 1094. East Anglian Bishops had before resided successively at Thetford, Elmham, and Dunwich since the conversion of the heathen "folk" there in the seventh century. The first builder of Norwich Cathedral was Bishop Herbert de Losinga, the first Norman prelate who held his Court at Norwich. In different views of the city, from Mousehold-heath, from the Castle Hill, and from the low meadows around Thorpe, this stately ecclesiastical pile is the most striking feature. Its central tower and spire, rising to the height of 287 ft., may be well seen from the south wall of the cloisters, or from the lower close. The tower and flanking turrets are of Norman architecture, but the spires are of Perpendicular Gothic. So, too, with the main body of the building; the nave and choir, internally, consist of fourteen bays, of fine Norman arches, with similar arches in the triforium above; three bays are included in the choir, but its eastward portion, in the clerestory and roof, has been changed to Perpendicular Gothic. The transepts, also, have been somewhat altered by architects of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; but the original Norman ground-plan is everywhere preserved. The side aisles are carried on, beyond the transepts, to form a procession corridor round the chancel. The interior view is rendered more effective by the choir roof rising 14 ft. higher than the nave, and by the open Norman arcades of the central tower; the roof of the nave is a beautiful structure of "lierne vaulting," the work of Bishop Lehart, from 1446 to 1472. There are many other details, architectural or ornamental, which deserve admiration. The cloisters, in the Decorated Gothic style, are considered very fine. The Erpingham gate, and that of St. Ethelbert, leading into the Cathedral precincts, have some historical interest. The Bishop's Palace has been more than once rebuilt. There was once a Lord Bishop, Henry Despenser, in the time of Richard II., who personally wielded a huge two-handed sword, with his knights and archers, against the riotous local mob of Norfolk, in league with Wat Tyler. The same warlike prelate, in 1383, led a body of troops into Flanders, to fight for an elect Pope against an Anti-Pope, and stormed the towns of Gravelines and Dunkirk. Bishops of Norwich are now better employed.

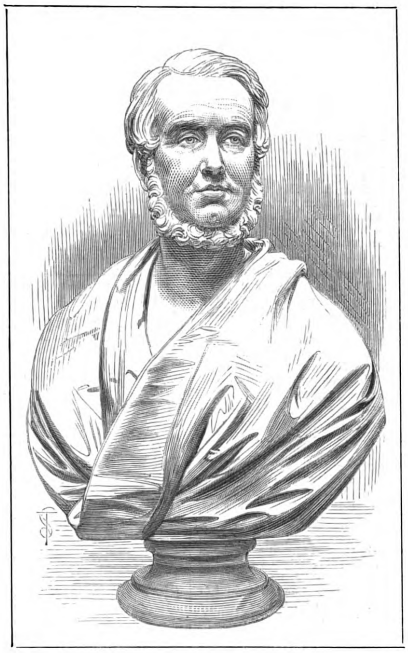
DURHAM-TERRACE, QUEBEC.

The "summer season" at Quebec, in Lower Canada, reaches its height in the autumn. This would seem to be a paradox. It is nevertheless true that, after Long Branch and Newport are deserted, American tourists in Canada still linger at Quebec, about 350 miles north. Many of these birds of passage, indeed, fly northward from Saratoga and Lake George as the days grow shorter and cooler in that latitude. Every spot chosen as a "resort," however, has its own advantages; and there are special seasons of the year when they are best enjoyed. The Americans, eager to spend the brighter months anywhere except in their respective homes, have discovered that the autumn days at Quebec are particularly delightful. The air is cool, crisp, and clear; above all, the evening twilight is of very long duration, and very beautiful. This latter effect in nature is, perhaps, the principal reason why Quebec has obtained such wide celebrity on the American continent as a place to be visited in autumn. Tourists from all parts of the New World may be found there in September and October strolling about Durham-terrace during the afternoon and far into the evening, to enjoy the long, gentle, and delicious twilight. Though at other seasons Quebec is one of the dullest of dull places, at this time it is very difficult to find apartments, either at the "St. Louis" or at the smaller hotels. Our artist has given a sketch of Durham-terrace and its surroundings as it appears at the height of this "fashionable season." For several reasons the scene illustrated may be considered one of the most interesting to be found in either the New World or the Old. There are few cities in either hemisphere for which the romance of history has done more to give it special interest than Quebec. But we need not seek for the interest of Durham-terrace in history. The crowd of people there gathered represents all the variety of opinions it would be possible to collect together between the Hudson Bay and the Gulf of Mexico. England herself is represented, not indirectly only by her loyal colonial subjects, but by gentlemen who have come out from England in various official capacities. There are leading officers of the Hudson Bay Company—men whose duties lead them into the rough ways and wild haunts of the fur-hunter's life, but many of whom are cultured gentlemen, and are glad to spend their periods of leisure among the refinements of polite association. There are the native statesmen of Canada, who are working out a problem of independent government hardly less interesting than that of their neighbours across the frontier, and they now command the frankly-expressed respect of those neighbours. There are many men of wealth and culture—merchants, bankers, and lawyers—of Upper and Lower Canada. Of the Americans present, many are from the Southern States, for the northern latitude of the St. Lawrence has proved unusually attractive to these people. After the rebellion, too, and before their bitter feelings had subsided, they flocked to Canada in large numbers, self-exiled from the northern resorts of their own country. Add to these their fellow-citizens, now friendly, but still differing widely from them in sentiments, manners, and appearance. We have already enough to give the gathering on Durham-terrace all that interest of variety which is the greatest charm of a popular resort.



DURHAM TERRACE, QUEBEC, CANADA.

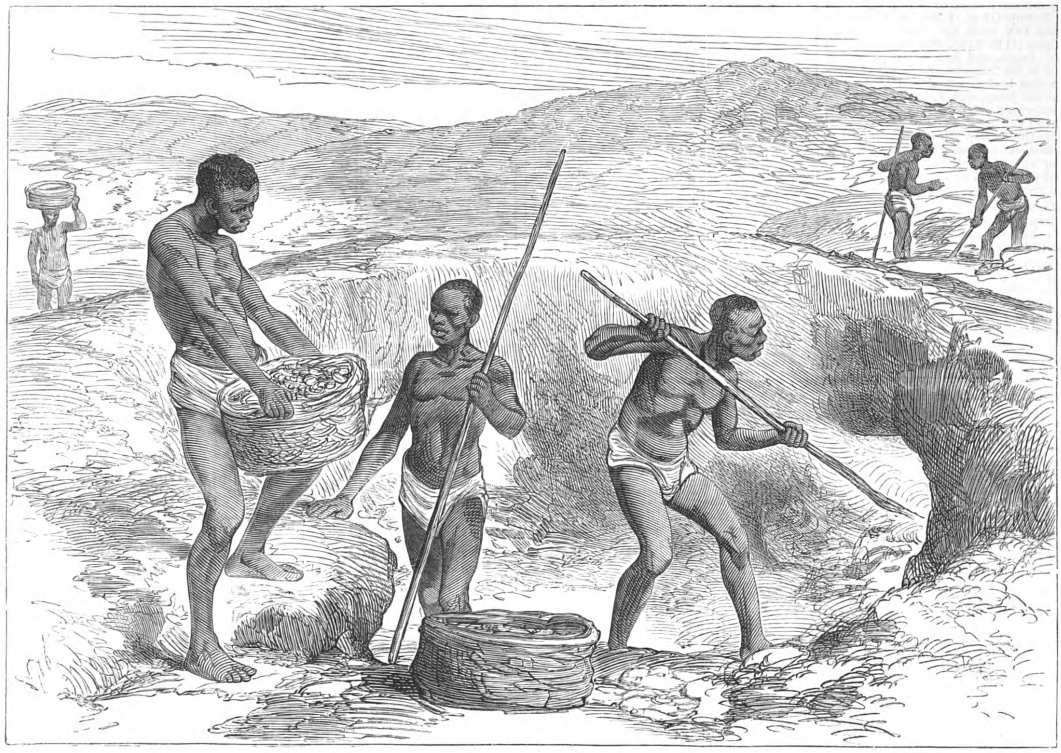
But there is another element which differs more widely from all the classes mentioned than they do from each other. France is there also; France as she exists in the New World, modified by two centuries and a half of wide separation from Paris; a France which Paris has entirely forgotten, but which has clung to the traditions of the old French religion, the French language, and French manners. The Canadian French gentlemen talk English most of them, but with an accent—as if they were Parisians in Brighton. They gesticulate quite as earnestly and as incessantly. They are quite as enthusiastic, and they exclaim "Mon Dieu!" with quite as little thought that they are addressing the Deity. They are also as polite as the French of Europe. For the most part, they are professional men—for to enter one of the learned professions is the pet ambition of a French Canadian boy—and they are ardent politicians. Many of them are legislators in the Dominion Parliament. Some of the most cultivated are still Catholics; but, determined to be untrammelled, are members of the "Institut Canadien," with its interdicted books. Some of them, however, are like their "foreign" French brethren of the Continent—Free-thinkers.

We have been speaking of the men only; the ladies of Durham-terrace present a picture of somewhat less variety, but it is not less interesting. The variety is less, because the Americans and the French Canadiennes, caring but little for the commercial and political interests which divide their fathers and brothers, join in a common ambition to be prettily dressed. The fair Anglo-Canadian ladies are equally interested, probably, in the same direction, though they habitually put more restraint upon the gratification of their tastes. The American ladies have the advantage over their French-Canadienne rivals of a closer intimacy with the latest Parisian fashion-plates. The latter, however, exhibit all a Parisienne's love of showy raiment, if they have not preserved her taste through all these years. They are inclined to overdress, as are their American friends; but they are not restricted by the same artistic rules as laid down in Paris; the result, therefore, is less harmonious. Probably the less prononcés costumes of the English Canadian ladies would be more in accordance with the tastes of their sisters here at home than those of either the French or Americans. Leaving aside the all-absorbing question of dress, the ladies show almost as much variety in manners, ideas, and speech as the gentlemen; and they have some few ideas, of course, on the minor subjects of politics, if not of commerce.

In the background, and on all sides of this variegated assembly, are such objects of historical interest as few American cities can boast. The old city itself is quaint and picturesque, with such crooked little streets and old-time nooks as are fast disappearing even from English towns. Beneath the citadel is seen the "lower town," with its warehouses and the shipping along the water's edge. Rising abruptly above it is the Ehrenbreitstein of the St. Lawrence and of America, the height which the brave Montcalm, who was the first to fortify it, afterwards lost to our own General Wolfe. They both fell mortally wounded at the same battle; the monument on the right of our view was raised to the undivided memory of those two heroes. The guns on the right commemorate a more distant field of English success—they were captured in Sebastopol. Beyond all flows the most majestic of grand rivers. The St. Lawrence is at no place, we believe, through the entire 700 miles of its course, less than a mile in width, being upwards of five miles wide at its source in Lake Ontario. Immediately below Quebec it again reaches that width, and 400 miles beyond it is still called a "river," where it flows into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, with an expanse of water seventy-five miles from shore to shore. The Saguenay, St. Charles, and innumerable other rivers flowing into it are favourite haunts of sportsmen and tourists, Quebec and Durham-terrace being the general rendezvous. Curiously enough, all these rivers, including the St. Lawrence itself, will be frozen solid, to remain so many months, within a few weeks after the autumn guests disappear from the Terrace.

BUST OF THE LATE M. W. BALFE, THE COMPOSER.

THE BALFE MEMORIAL BUST.



Some time ago a committee was formed in Dublin for the purpose of raising some memorial in that, his native, city to the popular composer Michael Balfe, whose music and fame are so widely known. They consulted his widow, Madame Balfe; she thus expressed her views:—"It was my great and anxious desire to have such a memorial, offered spontaneously by persons whose opinion might be taken as representing the Irish musical public, and which would be a genuine tribute of affection. I feel that a bust of Balfe placed in the National Gallery of Dublin, his native city, in the department specially devoted to illustrious Irishmen, would be a natural offering to his memory." The committee, having assented to these views of Madame Balfe, placed the commission for a bust in the hands of the eminent Irish sculptor Mr. Thomas Farrell, R.H.A. We think we may congratulate the artist and the public on the successful production of an admirable work of art, which will faithfully convey to future generations the lineaments of one still well and affectionately remembered by many of his friends. The bust, when completed, was placed in the National Gallery of Ireland, on July 6 last, in the presence of a distinguished company. It was unveiled by Sir Robert Stewart, Doctor of Music.

A special department has been formed by the present director of the Academy, Mr. Henry Doyle, R.H.A., in which a collection has been begun of portraits and busts of distinguished Irishmen. It has already made considerable progress, and will soon be a most interesting Irish "National Portrait Gallery." It contains marble busts of Moore, the poet; Sheil, the orator; Maclise, the painter; Archbishop Murray, and others. There are portraits also of Burke, Grattan, Swift, Lady Morgan, Lover, Sheridan, the Duke of Wellington, and others. Among the painters of these portraits are to be found Reynolds, Lely, Gainsborough, Hogarth, and Lawrence. To have a bust placed in this Irish Pantheon is, therefore, no small distinction. We noticed last week that a memorial window has been placed in St. Patrick's Cathedral in honour of Balfe, beside a window already erected to the memory of another Irish musician, Sir John Stevenson. Both these are due to the exertions of the Professor of Music in the University of Dublin, Sir Robert Stewart. The window is by Mr. Ballantine, of Edinburgh.

SKETCHES IN AFRICA.

We present another Engraving from Mr. H. B. Thelwall's sketches of the habits of the native population on the Mozambique coast, near the mouth of the Zambesi and Shiré rivers. They are diligent cultivators of the soil, and, having learnt the virtues of manure, will obtain lime by collecting and burning the masses of ancient sea-shells, extensive beds of which, the relics of past geological changes, are found at some distance inland.

The course of events in South Africa has compelled the annexation of another strip of territory to the dominions of the English Crown. The region round the St. John's River lying between Kaffraria and Natal, and forming part of the district known as Pondoland, has, by proclamation of Sir Bartle Frere, been annexed to Cape Colony, on the deposition of the chief Umquikela. On Aug. 31 the British flag was hoisted by General Sir F. Thesiger, now Lord Chelmsford, who crossed the bar of the river, and steamed up, the first occasion on which a steamer had ever been inside the bar. The country is beautiful and fertile; the climate is healthy; and cattle, and poultry, and game abound. The river, some distance above its mouth, passes between two high precipices, which have been named, that on the right bank Mount Thesiger, and that on the left bank Mount Sullivan. British Residents have been appointed for the newly-acquired territory, Major Elliot for all the tribes on the right or western bank of the St. John's River, and the Rev. J. Oxley Oxland for all on the left or eastern bank.

SKETCHES IN AFRICA: BURNING SHELLS FOR LIME.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

We need only devote a few lines to the conclusion of the racing season of 1878, on which the curtain fell at Kempton Park on Saturday afternoon. Turning first to the Manchester meeting, we note that, on the Thursday, Lutestring, a daughter of Brown Bread and Lute, ran away with two Nurseries, winning just as easily with 8 st. 6 lb. as she had done with 13 lbs. less on her back, and she must be a far better animal than was generally supposed. The Manchester November Handicap, to which £1000 was added, attracted a good field of a dozen on the Friday, and, at last, Belphœbe (9 st. 5 lb.), with all her weight, started favourite. The comparatively unknown Senator (6 st. 6 lb.), who is a good-looking colt and was very fit, also found plenty of supporters, and Attalus (7 st. 10 lb.), whose victory over this course in the summer had not been forgotten, had also plenty of admirers. The last-named whipped round when the flag fell, and lost so much ground that his chance was at once extinguished; and though Senator ran very prominently for about a mile and a quarter, he was beaten when half way up the straight. From this point Belphœbe managed to keep in front, though Footstep (7 st. 7 lb.) made a great effort from the distance, and was only beaten by a neck. Considering her welter weight, this was a very great performance on the part of Belphœbe; and Avontes and she are unquestionably the hero and heroine of the back-end meetings. The immense amount of work that he has done has at last told its tale on old Ecossais, who failed signally to give 5 lb. to Telescope, even over his favourite five furlongs. The three days at Kempton Park proved a thorough success, and the authorities made a really genuine effort to keep out objectionable characters, with a completely satisfactory result. Large fields contested nearly every event; and on Saturday the Kempton Park Handicap brought out thirteen. None of them, however, had any chance with Avontes (8 st. 11 lb.), who was ridden by Archer; and, later in the day, the same jockey had a successful mount on Breadfinder (8 st. 12 lb.), with whom he defeated a field of eighteen in the Richmond Nursery Handicap.

The sport provided at the Croydon November Meeting was fully up to the average, but rain descended in such a pitiless manner on all three days that only the most inveterate racegoers cared to leave home, and it cannot be said that the steeplechase season proper has commenced with much éclat. R. I'Anson rode two magnificent races on the first day; and Quiss, the champion hunter, secured a stake in such fine style as to quite efface the memory of his defeat at Kempton Park last week. The Irish division did pretty well, as Lottery and Bacchus each won their respective engagements, and the latter, who is only a four-year-old, shows great promise over hurdles. There was nothing worthy of note on Wednesday except the Grand National Hurdle Race, and even this failed to keep up its reputation, as only seven runners, of a very moderate class, came to the post for it. Old Scamp (12 st. 7 lb.), who won the same event two years ago, started favourite, and Boniface (11 st. 2 lb.), who ran fairly well in the St. Leger, and had never previously performed in the "illegitimate" line of business, was also backed heavily. He, however, fell at the last jump, and, Scamp being beaten directly afterwards, the French mare Chimère (10 st. 13 lb.) had matters all her own way. It is probable that Scamp was second best; but he was eased when it was clear that he had no chance of success, and Jacobin (11 st. 8 lb.) and Royal Oak II. (11 st. 7 lb.) finished second and third respectively.

The Master of the Buckhounds announces that, hydrophobia having appeared among her Majesty's hounds, hunting will be discontinued until further notice.

The season of statistics has now set in with its accustomed severity, and about the first batch issued are those in connection with the jockeys of 1878. For the fifth successive season F. Archer has distanced all his rivals, having credited himself with the extraordinary and unprecedented number of 229 successful mounts; and this feat is the more remarkable from the fact that he has never been able to weigh out under 8 st. 2 lb. For the fifth time also Constable ranks second, with 96; and then comes little Lemaire, who has suddenly sprung up from 18 wins in 1877 to 71, and must undoubtedly be regarded as the crack light-weight of the day. Cannon (68), Morgan (58), Goater (57), Fordham (54), and Snowden (50), have all done well; and the capital score made by Fordham, who did not commence riding until the season was some weeks old and retired from the saddle some time before its conclusion must be very gratifying to the admirers of, perhaps, the most talented horseman of this or any other time.

On Tuesday last W. Spencer and C. T. Bullman, who have both gained considerable reputation among men of the second class, sculled from Putney to Mortlake for £100 a side. The latter went off with a very fast stroke, and, as Spencer made no effort to keep with him, he led by fully half a dozen lengths as he passed Craven Point. From this point Spencer began to draw up, and, Bullman being completely rowed out, a foul occurred just below Hammersmith Bridge. Spencer then went away and won at his leisure, the race having, in reality, been decided in his favour on the foul, as Bullman was clearly in the wrong.

The American Billiard Tournament at the Royal Aquarium terminated last Saturday evening in favour of Joseph Bennett; and never was success more thoroughly deserved, as the exchampion seems to have recovered his best form, and played with consistent brilliancy right through the seven days. His best breaks numbered 213 (26 and 24), 117 (11 and 11), 173 (37), unfinished, 140 (8, 4, and 5), 176 (55), 128 (32) unfinished, 143 (32), and 100 (31). G. Collins, who took second prize, played splendidly at times, but was a little uncertain; and the same may be said of T. Taylor, who has not had much practice of late. D. Richards was singularly unlucky; he has never played better in public, but each of his opponents appeared to perform better against him than in any of their other games during the tournament. The figures in brackets denote the number of consecutive spot strokes in each break. The handicap attracted a large number of spectators, and two more on the same principle have been arranged.

The Six Days' Bicycle-Race at the Agricultural Hall resulted in the victory of Cann of Sheffield, who rode 1060 miles 4 laps in the time, and this is decidedly the best long distance on record. Edlin, a lad of only eighteen, rode him a close race for the greater part of the distance, and finished up with a record of 1025 miles 1½ laps. None of the other competitors succeeded in covering 1000 miles.

Mr. Gye, of Covent-Garden Theatre, was accidentally shot on Wednesday evening, while on a visit to Dutchley. He is under medical treatment.

The colonelcy of the 10th Foot, vacant by the death of General Sir John Garvock, has been conferred upon Lieutenant-General Prince William Augustus Edward of Saxe-Weimar, C.B.

Tuesday's Gazette announces that the Queen has appointed Mr. George Greville to be a Third Secretary in her Majesty's Diplomatic Service, and Lieutenant-Colonel Gustavus Hume, Clerk of the Cheque and Adjutant of her Majesty's Hon. Corps of Gentlemen-at-Arms, to be Lieutenant, vice Sir William Topham, Knt., who retires.

During the past week there have been many political meetings, at which the foreign policy of the Government has been the chief topic, in some of approval and in others of condemnation; but our readers will, no doubt, gladly be spared the slightest epitome of the speeches, preferring to wait a week for what will be said on the matter pro and con. in Parliament.

The result of the voting in Dublin of the Roman Catholic Prelates for three names to send to Rome as suggestions for Cardinal Cullen's successor has been as follows:—Dr. M'Cabe, at present acting as Archbishop, forty-three votes; for Dr. Moran, the Cardinal's nephew, seven votes; and for Dr. Woodcock, Principal of the Catholic University, one vote only.

NORWICH CATHEDRAL.

BY S. READ.

THE FLOODS AT NORWICH.

HEIGHAM-STREET ON THE NIGHT OF SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 17.

NORWICH ON NOVEMBER 17.

THE FLOODS AT NORWICH.

Our Illustrations show the extraordinary character of the disastrous inundation at Norwich on Saturday and Sunday week, the 16th and 17th inst. The river Wensum, swollen by the increase of its tributary streams from the continuous rains of a fortnight previous, was prevented from discharging its waters by the high tide at Yarmouth, as the Wensum flows into the Yare. The lower parts of the country were flooded over a great distance. On that Saturday afternoon the suburb of North Heigham, with the New Mills, St. Martin's, and St. Michael's, was visited by the inundation. The river, usually but a few yards wide, expanded to the breadth of nearly a mile. Heigham-street and Heigham-causeway, with most of the streets adjacent, were full of water, which entered the houses and cottages, covering their lower floors 4 ft. deep. It was with difficulty that carts could pass through the street to remove some of the distressed families or their furniture. Many of the people remained prisoners in the upper rooms of the houses; but some escaped in boats or by ladders into the carts and waggons. This low-lying district has of late years become thickly overbuilt and populous, so that no former calamity of the kind in Norwich ever caused so much distress. The citizens, led by the Mayor, Mr. Harry Bullard, and the Sheriff, Mr. D. Steward, promptly exerted themselves to relieve the suffering. A meeting for this good purpose was held at the Guildhall on the Sunday evening, which seems a novel and praiseworthy example, only that the clergy and other ministers of religion were necessarily absent. The Rev. George Gould, Baptist minister, took part in the meeting. Some gentlemen had been working hard all that day in rescuing the flooded-out people, preparing shelter for them in school-rooms, the Drill Hall, and the Governor's apartments of the City Gaol, which is now disused; and distributing coals, bread, tea, and coffee to those in want of such help. These first efforts, in which not an hour was lost, were followed by the raising of a charitable fund, with a regular committee for its application to cases of need.

ART.

THE DUDLEY GALLERY.

The danger arising from minor exhibitions such as this, furnished as they are with second-best works of the year and gleanings of the studios—works not sufficiently important to offer at Burlington House, and which have neither been commissioned by private persons nor carried off by dealers—the danger, we say, is that artists should be tempted to prefer painting small pictures, likely to sell at moderate prices, instead of occupying themselves with works demanding careful study, and therefore calculated to secure advancement in art. The danger is even greater where, as here, an exhibition is organised by a large committee of the contributors themselves, not by dealers, as at the galleries we lately noticed. In natural sympathy with the artists, the public is apt to entertain illusions regarding them and the often unjustly maligned middle-men. Assuming that artists mainly paint to sell, not simply to please themselves, they will assuredly take most pains for a possibly frequent customer. It is a significant fact that the Paris dealers have always had through their hands a very large proportion of the mass of good work produced in France. The great French school does not seem to have suffered thereby; and it certainly has not benefited much by the recently-established minor exhibitions, with their impressionniste vagaries and other eccentricities. However, we should, perhaps, be grateful to the Dudley committee for showing some projects for pictures and studies from nature which would hardly have come under the public eye by other agency. We have the pleasure to add that the present exhibition is an improvement upon its immediate predecessors, indicating, as it does the decided though gradual advance of the British school.

Among works which treat an incident, scene, or impression, with comparative completeness, is Mr. Haywood Hardy's humorous "Forced Company" (284). A young farmer mounted, with a pretty girl riding pillion behind him, is overtaken by the handsome young squire, in the tippeted riding-coat (redingote) of the Regency, who checks his hunter to keep abreast with the farmer's sober dobbin, and persists in a conversation with the damsel that is evidently well received by her, though her jealous companion steadily turns his head away from the unwelcome intruder. The difficult entire foreshortening of the horses as they advance directly before us is surmounted with rare skill of draughtsmanship; and the execution throughout is remarkably dainty, perspicuous, and descriptive. Similar completeness, in a warmer key of colour, distinguishes Mr. Hodgson's figure of the Algerian "Court Poet" (424), sitting with writhing limbs, and his hand to his aching head, in the throes of poetic composition after numerous abortive efforts to deliver himself of sufficiently high-flown imagery—as we see by the rejected sheets at his feet. Very droll, also, is the smartly got-up Algerian (435), whose turban another man is decorating with a flower by way of "A Finishing Touch." The phrase (which has been bandied about so much of late), "Peace with Honour," is taken by Mr. Marks as the motto for a pleasant little picture—a portrait, presumably—of an elderly gentleman in morning dressing-gown and slippers, seated in his library immersed in a favourite author. Here every detail—every book on the well-filled shelves, the good man's robe-de-chambre, the Guardian newspaper fallen at his side, the dozing cat, &c.—is painted with a perfectly impartial carefulness, which, while agreeable to examine seriatim, conveys an impression of somewhat monotonous prosaic tameness when regarding the picture as a whole. Mr. Joseph Clark evinces so genuine a sympathy with child-life that we can but regret his confirmed chalkiness of colouring and tendency to smoothen off every accident of texture and natural incidence of light and shade. Apart from these drawbacks, how thoroughly enjoyable is the picture (219) of the morning bath in a cottage, with the youngest still in the tub playing with its toy-boat, whilst a girl of fifteen, enacting the part of a second mother, wipes a little older cherub, and a boy of eight is manfully buttoning up his boots without aid! "The Chimney-Corner" (23) has a similar charm of naïveté.

Of the painters who take a more generous view of the technical requirements of art Mr. F. Morgan occupies a foremost position in virtue of his rich yet subdued and harmonious scheme of colouring. Both his two pictures, however, are rather slender and threadbare as regards sentiment and subject. The better one, perhaps, is "Under a Changeful Sky" (148), a gipsy mother, with her babe at her breast and a girl at her side, sitting despondingly on a heath under lowering clouds, while the damp sticks under the camp kettle slowly ignite. Mr. Macbeth adopts the stronger colouring and the more hazardous handling of the Scotch school, and the result, it seems to us, is a considerable want of balance and moderation in his picture of "Fisherman's Children" (111) amusing themselves on the verge of a jetty, with a vacant mass of water, forming a harbour, rising far above them, owing to the height at which the horizontal line is placed. This empty space of pale green sea or loch appears to have been painted at one time and the slate-coloured clouds at another, for there is not the slightest relation between them. Mr. Macbeth has done work of such high promise that it is worth while to call his attention to this and, indeed, other marks of hasty observation throughout the picture. A healthy enjoyment of colour, combined with an unaffected sense of beauty and manly execution (free from the rather rude mannerism of earlier works), will be found in Mr. Small's pleasant little picture of a country lass spreading linen out to be bleached (225). Mr. J. D. Linton is essaying to reproduce the excellent qualities of his water-colour drawings in oil, as in the study of a female figure in nondescript costume, with a tea-solitaire at her side, and a background of studio properties, which he calls "Afternoon" (238). But at present the shadows here are apt to be obscure and heavy, and still more so in the sombre "Memories" (315), a lady bowed in a passion of grief over the jewelled orders of her dead lord, with her face buried in her hands and hidden from view, like that of Agamemnon in the ancient picture by Timanthes of the Sacrifice of Iphigenia—an expedient for suggesting grief which modern critics have regarded less as a stroke of genius than an evasion and an artifice. Almost the opposite extreme of grey aereal effect—with delicately drawn figures—is presented in No. 333, by Mr. F. W. W. Topham, representing the arcade of the "Ospedale del Ceppo at Pistoia," with a local frate acting as cicerone to a couple of Italian ladies in elucidating the subjects of the famous frieze by Giovanni della Robbia, illustrative of the seven works of mercy: the frate himself thereby exemplifying, as it were, the first of those works—hospitality to the stranger. Another foreign scene with unmistakable local colour (301) is contributed by Mr. F. A. Bridgman, the rapidly rising American artist, who has been trained under Gérome, as his works testify—perhaps too plainly. It represents a Cairene lady, in yashmak and black veil, dismounted from her cream-coloured ass, in parley with a domestic at a house-door, the ass-driver's attention being bidden for by a couple of orange-girls. The costumes and trappings, the elaborately sculptured arabesque portal, and rich moucharabia, from which a lady inmate is stealing a glance at the visitor, are all carefully and well painted. Excellently painted, also, and fully as characteristic of the East, though it contains no figure, is the quaint picture (134) Mr. C. Robertson has constructed from several rows of shoes which have been put off by the faithful at the entrance-steps to a mosque. The motley shoes and slippers look half-animate sentinels and representatives of the congregation inside, as they lie there with an air of ordered and varied serviceableness, whilst a kitten, curling itself up in their midst, as though for company, has fallen asleep in the drowsy sunlight.

Of works of imaginative inspiration there is the usual dearth. Almost the only touch of poetic fancy, so far as we remember, occurs in the female figure of Mr. Watts's "Design for a Picture" (79), she being engaged arranging flowers on her bed, while Love flies out of window as Poverty comes in at the door. Yet we fail to see corresponding inventiveness in the winged figure of the frightened youth springing out of the large aperture that stands for a cottage window, or in the obvious interpretation of Poverty as a gaunt giant with a wolf at his side, or the undismayed turtle-doves still billing in the foreground. Then, this gives but a one-sided illustration of the scope of the proverb; indeed, in no aspect is its ugly satire adapted for romantic serious treatment such as the artist seems to contemplate. And we have too much respect for Mr. Watts's genius to admit execution so slovenly, and in parts so curiously petty and thin, as worthy of public exhibition even in the medium of a design." Mr. Wengelin recalls the style of the new President of the Academy in two gracefully-drawn and sweetly-coloured figures of Greek girls in long diaphanous white drapery, the one a "Keeper of the Sacred Sparrows" (365) on a trellised terrace; the other swinging in a kind of net-hammock under a peristyle overlooking a street with a glimpse of a passing chariot. We would ask, however, how it happens that the drapery in the former is so much more transparent on the nearer than the farther side of the figure. Mr. Boughton sends a charming idyllic gem. The materials are of the simplest—merely a couple of "Nut-Brown Maids" (289) discreetly hastening through a field from a spot where sit a pair of lovers—yet the scene is poetry itself as seen through that lovely golden medium of softest summer sunlight. A nice idyllic feeling likewise pervades two pictures by Mr. P. R. Morris, particularly that of a shepherd-boy hailing his flock to new pastures, under a grey sky chequered with white light. The other picture of children frightened by a "Storm in Harvest" (264) seems slight, and otherwise inferior. More or less of painting accomplishment or capability will also be found in Mr. F. Barnard's "Lord Hategood," from Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress;" Mr. J. D. Watson's rather large picture (169) at the head of the room of a young lady entering a prospective partner's name on her list of dancing engagements, which, however, is far from gay either in effect or sentiment; Mr. O. Scholderer's group of boy and donkey "In the Dunes of Flanders" (235); M. Tissot's "Reverie" (270), a girl reclining in a wicker fauteuil overlooking a conservatory, an effective study, but which seems to us a marked falling off from the works which first made the artist known in this country; Mr. T. E. Cox's "A Last Look" (194), a young lady kissing her hand at an oriel; Mr. D. W. Wynfield's "The New Spelling-Book" (187), which is pretty, but sadly needs some emphatic passages, some stroke of vigour; Mr. Percy Macquoid's sprightly little picture (439) of a damsel giving her hand to a bull-terrier to be licked, with, by way of title, the line from Madame de Staël—"Plus je vois ces hommes plus j'aime les chiens;" Mr. Calthrop's "At home" (199); Mr. J. W. Waterhouse's Pompeian "Flower-Seller" (341); Mr Edgar Stacey's cottage interior subjects, and the contributions of Messrs. H. M. Paget, G. Barclay, G. L. Seymour, A. W. Bayes, and M. Hale. There are, besides, excellent small bust studies or portraits by Messrs. Burgess (437) and C. Van Haanen—"A Venetian Girl" (105); Mrs. Jopling (307) and Miss Starr (86).

There are a few pictures of marked ability, in which the human interest is divided with landscape or marine. Of such are Mr. Waterlow's "On a Thames Ait" (97) with a young lady, under her Japanese parasol, walking through a breast-high bed of luxuriant grasses and flowering water plants; Mr. Colin Hunter's "In Search of Sea-drift" a boy on a pony looking out for "flotsam and jetsam" along the surf-fringed margin of a curved bay, where the blue waves now dance all peacefully; this is strong painting, true to nature, and fine in colour; Mr. C. Napier Hemy's two powerful, solid pictures, "The Shrimper" (161)—in which, however, the power is not obtained without blackness—and "Fishing for Smelt" (174), dredging net that he hoists to the boat's edge; and Mr. Hamilton Macallum's Scotch loch scene, with a girl landing "Meadow Hay" (35) from a boat. Mr. G. D. Leslie appears among the landscape-painters only with a view (226) at Henley-on-Thames, of the old-fashioned "Angel Hotel"—suggestive of the neighbourhood whence were derived several of the artist's backgrounds. The agreeable play of colour in Mr. Mark Fisher's "In Clover" (309) should be remarked. We were struck by the originality of Mr. J. Knight's "In Conway Vale" (270), with a broad band of cast shadow from a passing cloud. By "originality" we mean the evidence that the artist looks at nature for himself, though at the same time recalling something of the breadth, simplicity, and almost Quaker-like reserve of certain early masters. On the works of other able and well-known contributors we need not dwell; as, for instance, Mr. H. Moore's "Barley Harvest" (80), and "Yarmouth Jetty—Moonlight" (both good, though cobalt-blue being, as usual, a little too freely used); Mr. T. Danby's "Lake of Lucerne" (218), which, however, by lacking breadths of atmospheric gradation, looks no larger than a Welsh lake; Mr. Frank Walton's "Wandering Home" (73), Mr. C. E. Johnson's "In Charnwood Forest" (212), the sparkling bits by Mr. C. J. Lewis, Mr. R. Halswelle's "On the Thames at Sonning" (269), greatly preferable, we think, to the artist's more ambitious figure-subjects; and views in Morlaix and St. Malo, by M. Lhermitte, which would lose little reduced to simple black and white. Good and promising landscape-work is furthermore sent by Messrs. W. C. Estell, A. Parsons, Val Davis, C. Bassano, Walter Field, E. Fahey, J. Grace, J. Hetherington, A. Finlay, T. O. Hume, Pownal Williams, and Miss Gertrude Martineau.

The animal pieces are headed by a picture by Mr. R. Ansdell, painted with his customary careful equality throughout—"A Favoured Calf" (322); and there are capital dog or cat subjects by Messrs. Bottomley, Couldery, and Charlton. In still-life we have "A Corner in a Japanese Curio Shop" (206), by Mr. F. Dillon—which, with all its merit and conscientiousness, hardly gets at the secret or principles of Japanese colouring—a subject deserving the closest attention from our artists. Mr. Fantin, in his groups of hips, blackberries, sloes, and cider-apples, repeats certain methods of applying paint to obtain sparkling and illusive effects of colours, which begin apparently rather to fail of their potency. Lastly, among the works in terra-cotta is a clever group struggling over a kiss, by Signor Barella, which has only too much Italian "go," if we may be pardoned the expression.

"WHISTLER VERSUS RUSKIN."

In this case, which was tried at the Exchequer Court on Monday and Tuesday last, the allegation of libel, with a claim of one thousand pounds as damages made by the plaintiff, Mr. Whistler, arose from a criticism by Mr. Ruskin, in "Fors Clavigera," on certain peculiar paintings by Mr. Whistler, which that artist himself described as "nocturnes," "symphonies," "harmonies," or "arrangements," on the assumption that their effects are analogous to those of music. They do, indeed, render, as it were, a vague rhythmical echo of nature in a few hasty, more or less harmonious tones. They were noticed by us when exhibited at the Grosvenor Gallery last year, but we gave a fuller review of three of their number when they were originally exhibited at the Dudley Gallery. Mr. Ruskin's criticism ran thus:—"For Mr. Whistler's own sake, no less than for the protection of the purchaser, Sir Coutts-Lindsay ought not to have admitted works into the gallery in which the ill-educated conceit of the artist so nearly approached the aspect of wilful imposture. I have seen and heard much of cockney impudence before now, but never expected to hear a coxcomb ask two hundred guineas for flinging a pot of paint in the public's face." Mr. Ruskin was excused from appearing in court on account of illness; but the plaintiff was examined, and artists and art-critics were called as witnesses for both sides, with the usual conflict of evidence. After retiring for upwards of an hour, the jury appeared in court and declared they deemed Mr. Ruskin's criticism "honest." But upon the Judge, Baron Huddleston, pointing out that they had to consider whether the criticism was fair as well as bonâ fide, they again retired, and ultimately a verdict for the plaintiff was given, damages one farthing, the Judge further deciding that the verdict should not carry costs.

The "contemptuous damages" of the verdict (as the Judge defined such damages to be in his summing up) pretty plainly show that it was scarcely worth Mr. Whistler's while to bring his action; and had he not been "thin-skinned" (using another of the Judge's expressions) he would hardly have done so. On the other hand, the verdict would seem to establish that the personal remarks of Mr. Ruskin did exceed the technical limits of fair criticism. It would, however, none the less be the gravest misfortune for art, as for literature or public morals, if the utmost possible freedom were not allowed to criticism. We may regret Mr. Ruskin's inveterate habit of exaggeration, and his partial views; few, probably, have differed from him in opinion more frequently than ourselves; but of his bonâ-fides there cannot be a shadow of doubt. Nor can it be forgotten that he has done an infinite service to British art by his eloquence, his outspoken sincerity, his learning, diligence, and generosity, his sensibility to all that is beautiful in nature and art, and his fervent zeal and enthusiasm for everything that is true and noble in aim or accomplishment. He has done far more for British art than any artist living, and both artists and public are under the deepest obligations to him.

And let it be granted with all cordiality that Mr. Whistler evinces, especially in advanced work which affords a fairer test, such as portraits, an uncommonly delicate perception of chromatic harmonies (though still within very narrow limits of flatness and negative effect); yet, what are the performances to which Mr. Ruskin more particularly alluded? And is it possible to criticise an artist's work without, by implication, criticising the artist himself—his work being the very essence of his personality? Those productions are surely the merest artistic notes or memoranda of a few colour relations, such as every artist should, and many artists do often, "knock off," as Mr. Whistler said, "in a couple of days or a day and a half," by way of tentative experiment, and to serve modestly after reference. They can scarcely be called sketches, they are too arbitrary for that. But what if an artist, smitten by some accidental suggestive charm—frequently caught in such rapid notes—should fancy them worthy to rank beside pictures that have taken months of toil to produce, and should price them accordingly? Would it not be excusable for an earnest critic and an enemy to everything having the semblance of a sham, to think that the artist was imposing on himself first, and (unconsciously, of course) approaching the aspect of one seeking to impose on others? Might it not even be legitimately inferred that, in his conceit or illusion, he had not "educated" himself in art sufficiently to appreciate what constitutes a picture? Whether, if the artist resided in London, by way of exposing a form of assurance supposed to be peculiar to the metropolis, it would be desirable to charge him with cockney impudence, is a further question for the critic's judgment, conscience, and taste. But the critic should be at least sure of his facts; and as regards the last proposition, Mr. Whistler's "nocturnes," "symphonies," and "arrangements" have no affinity with the characteristics of any "cockney" artists; but merely carry to the extreme the principles of the French impressionistes; whilst the artist himself is of American parentage, but was born in Russia.

The private views of the Winter Exhibitions of the Society of Painters in Water Colours and the Society of British Artists take place to-day. The respective galleries open to the public on Monday.

Mr. Seymour Haden, the distinguished amateur etcher, has lent a number of his works, together with a selection from his collection of etchings by the old masters, to the Fine-Art Society, New Bond-street. Mr. Haden has also written a pamphlet "About Etching," especially in reference to the exhibited works; but as it is announced that neither the collection nor the pamphlet is in its final and complete form and arrangement we defer a notice.

The Prince of Wales has presented to the Sèvres Museum the tomb in faïence which figured in the Indian Exhibition at the Champ de Mars.

Mr. Leighton, the President Elect of the Royal Academy, received the gold medal and chain of the office from the Queen on Monday last, after which her Majesty conferred the honour of knighthood upon him.

Mr. Herkomer and Mr. Holman Hunt have been very ill, but we are glad to hear that there is an improvement in the condition of both artists.

It is reported that there is a scheme on foot for decorating the Townhall, Manchester, with paintings by Messrs. F. Madox Brown and F. Shields. So far as we are aware, neither of these artists has had experience in mural decoration on a large scale.

Messrs. Graves and Son have published a mezzotint by Mr. Josey, after a portrait of Mr. Carlyle by Mr. Whistler. This is the first mezzotint after one of Mr. Whistler's pictures.

Sir Coutts Lindsay has received her Majesty's permission to publish a complete series of reproductions by the autotype process from the drawings by the old masters in the Royal library at Windsor. They will be arranged in four portfolios, of which the first two will contain one hundred drawings by Leonardo da Vinci. The third portfolio will contain the drawings of Raphael and Michael Angelo; and the fourth will be devoted to early Italian masters, to Dürer, Claude, &c.

The secretary of the Somersetshire Archæological Society announces that excavations have been made at Wedmore, long supposed to have been the site of one of the palaces of our early English kings, and that extensive remains of ancient walls have been found there which lead to the belief that they belong to the palace of Arthur and our West Saxon kings.

The following British artists have been awarded the decoration of the Legion of Honour at the close of the Paris Exhibition: Officers: Sir Frederick Leighton, Millais, Alma Tadema. Knights: Sir John Gilbert, P. Calderon, G. F. Watts, W. P. Frith, J. Collier, Carl Haag.

A splendid series of chromo-lithographic copies have been produced from Professor Caspar Scheuren's series of paintings illustrating the landscape, myths, history, and monuments of the Rhine Provinces, which paintings have lately been presented by the Empress of Germany to the New Museum at Cologne. About 350 sets of the photographs are to be offered to the English public through the agency of the New Book Court at the Crystal Palace.

It appears that nearly the whole of the Exhibition Palace on the Champ de Mars is to be preserved, and devoted partly to the purposes of a national museum and partly to the storing of war material. Only the Pavilion of the City of Paris will be demolished, and the site of it converted into a magnificent garden. The fine-art galleries will be used as a museum of decorative art.

A monument is to be erected in the town of Châlons-sur-Saône to Joseph Nicephore Nièpce, the inventor of photography.

A statue of Berryer, by M. Chapu, has been placed in the Salle des Pas Perdus, Palais de Justice, Paris. At the pedestal are seated female figures representing Eloquence and Fidelity.

A statue of the late Maharajah Ramanath Tajore, who was for ten years President of the British India Association, is to be erected in Calcutta. Mr. Geflowski has been intrusted with the execution of the work.

The inventor of the new wall decoration called "Muralis," which we noticed last week, is Mr. Walton.

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The second appearance of Mdlle. Ambre took place on Thursday week, in the same character as that in which she recently made her début here—Violetta in "La Traviata." The reception of the singer was again of the most favourable kind, and the impression already made gave much interest to the promise of her performance as Margherita, in "Faust," announced for Thursday, of which we must speak next week.

On Monday "Lucia di Lammermoor" was given, with the clever performance of Mdlle. Alwina Valleria as the heroine. "Carmen" is still continuing its successful career, having been again announced for Tuesday and yesterday (Friday) evening, and being promised for the last morning performance of the season on Wednesday next.

Weber's "Oberon"—which has not been heard in London for many years—is to be produced, with new scenery, dresses, and decorations, on Dec. 7.

THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The opening of the forty-seventh season took place yesterday (Friday) week, with an interesting, although familiar, programme. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" ("Lobgesang") and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" have before been given in association by the society, and each repetition attracts large audiences, as was the case on the occasion now referred to.

The contrast between the elevated dignity of Mendelssohn's music and the rich and florid melody of that of Rossini renders the associated performance of the masterpieces just named especially interesting. The vocal solos in the "Lobgesang" were well rendered by Miss A. Williams, Mrs. Suter, and Mr. Lloyd. In the duet (with chorus) "I waited for the Lord," Mrs. Suter was an efficient second to Miss Williams, and the piece was one of the effective features in the solo music; others having been Miss Williams's rendering of her share in the duet, "My song shall be alway," in which Mr. Lloyd sang finely, as he did in the remarkable declamatory solo passage, "Watchman, will the night soon pass?" The sublime chorus, "The night is departing," and the chorale, "Let all men praise the Lord," were among the general grand choral effects of the evening.

The vocal solos in the "Stabat Mater" were very effectively sung by Miss Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson. The duet "Quis est homo"—finely given by the two ladies—was enthusiastically applauded, and had to be repeated; other specialties having been the delivery of the cavatina "Fac ut portem," by Madame Patey; of the air "Cujus animam," by Mr. Lloyd; the "Inflammatus," by Miss Williams; and "Pro peccatis," by Mr. Bridson.

The orchestra gave great effect to the symphonic movements of Mendelssohn's cantata, and the elaborate accompaniments to that and the "Stabat," and the chorus singing—occasionally somewhat too predominant—was, generally, very satisfactory.

Sir Michael Costa reappeared as conductor, and was warmly greeted. The performances were preceded by the National Anthem.

Two more concerts will be given before Christmas—on Dec. 13 Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" will be the oratorio (as produced in that shape by the society in May last with great success), and on Dec. 20 "The Messiah" will be performed. Seven concerts are announced in completion of the series, ranging from Jan. 17 to April 25, and comprising well-known and favourite sacred works.

MADAME JENNY VIARD-LOUIS'S CONCERTS.

The new series (the second) of these excellent concerts began on Tuesday evening, again under the able conductorship of Mr. Weist Hill. The band, as before, is of exceptional excellence; and the orchestral playing on Tuesday was of the same high order as at the previous concerts.

Tuesday's programme opened with the overture to "Oberon," which was rendered with admirable spirit and refinement. This was followed by the characteristic "Danse des Sylphs," from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust," which was played with great delicacy, and had to be repeated. After this Madame Viard-Louis played, with much executive skill, a fantasia for pianoforte solo by Cherubini, one of the many works left in manuscript by the great master at his death, and still remaining unpublished. It is a long and elaborate piece, consisting of several divisions, in each of which the genius and power of the composer are strongly manifested. The interest and value of the fantasia are so great that it is to be hoped it may soon find publication. Its performance was followed by the bravura air, "Che pur aspro," from Mozart's opera, "Belmont e Constanza" which was brilliantly sung by Miss Thursby, who was greatly applauded.

The central piece of the selection was Brahms's new symphony, in D major, which was first given in England at the opening Crystal Palace concert of the present series, in October last, when we spoke of the merits of the work. Again on Tuesday it received a very fine interpretation, and pleased greatly, especially the "Allegretto," which had to be repeated. Miss Thursby then sang the romance, "In my pleasant land of France," from Mr. H. Leslie's cantata "Holyrood," which was followed by Hummel's last pianoforte concerto (in F), a posthumous work, which was played with much power by Madame Viard-Louis. A charming "Gavotte," for orchestra, by M. Bourgault-Ducoudray, pleased greatly, and received a unanimous encore; and the concert terminated with a very characteristic orchestral fantasia on Spanish airs, composed by M. Gevaert, the principal of the Brussels Conservatoire.

The two last pieces were given for the first time in London, not so, we believe (as stated in the concert-book), with the aria of Mozart and the concerto. Mr. Hill conducted, with the same special ability as before. The next concert is to take place on Dec. 17.

Last Saturday's Crystal Palace concert brought forward a symphony by Haydn (in C minor), which, it is said, had never before been given in England. Although apparently a work of the master's earlier period, it is full of genial grace and melodic beauty, and was heard with much interest. The same cannot be said of a new pianoforte concerto by Rheinberger, which, skilfully as it is written, both for the solo instrument and the orchestral accompaniments, is dry and laboured throughout. The excessive and incessant difficulties of the pianoforte part were admirably rendered by Mr. Charles Hallé, whose performance was a masterly display of sustained executive power. Two characteristic movements from the divertissement of M. Massenet's "Les Erinnyes," the overture to "La Gazza Ladra," detached pianoforte solo pieces by Bach (played by Mr. Hallé), and familiar vocal solos by Mdlle. Keller and Mr. Lloyd completed the programme.

The second of Dr. Von Bülow's pianoforte recitals took place on Wednesday, when his programme consisted of Schumann's fantasia in C, Beethoven's sonata "Les Adieux, l'Absence, et le Retour;" and pieces by Rheinberger, Tschaikowsky, Chopin, and Liszt.

The fourth of the present series of London Ballad Concerts took place at St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening, when the vocalists announced were Mesdames Sherrington and Antoinette Sterling, Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Maybrick; the programme also including pianoforte solos by Madame Arabella Goddard and part-singing by the gentlemen of the London Vocal Union.

The second of the Saturday Evening Concerts took place last week, when a popular and familiar selection of vocal music was contributed by Mrs. Osgood, Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington and Patey, Misses M. Williams and de Fonblanque, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. V. Rigby, Mr. W. Clifford, and Signor Brocolini. Madame Arabella Goddard contributed some brilliant pianoforte-playing, and Mr. Howard Reynolds two effective solos on the cornet.

The second concert of the new season of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society took place on Thursday evening, when Haydn's "Creation" was given.

St. Andrew's Day (Nov. 30) is to be musically celebrated by concerts of Scotch music at St. James's Hall, Exeter Hall, and the Royal Albert Hall.

Mr. S. Hayes has announced a week's performances of English opera at Covent-Garden Theatre, beginning on Saturday next. Mr. Sims Reeves is to make his first appearance there as Tom Tug in "The Waterman," Captain Macheath in "The Beggar's Opera," and Henry Bertram in "Guy Mannering."

Organ Recitals are still being given weekly at the Angell Town Institution, Brixton; the organist on Saturday last having been Mr. C. J. Frost. For this week Mr. Fountain Meen is announced; for Saturday next, Mr. Edward Barnes; for Dec. 14, Mr. J. Broadhouse; and for the following Saturday, Mr. William Lemare.

The solo pianist at this week's Monday Popular Concert was Madame Montigny Rémaury, who played with much effect Beethoven's "Moonlight" sonata, besides having been associated with Madame Norman-Néruda and Signor Piatti in M. Saint-Saëns's trio in F. Schubert's quintet in C was the other instrumental piece of the evening, the executants having been Madame Néruda and MM. Ries, Zerbini, Pezze, and Piatti. Mdlle. Redeker gave, with much expression, some lieder by Schubert and Franz, accompanied by Sir Julius Benedict.

A performance is announced to take place at St. James's Hall on Wednesday morning next for the benefit of the widow and children of Mr. E. Ellis, whose recent death has left them destitute. Mr. Ellis was for many years associated with the orchestra of the Adelphi Theatre; for the greater part of the time as conductor.

Saturday performances of operas in English at the Alexandra Palace, and opera recitals at the Royal Aquarium, are still going on. For this week "Lurline" is announced at the former, and "Lucia di Lammermoor" at the latter place.

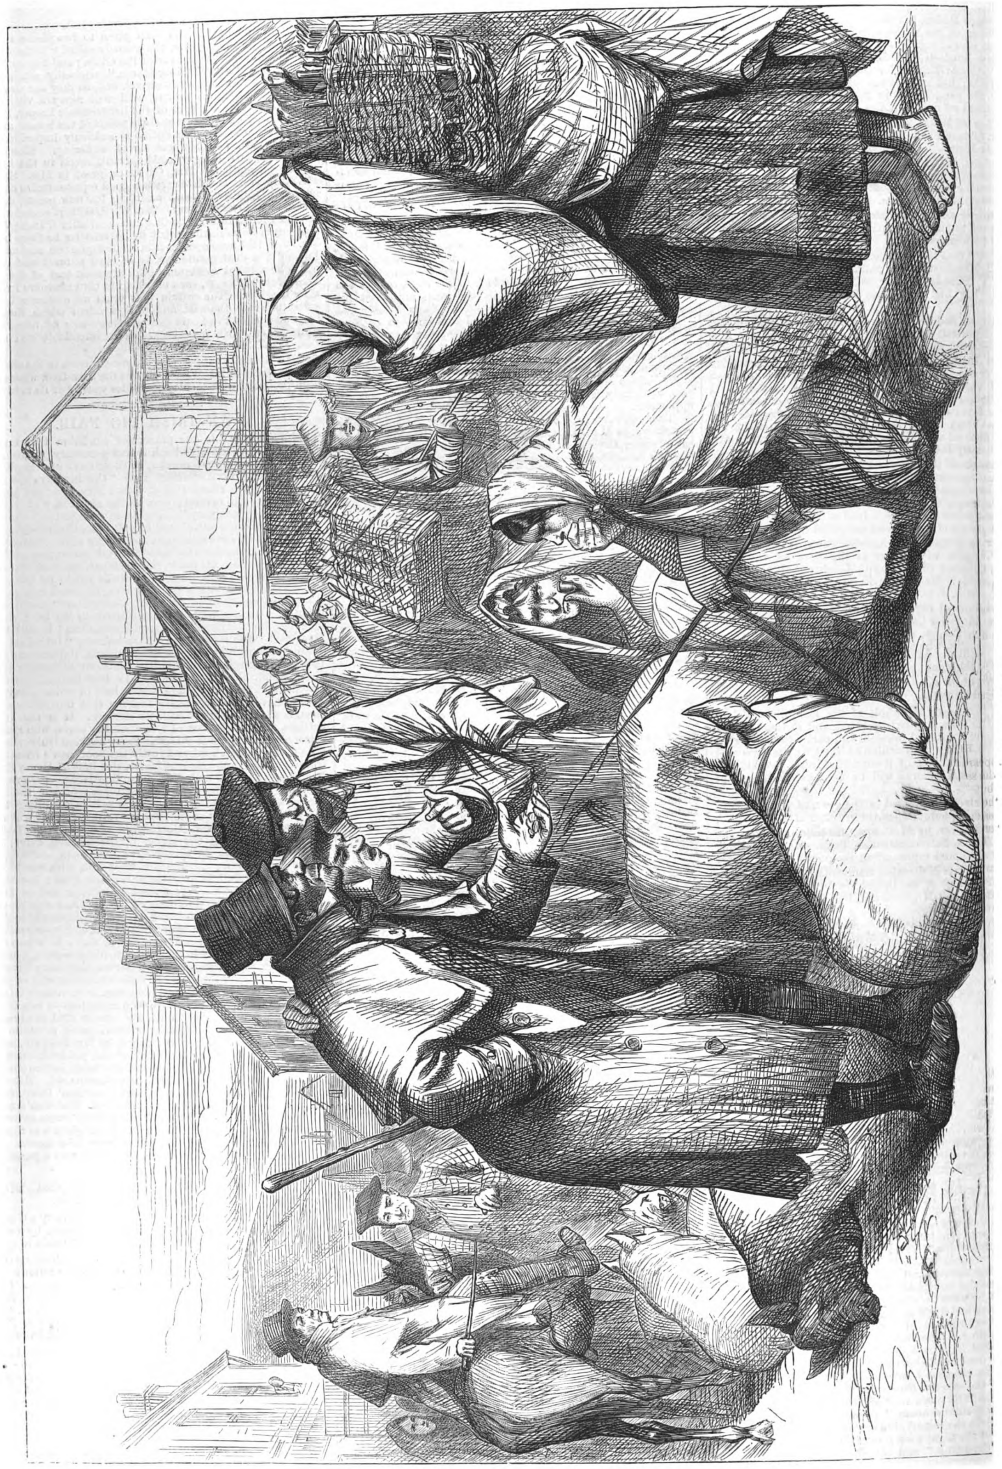
THEATRES.

At the Folly new life has been given to two pieces recently produced elsewhere. One, the comedy called "Retiring," by Mr. Williamson, that hails from the Globe; and the other, Mr. W. S. Gilbert's "Wedding March," originally acted at the Court. Both dramas merit revival, and, as they are now acted at this elegant little theatre, will well repay a visit. Mr. Lionel Brough in the part of the livery-stable keeper, Samuel Snaffles, realises the characteristic points of the honest middle-class hero, whose respectability is suddenly imperilled, and rises to pathos in his undeserved suffering. Miss Lydia Thompson, as a hungry maid-servant, revels in the humour of the conception. Mrs. Carter is great in Mrs. Snaffles, Mr. J. Danvers as a detective is a good representative of a rôle abundantly illustrated and affording few new points, and the general cast is satisfactory. Mr. W. S. Gilbert's rendering of the old French farce, "Le Chapeau de Paille d'Italie," loses nothing of its rollicking spirit by its transfer to these boards. Mr. W. J. Hill accompanies it in its new quarters, and as Uncle Bopaddy, a deaf gentleman, is at once natural and comic; nor is he without assistance in the excellent cast of the other numerous characters, each of whom in turn provokes irrepressible laughter. The curtain falls upon an audience literally exhausted with the wild and pitiless mirth which they have been compelled to sustain through three acts of unmitigated fun. The scenic accessories are all commendable and aid in the general effect.

Miss Heath has appeared with great success in the character of Jane Shore in Mr. Wills's play at the Standard, where it has been produced with scenic accessories worthy of its merits.

AN IRISH PIG FAIR.

"Plaze the pigs" is the proverbial condition that an Irish peasant would formerly attach to any pecuniary promise. For it was an established maxim, in those days of "haphazard, not scientific" rural economy, that "the pig pays the rint." Money, with our friend Paddy, meant little else than pigs and their price in the market; even as the etymology of our dignified word "pecuniary" is but an allusion to the Latin name of cattle. We understand, and hope it is so, that the Irish small farmer has now some other commodities for sale. Butter he can well produce, thanks to the sweetest fresh grass upon earth, and to improved skill of dairy management, in vast quantities and of beautiful fresh quality. Corn is not to be thought of in Ireland, and perhaps not much in England, as a vendible commodity against the increasing foreign and colonial competition. Oats, indeed, are very suitable to the Irish climate. The pig, the "darlint," and good luck to him! is still to the fore. We look into a handy little volume, "Introduction to Irish Farming," by Mr. Thomas Baldwin, Superintendent of the Agricultural Department of National Education in our sister island. He informs us that in 1870 Ireland rejoiced in the possession of a million and a half of swine—may their shadow never grow less! He reckons that the yearly sale of them is worth five or six millions sterling. It is the humble cottiers, and cultivators of less than fifty acres, who rear two thirds of these favourite animals. Piggy has been truly called the poor man's savings bank and justly the poor man's friend. He is the greatest domestic benefactor, the best of Home Rulers. Yet the Berkshire and Yorkshire breeds are preferred in Ireland. Buy a store pig for £1, and keep him in the sty or yard, with more or less space for exercise according to his destination for bacon or for pork, as running about will make his flesh rather streaky. Cherish him as one of your children; fatten him with all the refuse of the kitchen, dairy, barn garden, and field; in winter give him roots, cabbages, o damaged potatoes; in summer treat him with vetches an clover. It is well to cook some of the food; boiling or steaming the potatoes. The most nutritious diet is Indian corn, with bran; but that costs money. Three regular meals a day are what he expects; and who has a better right to them? for who works harder in his vocation, that of "laying on fat?" Let him put it on in peace from day to day; he is not to be bothered. He should have plenty of clean water; a careful master or mistress will give him a fair washing every Saturday, or at least a good rubbing down with a brush or wisp of straw. The pig is by nature a decent, nice, neat, and orderly creature in his personal habits. It is we who force him to live untidy He does not like any dirt in his sty; be so kind as to remov it daily, and let his trough be without speck or stain. Al these precepts, and more, are urged by Mr. Baldwin, with a high degree of authority, on behalf of the pet Irish beast. It grunts responsive gratitude and fattens visibly before our eyes. Now let us suppose the porker nine months old. Behold in his rounded sides, as it were, a living Savings' Bank, with a sum of £3 to £5 safe to the provident Irishman's timely account! "This little pig went to market," with several of his companions. "An Irishman in all his glory was there;" many of the same class, and some brave Irishwomen. Our Artist has made a sketch of them, chaffering over a purchase.



We hear from Dublin that Mr. Holmes, Q.C., Castle adviser, has been appointed Solicitor-General for Ireland.

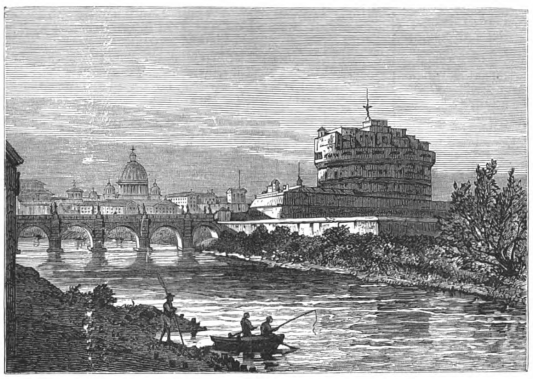
The new Townhall and Free Library scheme at Reading is in abeyance, on account of its being estimated that the cost will be upwards of £60,000, whereas it was not originally intended to expend more than between £30,000 and £40,000. It is now proposed to carry out the scheme so far as an expenditure of £40,000 is concerned, leaving the extras to be provided for at a future time. The subscriptions have already reached £25,000.



The second annual exhibition of fat cattle, &c., was held at Norwich on the 21st inst., in a large building erected for the purpose. The entries were large. The prizes were of the value of about £700, and amongst the exhibitors were the Prince of Wales, Mr. J. J. Colman, M.P., and Mr. C. S. Read, M.P. The champion prize of £100, which includes the Prince of Wales's special prize for the best beast in the yard, was won by Mr. Thomas Bond, of Lincolnshire, with a shorthorn steer; the Prince of Wales took a second prize for a Devon steer; and several others were carried off by Mr. J. J. Colman, M.P.

MINISTERIAL VISIT TO CYPRUS.

The visit of the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Secretary of State for War to Cyprus is the subject of one of our Illustrations. Her Majesty's troop-ship Himalaya, with Mr. W. H. Smith, Colonel Stanley, and a numerous party on board, arrived at Larnaca on the 1st inst. They were received by General Sir Garnet Wolseley, the High Commissioner, who had come down to await their arrival at Larnaca. On the next day they proceeded in a body to Nicosia, and remained the guests of his Excellency and the Head-quarter Staff at the Monastery Camp, which was the subject of a sketch we published a few weeks ago. The same afternoon they paid a visit to the town, and saw the principal buildings, the fine old Venetian Cathedral, now converted into the Moslem Mosque of St. Sophia; the Buykhan, or court-house and police station; and the Konak, which is the building used at present for the head-quarters of the military police force. Then, finally, after partaking of the hospitality of the Commissioner and his colleagues, they went in procession round the ramparts, and so back to the camp. An escort of Mounted Zaptiehs, under the local commandant of police, was drawn up outside the Baffo Gate to receive Sir Garnet Wolseley and his guests on their arrival, and followed the party, who were mounted, through the winding bazaars and narrow streets of the town.

The subject of our sketch is the departure of the distinguished guests from Nicosia. Having bidden farewell at the High Commissioner's house, where they went to lunch, they were escorted by him and the chief commandant of military police as far as the Larnaca gate, where they were met by an escort of mounted zaptiehs, under the Lieutenant commanding, drawn up outside the gate according to instructions, and who accompanied the coach or omnibus some way out of the town. This "bus" is used for the daily mail, and was drawn by two horses and two mules. The view of Nicosia from the Larnaca road is most picturesque, comprising the venerable Mosque of St. Sophia, and the numerous minarets of smaller mosques, intermixed with date-palms, and other species of vegetation, inclosed by a fortification of the bastion system; but which, according to modern warfare, would be perfectly useless. The whole is backed by the sharp outlines of the Kyrenia range of hills to the north-west; and to the south of the town is seen the Olympian Range. The Head-Quarters Camp is situated to the west of the town, and is not seen in this View. The Mosque at the southern extremity of the town was erected in memory of the first Turk who scaled the ramparts in the assault and capture of the town from the Venetians. There are numerous graves scattered about, telling the tale where such and such a Moslem fell, especially in the taking of the Konak, and over each is placed a lantern, in respect to his memory. Our Illustration is from a sketch by Lieutenant A. Gilmore, 61st Regiment, Local Commandant of the Military Police for the Nikosia District.

THE INUNDATION IN ROME.

A correspondent in Rome sends us the sketches we have engraved, and writes as follows:—"Nothwithstanding the many million francs wasted on Tiber improvement schemes, the famous old river, as in the days of Horace, still proves a great source of mischief to Rome. It has again burst its bounds, carried away the wall meant to hold it in, at the gardens of the Farnesina Palace, and flooded the streets of Rome once more, regardless of engineers and special commissioners. A furious night of thunder, hail, and rain, on Wednesday, the 13th inst., followed by a warm wind, which melted the snow on the mountains, caused the river to rise so rapidly that by noon on Thursday the water had come out at the quay of the Ripetta and in the low parts of the town. The Pantheon is always one of the places flooded; and very picturesque it looks, with its noble portico rising out of the water. Though a long way from the river, it is on very low ground; the water, rising in the sewers, soon fills not only the excavated part round it but the building itself, and the light inside, striking on the water through the circular opening at the top of the dome, has a very curious effect when the water allows one to enter. Upon this occasion there was about six feet of water in the church, and the flood threatened to be as bad as the great one of 1870. By the middle of the day the Corso was inundated at various points, and carts were employed to ferry people across the water; pools of water appeared at every depression in the neighbourstreets, and the rising ground, unseen at other times, became very prominent. The Ghetto—especially Via Fiumara, a very low-lying street—is always liable to be flooded; and the Municipality has to provide means for taking away the people to some place of safety. At the same time, their means of earning a livelihood being stopped for a time, it is necessary to supply them with bread. One precaution that is taken now, since the flood of 1870 found everyone unprovided, is to order the bakers to make an extra quantity of bread, for everybody wants to lay in a store. The first sounds you hear in the morning in the flooded quarters are yells for "Pane, pane!" "Bread, bread!" until the boats sent by the Municipality come round to the houses and deliver the loaves. Of course people are expected to pay for it, as usual, except the very poor; and when their hunger is appeased, the whole affair is a most amusing spectacle for those who live high enough up not to suffer damage from the water. The windows are crowded with people, who derive much amusement from the adventures of those who start in boats or on men's backs to gain dry land. If anyone comes to grief, or drops the provisions he has been to purchase, there are yells of delight from all sides. Some rig up strings across the street, and send over wine or fruit to less favoured neighbours; everybody becomes friends with everybody else; and people who have never spoken to each other get quite intimate during the time the flood lasts. As evening draws on there are shouts for lights; and, if the gas will not burn, people put out candles and lamps, and make quite an illumination. Someone draws a piano near a window and plays waltzes for people to dance to, as there is no traffic to drown the sound. Ringing rounds of applause and hand-clapping; and altogether the Cardinal who, when he was asked what was the merriest time in Rome after Carnival, replied, "When the Pope died," might have added that the next merriest was during a flood. Of course, under it all there is a good deal of misery—people drowned out of ground floors, property damaged by the wet, colds caught in cleaning out shops as soon as the water begins to run down; and in many trades the stock in trade and materials are ruined. Still many of those who are prevented exercising their usual trade, during the flood, find occasion to pick up a very good day's wages at odd jobs during and immediately after an inundation; and when the water rises as slowly as it did this time, after the first rush, it is the shopkeepers' own fault if they have not moved their goods to a place of safety. The whole country round Rome is now one great lake; as far as one can see to the north there is water, and the low ground towards the mouth of the river is quite submerged. Seen from a height the view remarkable, for the Campagna appears one great lake, reaching to the mountains; and, unfortunately for us in Rome, all the water to the north has to pass through Rome to find an outlet. The Via Ripetta, of which I send a sketch, has, during a flood, all the appearance of a street in Venice. From the window in which I sit the street appears all under water, except a small patch of ground at the end of one of the cross-streets. Half way towards the Piazza del Popolo is the so-called Ferro di Cavallo, the Horseshoe Piazza, where the lottery is drawn every Saturday; but as this piazza was some feet deep in water, the drawing had to be put off, and no doubt the flood, like every other startling event, will make a great many more people than usual play for the next drawing, so the Government will lose nothing by the delay. The Ripetta street is one of those three main thoroughfares which converge in the Piazza del Popolo, and, except at a time like this, has nothing special about it."

THE VOLUNTEERS.

The annual returns of the Queen's (Westminster), forwarded to the War Office, show that in the official year which terminated on the 31st ult., the battalion received a large accession to its strength, the enrolled numbering 948, as against 885 in the previous year, and the efficients correspondingly increased to 888 as against 816, or a percentage of 23·67 as against 92·20. In the same period the large number of 217 recruits was taken on the strength of the regiment. The 39th Middlesex (Finsbury) returns 989 efficients out of a total enrolled of 990, the proficient officers and sergeants numbering 74; the 36th Middlesex has 972 efficients out of 974 enrolled, 91 officers and sergeants holding certificates of proficiency; and the 37th Middlesex (Bloomsbury) Rifle Regiment 966 out of 1000. The 3rd London has also increased its enrolled strength and efficients, the former being returned at 967 and the latter at 934. The North Middlesex returns shows a strength of 746, every officer and man being efficient. Among other returns of metropolitan regiments which have been issued are the following:—26th Middlesex (Customs and Docks)—enrolled, 787; efficient, 770; proficient, 78. 49th Middlesex (Post Office)—enrolled, 757; efficient, 754; proficient, 75. 2nd Middlesex Artillery—enrolled, 640; efficient, 607; proficient, 57. 1st London Engineers—enrolled, 475; efficient, 444; proficient, 25. 50th Middlesex (Bank of England)—enrolled, 86; efficient, 85; proficient 6. Tower Hamlets Brigade—enrolled, 820; efficient, 746; capitation grant earned, £1389. The Robin Hood return, as usual their ten companies of 100 efficient men each, the capitation grant, with the addition of £165 for proficiency, amounting to £1665. The 1st Aberdeen have only 1 non-efficient, the efficients being returned at 824, and 76 officers and sergeants receiving certificates of proficiency. The 1st Lanarkshire (Glasgow) has increased its strength from 1134 to 1253, the efficients now numbering no less than 1235, and the proficients 115, the amount of capitation grant earned from the Government being £2140. The 1st Berks (Reading) has 1106 efficients out of 1115 enrolled, and 83 proficient officers and sergeants; and the 15th Lancashire (Liverpool) 841 efficients out of 860 enrolled.

Last Saturday afternoon at the Crystal Palace the regimental and other prizes in connection with the brigade competition for this year of the London Brigade were distributed by the Lady Mayoress, in the presence of the Lord Mayor, the Sheriffs, and Under-Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, who attended in state. The best company of the brigade of 1878 was Captain Miller's (the N company).

At a luncheon at the Crown Hotel, Blandford, on the 21st inst., Lieutenant-General W. Parke, C.B., presented, in the name of 227 subscribers, to each of the four successful competitors for the Loyd-Lindsay prize a richly-chased silver-and-gold cup, value fifty guineas, and also an illuminated address, with the subscribers' names, handsomely bound, in token of admiration of their perseverance and success, whereby they upheld the honour of their regiment and county at Wimbledon, and also in Devon and at Dorchester. The competitors were enthusiastically cheered as they came forward to receive the cups. A present of £10 was made to Sergeant Slaughter, the drill instructor of the Blandford troop.

The operatives engaged in a branch of the cotton trade at Oldham, having refused to accept a reduction of 5 per cent in their wages, began a strike on Monday. This has caused 120 mills to stand idle, and the number of operatives concerned is between 10,000 and 12,000.

There was a largely-attended meeting of merchants, manufacturers, clergy, and others at Sheffield on Monday, under the presidency of the Mayor, for the purpose of raising a local relief fund. It was stated that the distress was greater than had ever before been known in that town, and that there were thousands of working men and their families who were absolutely without bread. A subscription list was opened, and a sum of £2000 was obtained in the room. The Archbishop of York sent £20, the Deputy-Mayor gave £250, and several subscriptions of £200 and £100 each were announced. Relief is to be given immediately by means of district committees.

At a meeting of representatives of the Scotch banks in Edinburgh yesterday week, it was decided for the present to take no action in the way of recommending their shareholders to contribute from the bank rests towards the City of Glasgow Bank Relief Fund. It was found that various difficulties stood in the way, and especially that there was a want of unanimity among the shareholders.—At a meeting held at Birmingham on Monday, under the presidency of Mr. J. S. Wright, resolutions were passed expressing sympathy with the shareholders in the City of Glasgow Bank, and a local fund was opened to assist the worst sufferers from the disaster. Subscriptions amounting to nearly £500 were announced.—Although the Glasgow Corporation have already provided work for seven hundred of the men out of employment in the city, there still remain over a thousand on the list of those requiring relief.

At the annual meeting of the Cheshire Chamber of Agriculture held at Crewe on the 21st inst. the new Weights and Measures Act was discussed, and a resolution was proposed recommending the Board of Trade to adopt a standard cental of 100 lb. weight for the sale of grain and flour, and the standard of the present hundredweight for hay, straw, roots, cheese, and other produce. An amendment was proposed recommending the adoption of a uniform standard of 100 lb. for all produce. On a division, the resolution was carried by the casting vote of the chairman.—A meeting of the Essex Chamber of Agriculture was held at Chelmsford on the 22nd—Sir T. Fowell Buxton presiding. A discussion took place on the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, the general feeling of the chamber being in favour of selling by weight only, and adopting as the standard the cental, or 100 imperial pounds.—We understand that Viscount Sandon, President of the Board of Trade, has consented to receive a deputation on Monday, Dec 9, from the National Association of British and Irish Millers, the Central Chamber of Agriculture, and other public bodies interested in the working of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, for the purpose of expressing their views in favour of a new denomination of weight, to consist of 100 lb.

William Sackville Gordon, Esq., son of the late Lord Henry Gordon, and cousin to the Marquis of Huntly, on Sept. 27, at Toorak, Melbourne.

Mr. Henderson, the well-known art collector and connoisseur, recently, in his eighty-third. He possessed a rare and most valuable collection of paintings, drawings, and miscellaneous articles of virtù, which, it is understood, he has bequeathed to our great national institutions.

Dr. Frederick Foster Quin, in Queen Anne's Mansions, on the 24th inst., in his eightieth year. In the early days of his professional career Dr. Quin travelled in Italy with Prince Leopold, afterwards King of the Belgians, and was appointed for the special duty of attending on Napoleon I. at St. Helena, but before he left England Napoleon died. Dr. Quin was on intimate terms with the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Cambridge, and other members of the Royal family.

Major-General Edward Trevor, retired full pay Royal Artillery, at Plymouth, on the 22nd inst., in his eighty-eighth year. He obtained his commission as Second Lieutenant in June, 1810, and served in the campaign of 1814 in Holland, and in that of 1815 in Flanders and France; was present at the Battle of Waterloo, where he served as one of the six subaltern officers unattached, and also at the captures of Cambray and Paris.

Mr. Rowley was the eldest son of George William Rowley, Esq., of Priory Hill, St. Neots, Hants, by Jane Catherine, his wife, only daughter of Thomas Mein, Esq., and succeeded his wife's grand uncle at Morcott, 1868. He was a J.P. for the counties of Rutland, Lincoln, and Hants, and a D.L., and in 1870 Sheriff of the first-named county. He married, in 1849, Caroline Frances, only child of the late Ven. Charles Lindsay, Archdeacon of Kildare.

He married, 1854, Helen Melville, daughter of the Rev. Edwin Sandys Lumsdaine, of Lumsdaine, and leaves two sons and four daughters.

Mr. Robert Wallis, the eminent landscape engraver, at Brighton, on the 23rd inst., aged eighty-four. Early in his career he became a worthy associate of Goodall, Millar, Cousins, Willmore, and, like them, his highest skill was trained and exercised on the works of Turner. Many of Mr. Wallis's best works are after Turner's drawings for the "Southern Coast," "England and Wales," "Rogers's Poems," and for the annuals and gift-books of that time. Among his larger single works probably the highest place may be claimed for the "Lake Nemi" and "Approach to Venice" after Turner; the latter being the artist's last work of importance. An artist's proof of Lake Nemi fetched ninety guineas at Christie's about three years ago.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Oct. 23, 1869) with a codicil (dated Jan. 29, 1877) of Mr. Richard Durant, late of Copthall-court, City, and of Sharpham, Devonshire, who died on July 17 last, was proved on the 13th inst in London by Richard Durant and Charles James Durant, the sons, and John Oxley Parker, the son-in-law, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £600,000. The testator leaves £50,000 upon trust for each of his three daughters, Mrs. Louisa Parker, Miss Elizabeth Jane Durant, and Mrs. Emily Kirk. He also leaves to his daughter Miss Durant all his household furniture, plate, linen, china, pictures, and effects at his town residence; to his son Charles James, £100,000; and all his real estate and the residue of his personalty to his eldest son Richard.

The will (dated Feb. 19, 1870) of Mr. Reginald Henry Nevill, late of Dangstein House, near Petersfield, Sussex, and of No. 45, Charles-street, Berkeley-square, who died on Sept. 11 last, was proved on the 14th inst. by Augustus Blaquiere Talbot, the surviving executor, the personal estate being sworn under £120,000. The testator gives to his wife, Lady Dorothy Fanny Nevill, £200 and all his furniture, plate, pictures, household effects, horses, carriages, and live and dead stock at Dangstein House, and £2000 per annum for life, in addition to her settlement; and there are legacies to servants and others. As to the residue of his real and personal estate, the testator leaves one sixth upon trust for his daughter Mericia Augusta, and the other five sixths between his sons Edward Augustus, Horace John, and Ralph.

The will (dated Aug. 6, 1872) with two codicils (dated Jan. 20, 1874, and April 23, 1875) of Mrs. Caroline Maria Marchmont, late of No. 171, Maida Vale, who died on Sept. 16 last, was proved on the 9th inst. by John Chester, Mrs. Louisa Harriet Walmesley, and Daniel Smithwick, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £70,000. Among the legacies may be mentioned, £10,000 upon trust for her adopted daughter, Ada Lockett; and £2000 to each of the children of her niece, Mrs. Walmesley. The residue of her property she leaves upon trust for her said niece for life, and then for all her children.

The will (dated Dec. 1, 1875) with two codicils (dated Dec. 4, 1877, and Oct. 22, 1878) of Mr. John Bond-Cabbell, late of Cromer Hall, Norfolk, and of No. 1, Chesterfield-gardens, Mayfair, who died on the 25th ult., was proved on the 15th inst. by Mrs. Margaret Bond-Cabbell, the widow, and Henry Best Hans Hamilton, the acting executors, the personal estate being sworn under £60,000. The testator bequeaths to his wife £2000; and to his secretary, John Arnold, £1000. The residue of his property, real and personal, is to be held upon trust for his wife for life or widowhood; in the event of her marrying again an annuity of £2000 is to be substituted. On the wife's death £20,000 is given to his daughter, Georgina Sarah; and the ultimate residue of his property, subject to the widow's power of appointment among children, to his son, Benjamin Bond Bond-Cabbell, absolutely.

Lord Coleridge and Lord Chief Baron Kelly have announced that the circuits which from time immemorial have been held in the spring of each year will in future, under a new arrangement which has been made, be held in January.

At a largely attended meeting of county magistrates, chairmen of guardians, &c., held at the Shirehall, Northampton, on Saturday last, under the presidency of the Duke of Grafton, it was decided to establish a County Mendicity Society on the Dorsetshire system, by which tramps are provided with tickets for bread upon application to the proper authorities and upon fulfilling certain conditions, thus doing away with indiscriminate almsgiving. Committees were formed, and the Duke of Grafton was appointed president.

At a public dinner to celebrate the completion of the mayoralty of Mr. H. H. Bemrose at Derby, it was announced by the Mayor (Mr. W. T. Smith) that Mr. Michael Thomas Bass (the senior member of the borough) has placed £5000 at his disposal for distribution among the worthiest of the town's charities. Some few months ago Mr. Bass announced his intention of presenting this amount towards the purchase of a public park on the estate of Lord Belper, at Derwent Bank. Lord Belper, however, it was considered, demanded too large a sum for his ground, and the projected scheme for a town's park was abandoned. Mr. Bass, however, has resolved that the £5000 shall be devoted to the town, and the sum is ordered to be divided among the charities of Derby. Among those enumerated are the Children's Hospital, the Infirmary, and the Nurse's Home. This munificent donation is only one among many of Mr. Bass's benefactions to the borough; for, as we learn from the Sheffield Daily Telegraph, he has already presented Derby with recreation-grounds, free swimming-baths, and a public free library.

The great annual show of roots under Messrs. Sutton's auspices was held last Saturday at Reading, and was visited by an immense number of persons. It was the largest exhibition ever held in the county. The exhibitors included the Queen, the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Northumberland, the Duke of Portland, the Marquis of Ailesbury, the Marquis of Donegall, and a large number of other members of the aristocracy. The prizes awarded exceeded £500 in value.—The exhibition of roots grown by Messrs. Carters' customers, of which the Agricultural Hall was the scene last Saturday, possessed attractions which fairly entitle the promoters to rank the display among the great autumnal shows of agricultural produce. What are claimed to be the largest mangel wurzels ever seen in England were from Canada. Amongst them were eight of "Carter's Mammoth Long Reds" which turned the scale at the weight of 430 lb. In the list of exhibitors were the Queen, the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Northumberland, Lord Redesdale, Lord Clinton, Lord Foley, Earl Harrington, Sir William Farquhar, Sir C. Lampson, Sir C. Russell, Admiral Sir G. N. B. Middleton, and Sir R. Sutton.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications relating to this department of the Paper should be addressed to the Editor, and have the word "Chess" written on the envelope.

NOVOCASTRIAN.—Staunton's position illustrating perpetual check requires a Black Knight at Q 3rd. Without that correction perpetual check is impossible.

J G E (Caterham).—The answer to 1. Q to K 4th (ch) is 2. B to Q Kt 5th, mating.

J W W and OWLET.—See answer to J G K.

J F H (Croydon).—Thanks for the information.

M R T (Brecon).—You are required to play the best defences for Black, and to defeat White if you can do so. Problem No. 1812 cannot be solved by 1. Q takes Q.

J G F (Ramsgate).—The correction of your three-move problem is noted.

W H T (Tunbridge Wells).—Your problem was published in our issue of June 22 last.

S R (Leeds).—The game you send, played between Napoleon and De Kempelen's so-called Automaton was published in this Journal on Nov. 30, 1844, and has been many times reprinted elsewhere.

C E R (Bakerstreet).—See answer to J G K.

T H (Truro).—You should refer to some elementary treatise upon the game for the answer to such a simple question. Every Pawn can be advanced two squares when it is first moved, if there is no obstruction to its line of movement.

W A P (Redcar).—Please note the answer to T. H. The Pawn, on being advanced to the eighth square, assumes at once the power of the piece to which it is promoted.

A M (Moscow).—We are greatly obliged for the budget of games, and shall be glad to hear of the progress of the proposed tourney.

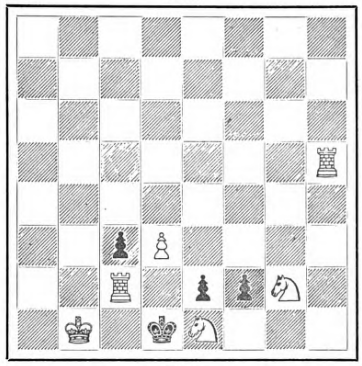
Painter of Shepherd's-bush, Florence F Shubrook, Norman Rumbelow, J de Honstevn, T M Swinburne, J G Finch, G A Ballingall, and Copiapino.

NOTE.—This problem cannot be solved by 1. R to R 2nd, as over fifty of our regular correspondents have supposed. The true defence to that move is—1. P to K 7th; and, should White then play 2. B takes K P, Black's answer is 2. B to K B 7th, after which there is no mate in two more moves. 1. B takes R P is also ineffective, because of the defence—1. Kt to B 3rd, and the continuation, 2. Kt to Kt 5th, &c.

SOLUTION OF PROBLEM No. 1812.



WHITE.	BLACK.
1. K to Kt sq	K to Q 4th*
2. Kt to Q 4th (dis. ch)	K takes Kt
3. Q to Q 6th, mate.

* If Black play 1. Q takes Q, then 2 Kt takes Q; if 1. Q takes Kt (ch), then 2. Kt to K sq; if 1. Q to K Kt sq, then 2. Kt to K 6th; if 1. Q to any other square, then 2. Kt to Q 2nd; if 1. Kt to Q B 4th or K 4th, then 2. Kt to K 5th, and if the Knight is moved elsewhere, 2. Q to K B 6th (ch), mating next move in each case.

CHESS IN RUSSIA.

WHITE (Mr. M.)	BLACK (Herr H.)	WHITE (Mr. M.)	BLACK (Herr H.)
1. P to K 4th	P to Q B 4th	13. Kt to Kt 6th	R to Kt sq
2 Kt to K B 3rd		14. Kt (B 3) to Q 5th	B to K 2nd
2. Kt to Q B 3rd, followed by 3. P to K Kt 3rd and 4. B to Kt 2nd, has been in vogue for some time past, but, as pointed out in the Westminster Papers, that line of play has not been very successful.		15 P to Q R 4th	Castles
		16. P takes P	B takes Kt
		17. P takes Kt	B takes K P
2.	Kt to Q B 3rd	This conception is ingenious enough, and, whether theoretically sound or not, has the effect of breaking up White's position.
3. P to Q 4th	P takes P
4 Kt takes P	P to K 3rd	18. P takes B	R takes Kt
5. Kt to Kt 5th	P to Q 3rd	19. B takes R	Q takes B
6 B to K B 4th	P to K 4th	20. B takes P
7. B to K 3rd	B to K 3rd	20. B to B 4th (ch) followed by 21. Q to K 2nd appears to us a better resource than this capture of a weak Pawn.
8 Kt to Q 2nd
8. Q Kt to B 3rd leads to an even game, as in reply Black can drive the K Kt to R 3rd, and, rapidly developing the pieces on the King's side, castle in safety.		20.
		21. B to B 4th (ch)	K to R sq
8.	P to B 4th	22. B to Q 5th	Q to B 6th (ch)

Black's last move is inferior to 8. P to Q B 3rd, but White failed to seize the chance afforded him 9. B to Q B 4th is the coup juste in this position.		24. R to R 7th	Kt to Kt 6th
		25. Q to Q 3rd
		Disastrous, of course; but if 25. Q to K sq, then, among other ways,

CHESS INTELLIGENCE.

A match was played last week between the Ladies' College and the Peckham Mutual Chess Clubs, in which the first-named carried the victory. When the score was seven to each side, Miss Rymer, of the Ladies' club, succeeded in winning the deciding game.

A new chess association has been established at Hampstead, under the presidency of Mr Forsyth, M.P. It is named the South Hampstead Chess Club, and an influential committee has been elected, Mr Walter Hall, of Gaston House, acting as honorary secretary and treasurer.

The members of the Croydon Chess Club meet every Tuesday evening at the Literary Institution, Croydon. This club, we are pleased to hear, is now firmly established. Among the members are the Right Hon. Mr. Lowe, M.P., the Hon. Granville Leveson Gower, Mr. W. Grantham, M.P., and the Rev. Mr. Macdonnell.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1878.

The meeting of Parliament on Thursday forecloses, for a brief season, the discussions out of doors, so rife during the past few weeks, anent the question of the North-Western boundaries of our Indian Empire. The real and ultimate authority of the nation will now take the controversy in hand, and pass judgment upon the policy pursued by the Indian Government in obedience to instructions from home. Public attention will be fastened upon the debates in the Upper and Lower House, and will cease to be attracted by the extra Parliamentary eloquence which, if it be displayed at all, will certainly be displayed "under difficulties." The flame of the candle, however brilliant in itself, becomes invisible in the sunlight. So far there is an undeniable advantage in the coming together of the British Legislature. An autumnal Session, though far from being unprecedented, has been rare. It largely and disagreeably interferes with customary social arrangements when, as in the present case, it comes suddenly. It acts in some respects like a collision at sea. It breaks off purposes, sometimes half executed, sometimes on the verge of being carried into effect. It deranges machinery upon the punctual and accurate movements of which not a few households depend for their prospective comfort; or, in individual instances, even for their safety. But it is one of those accidents to which senatorial life is necessarily exposed. To those immediately concerned it is no doubt an infliction; to the public at large it is, or may be, a precious boon. In the present case it is a necessity, and, whether for good or for evil, it must be endured—patiently and cheerfully, if possible, but, at any rate, with that measure of acquiescence which an imperative obligation is always powerful enough to command. The sacrifices it entails can find compensation only in the benefits it confers. The first are principally private and social; the last are public and national. Men who court the dignities of political life in the most exalted sphere of its development are hardly entitled, perhaps, to complain if now and then the responsibility of their position burdens them with duties incompatible with their private wishes.

Parliament has met two months at least in advance of the customary period of its assembling. What is the precise object of this early Session? Even in the absence of official information we may state what it is not. The Legislature has not been convened for the purpose of consulting it as to the mode in which the Executive should discharge its duties at the present crisis. It will not be called upon to determine the alternative of peace or war. This has been already done. War is afoot in Afghanistan. We have already challenged its remote issues. Parliament is not in a position morally to put an end to that which has been begun. The machinery of war cannot be stopped at a moment's notice, cannot perhaps be discreetly stopped until its immediate objects have been realised. Whether approved or not, it must run out much of its projected course. It will probably be formally approved by the present Parliament, but it is by no means certain that the method by which that approbation will be expressed may not be so shaded as to convey to her Majesty's Government a sense of public discontent which they will be at no loss to interpret. That they will command a majority of votes in support of their policy there cannot be much room to doubt. That the debates which will terminate in this result will augment their prestige remains to be seen. The fact is, every representative will see a General Election very close behind the decision which he may give and the opinions which he may express within the next few days. It may be anticipated, therefore, that there will be on the one side more caution and on the other more courage in declaring individual convictions. The division, should there be one, seems likely to be less expressive of the real sentiment of the country than the course and tenour of the discussions which will precede it. It must, to a certain extent, be provisional. It will shortly have to be ratified, whatever it may be, by the Constituent Bodies, and it appears not at all impossible that the end of this brief Autumnal Session will bring about the close of the existing Parliament.

The war having been proclaimed and entered upon, the means necessary to its being vigorously carried on cannot be refused. Some people are anxious to "stop the supplies;" indeed, a movement has been initiated with that view. It cannot be done. We do not mean, of course, to say that the House of Commons could not, if so disposed, withhold the pecuniary support required by the Government for the conduct of the war. But every thoughtful man must see at a glance that such a resolution, even if it could find a majority, would be a tactical and a political blunder. It would place our invading army in difficulties to which it ought never to be exposed. It could not be seriously thought of, not even if the nation, as a whole, utterly condemned the policy which has led to the war. The practical authority of the House of Commons could only in certain emergencies, and those extremely rare, become co-extensive with the theoretical. A vote of credit, therefore, if asked, will not be refused. True, the bill has been run up without the knowledge of the people and without the consent of Parliament, and it will necessarily yet run on, to what extent it is as yet impossible to foresee. But it must be paid; and, although there may be a good deal of grumbling over the transaction, paid, no doubt, it will be, with promptitude and honour, so far as the Indian Government is concerned.

What, then, is it possible to accomplish during the present Autumnal Session? Not much, it may be, directly; but underneath not a little. If there be injustice in the military aggression upon the country of the Ameer of Afghanistan, it will be possible, should success crown the British arms (of which there can be no serious doubt), to minimise that injustice. If the war be unnecessary, the first opportunity for putting an end to it may be seized and utilised. If the policy which has precipitated hostilities be erroneous, it may, as occasion admits of, be reversed. Our hope lies, not in the present, but in the future. We rejoice that Parliament has been called together, not because there is any reason to believe that it can instantly, even if desirous of so doing, stay the course of events now proceeding, but because if that course be inconsistent with the dictates of wisdom, justice, and honour, the direction of it may be the more speedily altered. The bias of our rulers will be swayed eventually by the national will, and it is to be hoped that the forthcoming debates will indicate with sufficient precision and impressiveness what that will is.

The Albert Medal of the Second Class has been conferred upon Anthony Gerrighty, a private in the Royal Marines. On the night of July 27 last a lunatic named Field, on his passage home in the transport-ship Baron Colonsay, of Greenock, broke away from the sentry in the sick berth and climbed up the rigging, where he remained till about five a.m., when he jumped overboard. Gerrighty jumped after him, and, though struck at with a knife which Field had in his hand, succeeded in rescuing him. This occurrence took place while the ship was going eight knots and a fresh breeze blowing.

A large and influential meeting of ladies, called by the Mayoress (Mrs. Ward), was held at Sheffield on Monday to organise means for relieving the great distress that prevails among women and children in the town. Mr. Mark Firth had placed at the disposal of the Mayor the offices and warerooms connected with Sanderson's works in West-street; and the ladies decided to employ as many women—sempstresses, wives of workmen out of employ, and factory girls—in those rooms as they can; and the clothing they make up will be lent to needy people for the winter. Relief committees have now been formed in all the parishes of the town, and assistance is being given wherever it is needed. The Mayor's fund has reached nearly £5000. The first public distribution of food took place on Wednesday, when three hundred families, chiefly connected with the iron and steel trades, were served with soup and bread. The distribution is to be maintained twice a week.

PRINCESS LOUISE IN CANADA.

The arrival of the Marquis of Lorne at Halifax, as the new Governor-General of the Dominion of Canada, accompanied by his wife, her Royal Highness Princess Louise, was described in last week's paper, with the commencement of their journey, by the Intercolonial Railway, from Halifax to Montreal. They reached that city about noon on Friday week, having been met and accompanied, part of the way, by the members of the Quebec Provincial Government. Addresses were presented, at different stations, by deputations of the French Canadians of Lower Canada, to whom the Marquis replied in their own language, and by the Mayor and Municipality of Montreal. His Excellency and her Royal Highness were received in that city with great popular enthusiasm; their carriage was drawn by men, instead of horses, to the Windsor Hotel, where they lodged that night. The streets were illuminated, and there was a grand ball given by St. Andrew's Scottish Society, which was attended by the Marquis of Lorne and the Princess; his Excellency danced a quadrille with Lady M'Donald, wife of the Canadian Premier, while the Princess was the partner of Lieutenant-Colonel Stevenson, an officer of the Colonial Militia. They also danced in a Scotch reel, to the music of pipers. Next day they received several addresses of welcome, visited the M'Gill College University and the Ville Marie Convent School, and held a drawing-room reception. On Sunday they attended worship at the English Cathedral, and in the afternoon at St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church. On Monday they left Montreal for Ottawa, the political metropolis of the whole Dominion of Canada, where they have taken up their abode in Government House, formerly named Rideau Hall, of which we give an Illustration. The Princess is much pleased with her future home. It is a roomy building, with a pleasant interior, but of no architectural pretensions. The mansion is very plain, but comfortable, and very homelike in all its arrangements. The interior is entirely upholstered in crimson. Attached are billiard-rooms, tennis court, La Crosse ground, bowling alley, toboggon slides, skating and curling rinks, and every aid to outdoor diversions. But it is said that Princess Louise intends to make her summer residence at Halifax, on the Nova Scotian Atlantic coast.

MR. GLADSTONE ON THE AFGHAN WAR.

Last Saturday Mr. Gladstone paid a visit to his constituency at Greenwich, which was looked upon as being of a farewell character. In the afternoon the right hon. gentleman was entertained at a luncheon at the Ship Hotel, and, having responded to the toast of his health, proposed "Prosperity to the Borough of Greenwich Liberal Association." Dwelling especially upon the word "association," and upon the particular ideas which it suggested, he defended the Birmingham plan of organisation from the criticisms which had been passed upon it, and challenged its opponents to produce a better.

In the evening Mr. Gladstone, who was accompanied by Mrs. Gladstone, spoke at a large meeting held at the Skating Rink, Plumstead, when he was presented with an address expressing regret at the severance of his connection with the borough of Greenwich, and the pride which the borough would ever feel at having been associated with his name and fame. Mr. Gladstone said he would not draw in detail the contrast between the present time and five years ago. He did not know what the "harassed interests" thought of it; at present he knew of but one harassed interest, which was the British nation. Referring to "personal government," which was not a happy phrase, he protested against its being interpreted to mean that the Sovereign desired to depart from the traditions of the Constitution; but he charged the present advisers of the Crown with having insidiously begun a system intended to narrow the liberties of the people of England, and to reduce Parliament to the condition of the French Parliaments before the great Revolution. Retorting the accusation that he and his supporters were the friends of Russia, he declared that the Government had been the real friends of that Power, having brought it back to the Danube, from which it was driven in 1856. They were its left-handed friends, who had done good to Russia by their bungling attempts to do harm. The right hon. gentleman vindicated his Government from the charge of responsibility for the Afghan war, and threw it entirely upon the present Ministry, commenting severely upon the ninth paragraph of Lord Cranbrook's despatch, which, he said, stated things true in themselves in a manner to convey, and which had conveyed, a totally false impression. The responsibility would soon, probably, be divided between the Government and the Houses of Parliament; but if the people, when appealed to, should approve of the policy which had been pursued the largest share of the responsibility would be theirs. The question which they had to consider was, whether this war was just or unjust? "So far (Mr. Gladstone said) as I am able to collect the evidence, it is unjust. It fills me with the greatest alarm lest it should be proved to be grossly and totally unjust. If so, we should come under the stroke of the everlasting law that suffering shall follow sin; and the day will arrive—come it soon or come it late—when the people of England will discover that national injustice is the surest road to national downfall."—The speech occupied in delivery one hour and fifty minutes. At the conclusion a resolution, by which the meeting adopted the address which had been presented to Mr. Gladstone, was heartily carried.

THE AFGHAN WAR.

The progress of military operations in this questionable enterprise up to the middle of the week, our latest news being that of Thursday afternoon, has been tolerably successful, though not quite unimpeded. It will be remembered that Afghanistan has been invaded simultaneously by three separate columns of the British-Indian Army. The first, proceeding from the Peshawur Valley through the Khyber Pass, under the command of Sir Samuel Brown, has occupied Dakka, at the farther end of the Pass, and is going on to take possession of the Afghan fortified town of Jellalabad, a hundred miles from the city of Cabul. The second column, under General Roberts, advanced from Thull by the Khoorum Pass, occupied the Khoorum fort, but has been stopped two or three days at Peiwar, where the Afghans made a stand last Saturday in a strong position, till General Roberts defeated them on Monday, capturing eighteen of their guns, having by a flank march turned their position with the 72nd Highlanders and 5th Goorkhas; he then occupied Peiwar Kotul, and intended moving on towards the Shaturgardan Pass on Thursday. The third column, which has not yet met an enemy, is that of the Quetta garrison, with reinforcements and supports brought up through the Bolan Pass; its Commander is Sir Donald Stewart, but the advanced force is, under General Biddulph, moving through the Peshin valley, north of Quetta, on the road to the city of Candahar. It would appear that the Afghans do not mean to attempt the defence of Jellalabad, or any of their towns, except possibly when the city of Cabul should be attacked; but that they will fight in chosen positions in their mountain passes. The defence of the Ali Musjid fort, at the entrance to the Khyber Pass, was probably a mere feint; it is evident that their principal forces are collected farther west, on both sides of the Safed Koh range of mountains, which is of impassable height, and which separates the Khyber Pass and the plain of Jellalabad from the Khoorum Valley. The only outlet from the Khoorum Valley into the more open country westward is by the Shaturgardan Pass, which must very soon become impossible of access from the winter snow. Unless, therefore, General Roberts can force this Pass within a few days, his victory at the Peiwar Pass will prove barren of useful results. There seems to be no obstacle to the advance of Sir Samuel Brown upon Jellalabad, as the road lies open, and the Afghans have abandoned that place. Beyond Jellalabad are the Jugdulluk and Khoord Cabul Passes, but it is understood that the British advance to Cabul will not be pressed at this season of the year. It is even doubtful whether the southern force, under Sir Donald Stewart, will attempt to reach Candahar this winter.

The following is an account of the operations of the Khoorum force:—

The Khoorum Fort was occupied on the 26th ult. The garrison, reported to be nearly 2000, had abandoned it, leaving one gun, and taking one horse and one mule battery, in all twelve guns. Next day General Roberts, pressing a cavalry reconnaissance, learned that the Afghans were retiring up a steep slope of the Peiwar range, and dragging their guns with difficulty. Hoping to overtake them while thus confused, General Roberts on the 28th, with part of his troops, made a forced march of eighteen miles, but was unsuccessful in hindering the Afghans from gaining a position on a ridge of the Peiwar Pass. A reconnaissance in force next day convinced General Roberts of the remarkable strength of the Afghan position, so he halted for two days, on Nov. 30 and Dec. 1, to permit reinforcements to come up.

General Roberts intended to attack on the 2nd by a turning movement, the Afghan front being too strong for a frontal attack. He employs two infantry brigades, a mountain battery, and four horse-artillery guns on elephants. The ground of operations is reported not difficult. The country people say that the Afghans are unable to remove their guns. General Roberts's force is provisioned for six days. He hopes to follow up the Afghan retreat beyond their cantonment at Ali Kheil, and drive them over the Shaturgardan range. Reinforcements for the Afghan Khoorum force are reported to be counter-ordered. News of the result of General Robert's intended attack on the 2nd is expected hourly.

Lahore, Dec. 5.

General Roberts telegraphs from Peiwar Kotul on the 3rd inst. as follows:—

"During the night of the 1st inst. the Afghan position was turned by a flank march over the Spengwai Pass. We surprised the enemy at daybreak, when the 72nd Highlanders and the 5th Ghoorkas drove the Afghan troops gallantly from several positions. They afterwards endeavoured to reach Peiwar Kotul, but the assault could not be delivered on that side. We then threatened the enemy's rear and attacked Peiwar Kotul, which was occupied at four o'clock in the afternoon. The enemy, who had been reinforced by four regiments on the previous evening, offered a desperate resistance, and their artillery was well served. Their defeat, however, was complete. We captured eighteen guns and a large quantity of ammunition. Our loss is moderate, considering the numbers to which we were opposed and the difficult nature of the country. Major Anderson, of the 23rd Pioneers, was killed—not Captain Anderson, as at first reported. General Cobbe and Lieutenant Munro, of the 72nd Highlanders, are wounded. The troops behaved admirably. We move towards the Shaturgardan Pass on the 5th inst."

Lahore, Dec. 5, 11.15 a.m.

General Roberts has succeeded brilliantly in an attack on the Afghan position. He has carried the Peiwar Kothal, and has driven off the enemy, inflicting great loss, captured all guns, and is following up the retreating enemy in the direction of Ali Kheil. Our loss is about eighty, including Captain Kelso, R.A., and Captain Anderson, 23rd Pioneers.

In the Khyber Pass, or rather at the Indian entrance to it, between Jumrood and the Ali Musjid fort, the convoys were intercepted by marauding parties of hillmen during two or three days of last week. These were dispersed on Saturday by Major Cavagnari, with a detachment of troops from Jumrood, and the Afreedi village of Kheddum was burnt as a punishment. There is no further danger of annoyance in the Khyber. To ease the strain, a portion of the 2nd Division has moved forward to and beyond Peshawur. The 5th Fusiliers are at Hurri Singh. The 2nd Goorkhas and a troop of Horse Artillery are at Peshawur. Macpherson's brigade is at Bosawul, ten miles from Dakka, with orders to reconnoitre in a forward direction towards Jellalabad. Jenkins commands the brigade at Dakka; Tytler another at Lundi Khana. Appleyard commands at Ali Musjid, vice Colonel Browne, recalled. Jumrood is in charge of General Maude.

Colonel Macgregor, an experienced officer, has been sent up to superintend, with full powers, the line of communications from Jumrood to Dakka. An alternative line by Abazai is being opened up. It is not impossible that Jellalabad will be occupied before the winter.

General Biddulph has camped at Hykulzai, in the Peshin Valley. He is engaged in exploring the district to the right in the direction of Thull and Chotiali, and the route to the left turning the Khojuk Pass. Sir D. Stewart is now at the foot of the Bolan Pass, en route to Quetta. It is estimated that the conjoined Quetta force will reach Candahar by the middle of January, after which cavalry reconnaissances will take place in the direction of Herat and Ghuzni.

We present several Illustrations of the movement of troops and military stores in the Punjaub, two or three of the Sketches being contributed by our valued correspondent, Lieutenant C. Pulley, Adjutant of the 3rd Goorkha Regiment, which halted at the permanent camp of Meean Meer, near Lahore, on its way to join the Moultan Division for the advance through the Bolan Pass to Quetta. We are indebted also to Lieutenant C. H. Atchison, R.H.A., for a sketch of the village of Thull, on the right bank of the Khoorum river, from which point of departure the march of General Roberts began on the morning of the 21st ult.; and Lieutenant Philip Neville, of the 14th Bengal Lancers, has favoured us with a Sketch of his picket at the camp of Muttra Thana, in which we see a deserter of the enemy brought before the officer, to be questioned for any information that can be got out of him. The force at this picket consisted one hundred cavalry and infantry, under two native and two European officers, employed to watch the mouths of the side passes near the Khyber. We also give, in a small Engraving, a romantic glimpse of the Khoorum, seen from a singular cleft in the rocks of Mount Sakesur, in the Punjaub Salt Range. It is from a sketch by Captain Jamieson. Our Special Artist, Mr. W. Simpson, should by this time have joined one or other of the advancing army corps in Afghanistan; and we hope in a few days to receive letters and sketches from him.

THE COLLISION IN THE CHANNEL.

Our last publication gave some account of the disaster which occurred off Dover at midnight on Monday week—namely, a collision between the Hamburg-American Company's steamer Pommerania, bound from New York to Hamburg, and a full-rigged ship, the Moel Eilian, of Carnarvon. The passengers and crew on board the Pommerania numbered then 220 souls, of whom 172 were saved, nearly fifty persons being drowned. The Pommerania sank in about thirty minutes after the collision. The second and third officers were drowned. The 172 other persons were saved by the Glengarry, a Middlesborough steamer, and landed at Dover. Ten or twelve of them were German lady passengers from New York.

The Pommerania belonged to the Hamburg-American line of steamers. Her gross measurement amounted to 3382 tons. She had left New York on the 14th ult. with the United States mail; had touched at Plymouth early on the Monday morning, and landed there the passengers and mails for England, also 7500 dols. in specie; after which she proceeded to Cherbourg, and was going to Hamburg to complete her voyage. She was a brig-rigged iron screw-vessel, built at Greenock in 1873. The Moel Eilian is an iron barque of 1100 tons gross, owned in Liverpool, and classed A 1, having been built at Sunderland last year. She was on her way from Rotterdam to Cardiff in ballast. When brought into the port of Dover, after the collision, she was placed in the Granville Dock. Our Illustration shows her appearance while lying in the dock. Except in the bows, where she came in contact with the Pommerania, she was uninjured, but her bows presented a terrible sight. Her bowsprit was carried away: and the bows were completely stove in, exposing the water-tight compartment right away to the bulkheads, while large sheets of iron plates hung loosely down below the water's edge on the starboard side. The force of the collision was very great, but it is remarkable that a sailing-vessel of comparatively small size could sink the steam-ship, which had thrice her tonnage. An official inquiry will be held, after some arrangements pending with the German Government. Captain Schwensen, who commanded the steamer, was taken to Rotterdam.

At Rome on Tuesday there was much excitement in and around the Chamber of Deputies. The tribunes set apart for the public were densely filled, and crowds gathered round the doors. The attack upon the Government then began. Meetings in favour of the Government are being called in various parts of the peninsula. Ministers will demand a vote of confidence.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The Emperor has summoned the Austrian Reichsrath to assemble on the 10th inst. for legislative business.

In last Saturday's sitting of the Budget Committee of the Austrian Reichsrath, Count Andrassy delivered a long speech in defence of the Eastern policy of the Government. In reply to questions on Sunday, he said that the occupation of Bosnia and the Herzegovina would cease when the objects for which it was undertaken were accomplished, and Turkey had reimbursed Austria for the sacrifices she had made and given a guarantee for the future. After this explanation the Budget Committee approved the Foreign Office estimates, and the conflict between the Government and the Delegation was thereby terminated. The Budget Committee of the Austrian Delegation on Monday, after an animated debate, adopted a motion not to enter upon the discussion of the bill sanctioning a grant in the Budget of 1879 for the occupation Bosnia and Herzegovina, but to vote 15,000,000 florins as a special requirement of the army for 1879 to defray the expenses of maintaining the troops stationed in those provinces. The motion further stipulated that for any additional outlay the Government must obtain Constitutional sanction. The Committee afterwards discussed a report upon the Foreign Office Estimates, which Count Andrassy declared did not give an accurate summary of the negotiations on the Eastern Question, but constituted an indictment and a formal declaration of want of confidence. On a vote being taken, the report was adopted by 12 against 6, without modification.

cessors. In conclusion, his Majesty said he hoped to have the consolation of seeing the country develop in a peaceful and regular manner, which was the only means of securing the greatness of Russia. Hobart Pasha, at the Sultan's request, has addressed a report to his Majesty on the state of the Turkish Navy, in which he recommends that some vessels should be put out of commission, and the rest provided with the latest and most improved machinery and appliances. AMERICA.

The United States Congress was opened on Monday. The President's Message refers at great length to monetary affairs, discusses the question of the remonetisation of silver, and recommends Congress either to limit the amount of silver dollars issued or to change their coinage ratio to gold by conforming it to the present market value of the two metals. He further recommends discontinuing the coinage of silver dollars when the amount outstanding exceeds fifty millions. He says he is persuaded that in the present financial condition of the country the welfare of legitimate business and industry of every description will be best promoted by abstaining from all attempts to make radical changes in existing financial legislation; and if this policy is pursued, they may confidently expect that the resumption of specie payments which will take place at the appointed time will be successfully and easily maintained, and that it will be followed by a healthful and enduring revival of business and prosperity. The Message also refers to the state of the South, the payment of the Halifax award, the Indian troubles, and other matters, but makes no mention of the relations of the United States with Canada.

The President's Message having been read, bills were introduced for making the trade dollar a legal tender, for the appointment of a joint committee to inquire into the cause of the spread of the recent yellow fever epidemic in the Southern States, and for the increase of the national debt in consequence of the payment of the Halifax Award.

The Secretary of the Treasury's annual report sent to Congress states the receipts of the fiscal year 1878 to have been 257,763,000 dols., and the expenditures, 236,964,000 dols. The surplus has been devoted to the reduction of the debt. While the Secretary's views regarding the Silver Act are unchanged, it has been his purpose faithfully to execute the measure and give it a fair trial. He announces his readiness to begin resumption on Jan. 1, from which date the department will redeem greenbacks at New York in coin, and receive them as equal to coin. The New York banks will co-operate, receiving greenbacks as coin.

Specimens of the water were tested at different points, and the results are said to have been favourable.

The weekly return of metropolitan pauperism shows that the total number of paupers at the end of the fourth week in November was 81,241, of whom 42,014 were in workhouses and 39,227 received outdoor relief. Compared with the corresponding week in 1877, these figures show an increase of 105; but, as compared with 1876 and 1875, they show a decrease of 1002 and 3541 respectively. The number of vagrants relieved on the last day of the week was 815, of whom 591 were men, 183 women, and 41 children.

The verdict of the jury in the action brought against the Metropolitan Asylums Board in relation to the Hampstead Hospital was given yesterday week. The Judge left a series of questions with the jury, and their finding on these was to the effect that the hospital was a nuisance, and that, assuming the defendants had a legal right to erect it, they did not carry it on with a reasonable regard to the plaintiffs' rights. On the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and for misdirection, a rule for a new trial was on Monday granted in the Queen's Bench Division.

Sir Charles Reed presided at Wednesday's meeting of the School Board for London. The estimate of expenditure during the coming year was presented by Mr. Freeman, chairman of the finance committee, who gave an explanation of some of the leading items. The probable expenditure for the coming year was fixed at £551,247, which is £44,941 more than the previous estimate. The excess was mainly due to the increase in the number of children and the cost of school management. The estimate and the accompanying recommendations of the committee were, after a discussion, agreed to.

The arrangements for the forthcoming Smithfield Cattle Show were completed on Tuesday last. There is an increase of live stock, especially in the cattle classes, beyond that of last year. The Queen will, as usual, be a large exhibitor in the Devon and shorthorn classes, from the Home and Norfolk Farms at Windsor, as well as amongst the pigs, whilst the Prince of Wales will compete in the same cattle classes, and with the Duke of Richmond and Gordon and Lord Walsingham in the sheep classes. There will be a larger show of machinery than on any previous occasion. Notwithstanding that the Birmingham Show of this year, reverting to its old principle, precedes that of the Smithfield Club, thus shutting out most of its finest specimens from the metropolitan show, the entries of the latter are slightly in excess of those of last year. It is believed that the Prince of Wales has reserved the best breeds of his Sandringham stock for London. His Royal Highness has, it is stated, signified his intention of visiting the show.

On Monday night the inaugural meeting of the Victoria Institute, or Philosophical Society of Great Britain, was held at its rooms, 7, Adelphi-terrace, W.C.—Mr. C. At the anniversary meeting of the Royal Society held last Saturday at Burlington House, Sir Joseph Dalton Hooker resigned the office of president, and Mr. William Spottiswoode was chosen his successor. Alfred Cornu; the Derby medal to MM. Louis Paul Cailletet and Raoul Pictet. The presentation was in each case preceded by a recapitulation of the scientific services for which the award was made.—Mr. William Spottiswoode, having been elected President of the Royal Society on Saturday last, has resigned the secretaryship of the Royal Institution of Great Britain. After the meeting of the members on Monday last, it was proposed that a subscription be opened by the members to present a bust of Mr. Spottiswoode to the Royal Institution as a recognition of his valuable services as treasurer and secretary successively. A portrait and memoir of the new President of the Royal Society appeared in the Illustrated London News for Sept. 7 last, p. 221.

Judgment was delivered at a quarter-past eleven, T'Kindt being sentenced to fifteen years' solitary confinement, and Fortamps to one year's imprisonment and a fine of 6000f.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

The sixth Session of the present Parliament was opened on Thursday afternoon in the prosaic fashion which has become common in these degenerate days. Outside the Palace of Westminster, and in Palace-yard, there gathered a goodly number of people, and the approaches to the House of Lords were lined by persons desirous, perhaps, of seeing the Earl of Beaconsfield pass in his unpretending little brougham, as some compensation for the lack of State ceremonial. But "he cometh not" might have been the lament of these curious sightseers, for the Queen's Speech was read without the august presence of the Prime Minister. Within the House of Commons, there was a fair muster of members some time before two o'clock, and very cheery were the smiling salutations exchanged on the floor of the House in the interval before the Speaker took the Chair. Sir Wilfrid Lawson's recent interchange of courtesies with Major O'Gorman made him the centre of attraction in a group of fellow-Liberals, among whom Sir Charles Dilke appeared to be especially jocose, and even Sir Andrew Lusk strove to be drily facetious. In the Upper Chamber, the ladies were in the majority, the back benches on each side being pretty well occupied by Peeresses in ordinary morning dress, and a few more being observable in the gallery to the left of the Throne, near which sat a young African personage with an interpreter. There were scarcely more than a dozen Peers present to take part in the tame ceremony of opening Parliament by Royal Commission. The first entrance of these illustrious Peers in robes of scarlet cloth and ermine, and in cocked hats, was somewhat of a misfire. Either they had entered too early, or some rule of precedence had not been observed. But this was soon remedied, by their retiring from the House, and re-entering in Indian file, the Lord Chancellor leading. Her Majesty's Commissioners were Earl Cairns, the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, the Duke of Northumberland, Lord Beauchamp, and Lord Skelmersdale. The customary rush heralded the approach of the members of the Lower House, who accompanied the Speaker to the Bar of the House of Lords. The "letters patent" having been sonorously read at the table, the Lord Chancellor delivered the exceptionally brief and compact Queen's Speech with his wonted clearness and distinctness of elocution, every word being plainly heard throughout the House:—

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

My Lords and Gentlemen,—

I regret that I have been obliged to call for your attendance at an unusual and, probably to most of you, an inconvenient season.

The hostility towards my Indian Government manifested by the Ameer of Afghanistan, and the manner in which he repulsed my friendly Mission, left me no alternative but to make a peremptory demand for redress.

This demand having been disregarded, I have directed an expedition to be sent into his territory, and I have taken the earliest opportunity of calling you together and making to you the communication required by law.

I have directed that papers on the subject shall be laid before you.

I receive from all foreign Powers assurances of their friendly feelings, and have every reason to believe that the arrangements for the pacification of Europe made by the Treaty of Berlin will be successfully carried into effect.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,—

The Estimates for the ensuing year are in course of preparation, and will in due time be submitted to you.

My Lords and Gentlemen,—

I propose that, after full deliberation upon the matters which have led me to anticipate your usual time of meeting, and after a suitable recess, you should proceed to the consideration of various measures for the public benefit, which will then be laid before you.

I confidently commit to your wisdom the great interests of my Empire, and I pray that the blessings of Almighty God may attend your counsels.

In the House of Lords the Lord Chancellor took his seat upon the woolsack at five o'clock. At that hour there was a very full attendance of Peers, the galleries and steps of the Throne were also crowded with members of the Lower House and diplomatists. On the cross benches were the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge, and both the Ministerial and Opposition benches were filled by their usual occupants. In the side gallery was Prince Leopold, Prince Christian, and the Duke and Duchess of Teck. The Prime Minister, the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, Lord Cranbrook, Earl Granville, and Lord Northbrook were among the first arrivals. The Earl of Derby shortly afterwards entered, and took his seat on the cross benches. Viscount Cranbrook gave notice that on Monday next he would move "That, her Majesty having directed a military expedition of the forces chargeable upon the Indian revenues to be dispatched against the Ameer of Afghanistan, this House consents that the revenues of India shall be applied towards defraying the expenses of carrying on military operations beyond the external frontier of her Majesty's Indian possessions." Lord Ravensworth, in moving the Address, gave a lengthened statement of the reasons which in his view had led to the estrangement of the Ameer, remarking upon an observation which had been made ten years ago by an eminent Indian statesman, that no one could doubt that the approach of Russia towards our north-western frontier in India must involve us in great difficulties. The Viceroy who said that was Sir J. Lawrence, and the Secretary of State for India was the Duke of Argyll. He had referred to the words because they were the keystone of the discussion they were about to commence. For a long time there had been what he would term a forward and backward school of Indian politicians, and as an illustration of his meaning he would remind the House that an eminent Indian statesman in 1857 proposed the abandonment of Peshawur and the cession of a portion of the neighbouring territory to Dost Mohammed, which proposition was stoutly combatted by the then Viceroy, Lord Canning, and that was a sample of the tone of mind which influenced the backward section of Indian politicians. He expressed his regret at the quarrel with the people of Afghanistan, but said it was not a quarrel with them but with the Ameer alone. In 1855 a treaty was concluded between the East India Company and the father of the present Ameer, which had been characterised by Lord Canning as a very one-sided one, and when Dost Mohammed died, in 1863, a civil war broke out in Afghanistan, in which Shere Ali was not at first successful, but he gained a very great victory, in 1865, over the elder brother, Hussein, but lost his favourite son, and doubtless he considered this country had not treated him well, because we were willing, while his brother was Ameer de facto, to recognise him. When Lord Mayo was Viceroy he did everything he could to conciliate the Ameer, and that course was also followed by Lord Northbrook, and a conference took place at Simla, in 1873, in which the protection of the Ameer was promised if he was attacked by Russia, of which he had some fear after the annexation of Khiva, and when the Russians were on the Oxus. But the Home Government did not share in the alarm of the Ameer, and scouted the danger of the Russian advance. No doubt the Ameer was puzzled at our proceedings, and began to consider that we were no friends of his, but that he must look to Russia as his friend. Then came the history of the missions to Cabul with which their Lordships were familiar, and with the fact that, while the Russian Mission was welcomed with open arms, ours was insolently repulsed. We were now at war with Afghanistan; and after the insult which this country had received no noble Lord would advise the Cabinet to take any other course than it had pursued. So far as the war had gone at present our officers and men had done their duty, and the result could be waited for with confidence. The noble Lord concluded by expressing his great sympathy with the millions who were suffering from the depression of trade, and hoped that there would be a speedy revival. Lord Inchiquin, in rising to second the Address, referred to the complications which Russian interference and bad faith had brought about in Europe, and traced the outbreak of the war in Afghanistan to Russian diplomacy. He believed that if preceding Ministries had been fair to the Ameer that he would be now our friend; but that under present circumstances we were justified in going to war. Earl Granville deeply regretted that no reference had been made in the Speech from the Throne to the great distress which existed at the present time in all parts of the country. With regard to the Berlin Treaty, he admitted that it would prove a very satisfactory arrangement indeed, provided the Ministry could guarantee that Russia and Turkey would carry out all their engagements under it. The Anglo-Turkish Convention was no doubt very successful for the moment, but it was even beginning to be recognised by noble Lords opposite that Cyprus was no very great acquisition, after all. There was another very singular thing, and that was that no allusion was made to the proposed reforms in Asia Minor. He then proceeded to criticise the policy of the Government with respect to India, urging that its action against the Ameer was unjust, and that it had effectually played into the hands of their great rival in the East; yet, the emergency being created, his party would co-operate in every way with the other House for the purpose of making ample provision for our brave troops engaged in the war. Earl Grey moved an amendment to the effect that when war was probable Parliament ought to have been summoned to provide for the expenses and to consider the grounds upon which war might be declared. The Duke of Somerset supported the Government. The Marquis of Salisbury, in a long and able oration, gave a succinct history of the causes which led to the declaration of war against the Ameer. In conclusion his Lordship regretted that Lord Lytton had been attacked so personally, and he paid a high tribute to the abilities and devotion of the Viceroy of India, "who combined the imagination of a poet with the shrewdness of a Scotchman." The noble Marquis resumed his seat amid loud cheers. The Address was ultimately agreed to.

The House of Commons resumed at four o'clock. The following new members took the oath and their seats:—Lord Colin Campbell, for Argyleshire; the Hon. J. W. Fitzwilliam, for Peterborough; Mr. Freemantle, for Truro; and Mr. Edge, for Newcastle-under-Lyme. Mr. E. Stanhope gave notice that on Monday next he would move the following resolution: "That, her Majesty having directed a military expedition of her forces charged upon the Indian revenues against the Ameer of Afghanistan, this House consents that the revenues of India should be applied for any expenses of the military operations which may be conducted beyond the frontiers of her Majesty's Indian possessions. Mr. Fawcett gave notice that he would oppose the resolution. Mr. Cartwright gave notice that on Tuesday week he would call attention to the appointment of delegates in Egypt by the French and English Governments, and move a resolution. Lord R. Montagu gave notice of a question for to-morrow as to the discrepancies in Lord Lytton's despatches and telegrams, and as to a statement of Lord Lytton that the only interest England had in Afghanistan was for the security of the Indian frontier, and that if the Ameer refused to come to terms with the English Government there was no reason why the latter should not come to terms directly with Russia, and wipe Afghanistan off the map. He wished to know if any such direct understanding had been arrived at with Russia. A great many notices were given by private members of the introduction of bills. In reply to Mr. Ritchie, Mr. E. Stanhope said that the Government had received a telegram informing them of the success of General Roberts in the Khyber Pass. The Speech from the Throne having been read from the Chair, Lord Castlereagh moved the Address in reply thereto. Referring to the position of affairs consequent on the Berlin Treaty, he asserted that nothing had as yet transpired which, in his opinion, gave any colour to the suggestion that either of the parties to that treaty was desirous of withdrawing from its engagements. With regard to the Afghanistan question, he pointed out that the advances of Russia and the unfriendly attitude assumed by the Ameer had rendered necessary the step taken by the Indian Government in proposing to send an English Mission to the Ameer's Court. He regretted that the reception given by the Ameer to our approaches had been of such a character as to lead to the war which had just begun; but he trusted that that war would be prosecuted on our part in a manner that would be short, sharp, and decisive. In conclusion he moved an address, which, as usual, re-echoed the points contained in the Speech from the Throne. Mr. Hall seconded the Address. The Marquis of Hartington complimented the mover and seconder of the Address on the manner in which they had performed the task allotted to them, and then called attention to the brevity of the Speech to which the Address was the reply. He had noticed with surprise that the Speech contained no allusion to the colonies, although events of the gravest character were in progress in South Africa, involving the sending for reinforcements. With regard to the Treaty of Berlin, he hoped that the House would receive from the Government some further information than was vouchsafed in the Speech, and called attention to the difficulties that were said to exist with regard to the organisation of Eastern Roumelia. He also pointed out that the Speech made no reference to the existing depression of trade, and asserted that it was altogether without precedent that her Majesty's Government should have reframed from making any exposition on the subject of future domestic legislation. He asked whether this arose from the fact that the Government had not decided on what they intended to do, or whether what they did intend was of such trivial importance that it was not worth mentioning. He now came to the Afghan war. He complained of the delay that had occurred in the presentation of papers on this subject. It might, he said, be the duty of some hon. member to call attention to the policy of the Government in regard to the war with the Ameer; but for himself and his friends he repudiated any intention of impeding the action of the Government by any attempt to resist the voting of supplies. The war having been entered upon, rightly or otherwise, it was essential to the safety of our Indian Empire that it should be conducted with vigour. He congratulated the House and the Government on the news received that day, remarking that, so far as it had proceeded, the war had been admirably conducted. In saying this, however, he did not forego his right to criticise the policy which had led to that war. The noble Lord then referred to Lord Cranbrook's despatch in reference to the policy pursued by Lord Northbrook, and argued that while the course pursued by the latter was consistent with the part which has previously characterised our dealings with the rulers of Afghanistan, the policy of Lord Lytton had been as unwise as it was undignified. He asked for early explanations from her Majesty's Government as to why none of the despatches between the Home Government and Lord Lytton had been published. With reference to the question of the Russian advance, he assured the House that he was by no means indifferent to that matter, and he called attention to the despatches of Lord Lawrence, wherein the position and progress of Russia in Central Asia were referred to. There was no ground, he asserted, for saying that the late Government, or, indeed, any Government, had ever been indifferent to this subject; but, he urged, it was another thing to argue that, because Russia showed a tendency to advance, we should necessarily advance in the opposite direction to meet her. In conclusion, he complained of the withholding of information from Parliament as to what was being done upon this question. Only last Session the Duke of Argyll was assured in the other House that there was no reason to apprehend any change of policy or disturbance in our Indian Empire, an assurance that conveyed anything but the impression that ought to have been conveyed after what was now known to have occurred at that period. The same impression was, he added, conveyed to the House of Commons. The House had, however, been relieved of a great responsibility in consequence of the course that had been pursued, the entire responsibility for what had been done resting with the Government. Mr. Gladstone, in view of the announcement that the question of the policy of the Government would be opened up hereafter, would not follow the noble Lord over the ground he had traversed, but he was anxious that no misapprehension should be created as to the meaning of one part of the Address. He referred to the passage which regretted that the hostility manifested by Shere Ali and the manner in which he had repulsed her Majesty's friendly Mission had left no alternative but that which had been adopted. He hoped the Government would insert words in the Address setting forth that, while the Speech of her Majesty was accepted by the House, it expressed no opinion on the question raised by the paragraph referred to. He also regretted the omission of any reference to the question of the settlement of the Greek frontier. He trusted that when the resolution as to defraying the charges of the Afghan war came on the fullest information would be given as to what those charges were. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was willing to leave it to the Speaker to decide whether any of the expressions used in the Address, which certainly had been printed with the view of obviating controversy, could be improved by some slight verbal amendment. With regard to South Africa, there was nothing in the reports that had been received from Sir Bartle Frere which rendered it necessary to make special reference to that subject in the Queen's Speech. As to Roumelia, a rectification of frontier, as recommended by the Berlin Treaty, had been made; but he was not in a position to go further into that matter at present. The reforms proposed for the Island of Crete were expected to give satisfaction, and the suggested reforms in Asia Minor were making progress, but he was not yet in a position to present papers on the subject. He hoped before long to lay papers relative to Cyprus on the table, and he added that there was no reason to suppose that that island would prove to be the burden which some were disposed to anticipate. With regard to the Afghan Question, he thought that undue importance had been given to one portion of Lord Cranbrook's despatch. It certainly had appeared to her Majesty's Government that the late Government had overruled Lord Northbrook in his proposed policy; but Lord Northbrook had denied that this was so, and probably he and the members of the then Government knew best what was the meaning of their communications with each other. He denied the imputation that the Government had been actuated by a desire to pick a quarrel with the Ameer. On the contrary, it had always been their desire to live on amicable terms with the Ameer. They had had no desire to increase their territory, but what they had felt it necessary to do was to provide for the security of India; and when they saw that a Russian mission had been received at Cabul while one from England was refused, it was impossible for them to regard that as consistent with their idea of security or to sit inactive under such a state of things. He trusted that the present struggle would be of short duration, and from what they now knew there were hopes that such would be the case; but he wished it to be distinctly understood that while the Government joined in deprecating the necessity of the struggle which had been forced on them they held it to be their duty not only to themselves, but to the people of India generally, not to permit the existence of so dangerous a state of things as that which had led to this war. Sir C. Dilke pointed out that last Session, while the Prime Minister was assuring the House that there was nothing to fear from the advance of Russia in Asia, he had in his pocket the letter of General Kauffmann which had led to all the subsequent complications. Some further discussion ensued, when Mr. E. Stanhope proposed, in order to meet the objection raised by Mr. Gladstone to the wording of a portion of the Address, to move to omit the words "to express our regret," in order to insert the words, "Humbly to thank her Majesty for informing us." The amendment was at once put and agreed to, and the Address was assented to.

The Church of St. John the Evangelist, Upper Maze-hill, St. Leonards-on-Sea, was destroyed by fire early on Sunday.

It is stated in Wednesday's City Press that, according to the municipal voting-lists for the ensuing year, which were made up on the previous day, there are upwards of 21,350 voters on the lists of the twenty-six wards of the City, being an increase of about 300 on the lists of last year.

The Loch Fyne, chartered by Sir Arthur Blyth, K.C.M.G., Agent-General for South Australia, left the Clyde on 29th ult. for Port Adelaide, with 436 Scotch emigrants, among whom were 173 single female domestic servants.—The following telegram was received at Lloyd's on Tuesday morning from Wellington, New Zealand:—"The Southminster has been wrecked at Cape Campbell. Passengers, crew, and mails saved. The vessel it is expected will become a total wreck and her cargo be lost. She had part of her inward cargo on board. Cape Campbell is the north-east extreme of the Middle Island." The Southminster is a British ship, and sailed from New York on May 14 for Otago, N.Z., arrived at Otago on Sept. 2, and sailed for Lyttelton on Oct. 7.

The Extra Supplement.

SHIPPING GUNS AT WOOLWICH.

The operation of putting guns on board one of the barges lying at the Royal Arsenal pier for conveyance to the ship, probably at Chatham or Sheerness, which is to carry them to India for the Artillery service in Afghanistan or elsewhere, forms the subject of our Extra Supplement Large Engraving. This is a familiar scene to those who are in the habit of visiting the great national factory of military armament and ammunition at Woolwich; but it may possess a greater degree of interest at the present time, when Parliament is again called upon to vote public money for purposes of war. Our readers have frequently been presented with Illustrations of various branches of manufacture carried on in Woolwich Arsenal, and of successive improvements in the construction of artillery, both for land and sea service.

AN ALGERINE STORY-TELLER.

The native Moslem population of Algiers is considerably mixed, but we believe it still contains a good proportion of the Arab or Saracen race element; and it need scarcely be remarked that the love of entertaining fiction and the talent of inventing marvellous or humorous narratives have in all ages been characteristic of their lively Oriental temperament. Learned students of philological and literary antiquities have borne testimony to the abundant share which Arab genius has long since contributed to the "folk-lore" and the romantic poetry of Southern and Western Europe. The Italian, Spanish, and Provençal story-tellers of the Middle Ages, the composers of innumerable tales in heroic verse, and the ballad-makers and dramatists who came after them in France and England, were much more indebted to the Arabs than they could ever be aware. We should not be at all surprised, if we were enabled to listen to this energetic declaimer of a popular legend, and to understand the richly expressive language in which he speaks, that the subject of his animated discourse should turn out identical with some of the nursery tales which amused our English infancy, or perhaps with some droll piece of social comedy, treated by our Chaucer or Shakspeare in a different style. The stock of really original plots for narratives of fiction is smaller than any one would think: and the ground idea of a striking dramatic incident or situation has often been transferred, perhaps unconsciously, to stories which have little or no superficial resemblance. But the Algerine story-teller and his delighted audience must be left to their own harmless pleasure, which is quite equal to that of reading most of our three-volume novels, and has the advantage of being enjoyed in company, and in the open air.

RUINED CHURCHES OF ASIA MINOR.

The reader who feels an interest in the proceedings of the "Society of Biblical Archæology," or in any studies of ecclesiastical and Scriptural antiquities in the East, will regard with favour Mr. W. Simpson's Sketches of the remains of ancient Christian buildings at Ephesus and Philadelphia, two of the memorable Seven Churches mentioned in the Book of Revelations. Ephesus, which occupies such an important place in the life and Epistles of St. Paul, and which was one of the greatest and wealthiest of the renowned Greek commercial cities on the western coast of Asia Minor under the Roman Empire, has frequently been made the subject of our Illustrations. There is no historical reason for doubting the Catholic tradition of its having been the residence of St. John during many years of his old age; but the hill, somewhat detached from the actual site of the ancient city, which still bears the name of Ayasolouk from a corruption of the two words "hagios," and "theologos," cannot be declared with certainty to have been the exact locality of his abode, or of his pastoral instructions to the "fathers," the "young men," and the "little children," whom he addresses with such tender earnestness in the first of his letters now extant. It has been conjectured, indeed, that there was another presbyter, of the same name with the Apostle, dwelling and teaching at Ephesus in the earliest age of the Church; and this revered Father may possibly have been the "hagios theologos," or "Holy Divine," commemorated in the name of the place where he perhaps had conducted the evangelical service of his day. The building of which some remains are shown in our Illustration belongs to a late period of the Byzantine Empire, but it is not improbable that it may have been erected upon the site of a school or synagogue where the Presbyter John, or even the beloved Apostle, had preached the Gospel in the first century. We turn next to the site of Philadelphia, which was a city in the province of Lydia, twenty-eight miles south-east from Sardis, and is now a Turkish town called Allah-Shehr. Its beautiful Greek name of "Philadelphia" was not, like that of the American city on the Delaware, which rose from the benevolent enterprise of William Penn, intended to celebrate the principle of "Brotherly Love." Peace has her victories, and so has War. Attalus Philadelphus, the Macedonian King of Pergamos, was the founder of this Greco-Asiatic city, and its name was a memorial of his political ambition, as those of Antioch, Seleucia, and Alexandria were designed to reflect perpetual honour upon the leaders of military conquest in the Eastern world.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Rain continued to fall in the most persistent manner up to the close of the Croydon Meeting last week, and the attendance on the chief day was by far the smallest ever seen at Woodside upon a similar occasion. Boniface won a weight-for-age hurdle-race from two poor opponents; and Gwendoline, who showed such capital form on the flat last season, also took very kindly to jumping. The withdrawal of Shifnal within a couple of hours of the time fixed for the race reduced the field for the Great Metropolitan Steeplechase to seven, every one of whom were backed with more or less freedom. At last Wild Monarch (11 st. 12 lb.), the top weight, had a slight call of the clever Irish four-year-old Bacchus (10 st. 8 lb.), and Citizen (11 st. 3 lb.) retired to 6 to 1. About a mile from home Bacchus, who fenced throughout in magnificent style, appeared to have the race in hand; but Fleming, who rode him, was utterly ignorant of the course, and, after going out of his way to jump an entirely superfluous flight of hurdles, he pulled up under the erroneous impression that he would be disqualified if he came in first. After this, Sleight of Hand (10 st. 4 lb.) looked as well as anything, until he fell at the last fence, owing to the fearfully heavy state of the ground. This mishap left Royal Oak II. (10 st. 5 lb.) with the command, which he retained till within the distance, where Citizen went by, and beat him cleverly by a length; Wild Monarch was a very poor third.

More fortunate than Croydon, the Sandown Meeting was favoured with two fine, though very cold, days, and, consequently, there was a fair attendance of spectators on both Tuesday and Wednesday last. The sandy nature of the soil is very little affected by wet weather, so the "going" was far better than might have been anticipated. On the first day Quits, the champion hunter, scored his eleventh victory this year. There was no Hampton in the Great Maiden Hurdle-Race, though Lady Mostyn will be remembered as a crack two-year-old. At present, however, she is apparently a complete novice at jumping, and the favourite, Blue Ruin, had an easy task. Chimney Sweep (10 st. 10 lb.) essayed a second victory in the Prince of Wales's Steeplechase; but the veteran at last seems to be feeling the effects of age, and Quibble (10 st. 8 lb.) defeated him by six lengths. The first race on Wednesday led to unpleasant results, as Extinguisher and King Sweep ran so entirely differently from what they had done on the previous day that Mr. Barnes, who rode the former on Tuesday, was suspended by the stewards for the remainder of the meeting, and has to appear before the Grand National Hunt Committee on Monday. On the strength of the form that he exhibited at Croydon, Sleight of Hand (10 st. 2 lb.) started a hot favourite for the Great Sandown Steeplechase. Five of the other seven runners were also backed at varying prices. The Bear (10 st. 6 lb.) fell at the first fence, as he invariably does when he tries to jump in public; and Sleight of Hand seemed completely outpaced from the start. Citizen (12 st. 2 lb.) ran exceedingly well under his 14 lb. penalty, and when he was done with, his stable companion, Marshal Niel (10 st. 1 lb.), proved fully equal to disposing of Chilblain (10 st. 8 lb.), and winning cleverly by a couple of lengths.

Turf statistics continue to pour in apace, and one of the most interesting of the series is that which treats of the amounts won by different owners during the season. For the fourth time in the last five years Lord Falmouth is at the head of the poll, and this year his select stable has been more profitable than ever, thirteen animals having carried off thirty-six races of the value of £37,681, which is the largest sum ever won by one owner during a season. Of course, Jannette is the chief contributor to this splendid total, and the unbeaten Wheel of Fortune has seconded her gallantly. Thanks mainly to Sefton, Mr. Craufurd throws in for £17,450; and Pilgrimage has enabled Lord Lonsdale to run a very good third with £14,520. The Duke of Hamilton (£10,880) is the only other owner whose winnings have reached five figures, though Mr. Gretton (£9969) and Count Lagrange (£9872) only just missed being included in the list. Messrs. Peck (£6259) and T. Jennings (£5470) are far in advance of any other trainers who run horses on their own account.

Coursing men assembled in strong force at the Brigg Open Meeting last week, where, thanks to the care with which Sir John Astley preserves the hares, three capital days' sport were enjoyed. Sir John and Lady Astley were present on each day, and entertained all comers in most hospitable style. For the second year in succession the Astley Cup went to Mr. Swinburne's Queen Sybil, by Atlas—Syllabub, who beat the luckless Myosotis, by Blackburn—Miriam, in the final spin. The latter was leading by three lengths for the first turn when she fell heavily at a drain, and never had another chance. We understand that Mr. Swinburne will be represented by Skipworth in the Waterloo Cup, and, if he is really superior to Queen Sybil, of which we have grave doubts, he will be dangerous indeed. The Elsham Stakes, for dog puppies, was divided between Darsteller, by Darcarolle—High Tower, and Harold, by Love Apple—Lady Mordaunt; and the Worlaby Stakes, for puppies of the opposite sex, was also divided between Certificate, by Creditor—Camp Follower, and Silver Hill, by Farrier—Cerito. It is almost unnecessary to add that Mr. Hedley's judging gave universal satisfaction. Except in two or three of the trials on the first day, hares ran well and strongly.

On Friday week the annual assault-of-arms given by the London Athletic Club came off at St. James's Hall. Unfortunately, it is almost impossible to introduce any novelty at these exhibitions; nevertheless, the sparring, fencing, gymnastics, &c., seemed to give the greatest satisfaction to a large and enthusiastic audience. The Winter Meeting of the same club took place at Stamford-bridge on the following day. The antagonism of H. Crossley and H. H. Sturt for the Quartet Mile Challenge Cup held by the former, excited great interest, and Sturt achieved a very popular victory in 52 4-5ths sec., the terribly heavy state of the path rendering really fast time quite out of the question. The remainder of the programme did not prove particularly interesting.

CHRISTMAS ANNUALS.

Among the numerous Christmas Annuals issued this year The Mistletoe Bough claims priority as having been the first in the field, as well as being edited by a lady. There are eighteen sprigs to the bough, some of them blossoming into poetry, and all, judging from the ones inspected, richly laden with fruit. To drop metaphor, the tales and sketches contained in this annual are of a varied nature, to please all tastes. The names of the writers are not given, but it is a sufficient guarantee of the stories' merit that they bear the sign-manual of Miss Braddon's approval. This volume is a good shilling's-worth, both as regards quality and quantity. Routledge's Annual, which also bears a lady's signature, consists of one story, "The Disappearance of Mr. Jeremiah Redworth," in which the author, Mrs. Riddell, enchains the reader in breathless attention. To say that the tale is by the author of "George Geith" is sufficient recommendation. The Belgravia Annual opens well with "A Shocking Story," by Wilkie Collins; and the succeeding stories, by other writers, sustain the interest to the close. A charming variety of prose and poetry awaits the reader of the Christmas Number of London Society; while the Round Table, published by Chapman and Hall, boasts a goodly list of contributors. All the above annuals are illustrated, the engravings of the last named being especially good. Then we have Francillon's Christmas Number, entitled "Mixed with Magic," in seven spells; Our Christmas Annual, published by Burns and Oates, with a vigorously-written tale, "Little Dorinda," by Percy Fitzgerald; the Gentleman's Annual, containing a tale by Albany Fonblanque, named "Filthy Lucre: a Story without a Crime;" Mr. Moxon's Annual, "The Mystery of Mostyn Manor," by Arthur A Beckett; the extra Christmas Number of All the Year Round, with a tale, "'Twas in Trafalgar Bay," by Messrs. Besant and Rice; Good Cheer, the Christmas Number of Good Words, adorned with contributions from Anthony Trollope, Sarah Tytler, and another; and the Quiver Extra Number, bearing the quaint title The Arrows of the Bow, with tales by Edward Garrett and others. Among the Comic Annuals are Judy's, edited by Charles H. Ross; Hood's, edited by the brothers Dalziel; and Funny Folks'—all brimful of comic sketches and comicalities in prose and verse.

The Calcutta correspondent of the Times says that further accounts regarding the Wynaad quartz reefs bear out the favourable anticipations entertained. There seems little doubt that they contain gold in paying quantities, if the working of them were seriously taken in hand.

SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

The winter exhibitions of so-called "sketches and studies" at Pall-mall East now differ little from the summer displays, except that the works in the latter are generally of rather more importance. Many of the contributors do, however, take us into their confidence regarding the direction of their studies and the situation of their sketching grounds. And these secondary exhibitions acquire peculiar interest when, as now, we see several of the members breaking new ground or striking into fresh paths. We only, however, by reverting a year or two in memory fully realise that the transitional condition in which such a society must ever be has passed and is passing from a chronic into an acute state of change. During that period a large number of new Associates have been elected, and several old favourites are now no more, alas! or very little, seen. Of the new-comers, nearly all affect high finish in figures, or a neutral scale of colour in landscape. Few seem to gladly enjoy the brightness, beauty, and infinite variety of Nature like Turner; few seem to seek for the floral and gem-like preciousness of her colour as did William Hunt. We cannot help regarding this as an unfavourable sign. Since water colour cannot compete with oil in rendering depth of shadow, it should make the most of the distinctive and unrivalled facilities it affords for expressing colour and light. A water colour should be conceived primarily in colour. Still more should a sketch be so; for to support subsequent operations the hues and tints must be laid with purity and decision. We should be the last to recommend the taste of much that was done by Fortuny, yet it was through aiming at pure colour for its own sake in his drawings even more than his pictures that he has had such an extraordinary influence on the schools of Italy, France, and Spain. Fortuny, notwithstanding his exaggerations, was a discoverer as a colourist and an inventor as an executant. His works have given a new and delightful æsthetic sensation. By preserving the purity and "distinction" of even the cold colours, such as cobalt and emerald green, without the old masters' alloy of yellow, and harmonising them by contrasts (as Nature herself does), he achieved what even the Venetians failed to accomplish. Some secrets of Japanese colouring lie in the same direction. Such purity and truth are the first requisites of a water-colour, but pre-eminently of a sketch; and we commend the subject to the members of the leading Water-Colour Society of this country, if they would not see themselves overtaken by foreign artists, since these are everywhere turning their attention to aquarelle.

The recent Associates mostly follow in the track of Frederick Walker, like Messrs. Tom Lloyd and T. Parker, and Mrs. Allingham; or, at least, elaborate with the point of the pencil rather than work in frank transparent tints—like Messrs. Hopkins, Norman Tayler, and E. K. Johnson. Mr. Lloyd's group of a girl reading to an elderly lady in a rustic seat is rather lost amidst the mass of autumnal foliage, but it has much refinement and promise. So, too, has Mrs. Allingham's studies of farms and cottages nestling among trees; and her "Mowing" (355) and study of "A Grey Sea" (360), two gems on a screen. Similar praise is due to Mr. Parker's contributions, particularly to (388) the dainty rustic maiden wringing out clothes, with a fawn lying beneath the washtub—though Cinderella could scarcely wear such diminutive high-heeled shoes. "A Breeze on Shore" (192) by Mr. A. Hopkins, has similar and high merit. The title must not be supposed to refer exclusively to the meteorological condition, though the scene is the seashore; it relates chiefly to a little tiff, delicately suggested, between a young fisherman and his wife—the former holding the baby. We can only object that the good-looking husband and pretty wife have an air a little above their station. We encounter almost a gentleman and lady again in Mr. Norman Tayler's couple of drawings (228 and 9), where the shepherd swain first greets the pretty water-carrier, and then passes as "A Willing Slave" at once under her yoke and that of her water-pails. We fear Mr. E. K. Johnson paints too much, his eight contributions being unequal in quality. We like least the large drawing (13) representing a young lady finding employment in a garden gathering flowers, in anticipation—or, should we say, unconscious?—of the approach of one whose arrival is heralded by some sporting dogs. This is somewhat hard and "edgy." But the same fault is much less apparent in smaller drawings of a girl plucking a rose (148), and "Skipping" (77), where the action and the painting of the white dress are excellent. Mr. Birket Foster might seem to have been thinking of Frederick Walker, when painting "The Fruit-Stall" (379) in the market at the foot of the Rialto, Venice; if not also when so carefully delineating the architecture of "Rouen Cathedral" (350), in which, however, the ancient pile has a "restored" aspect, to the sacrifice of its venerableness. Mr. Foster's work has most undeniable prettiness, but just misses the true artistic exquisiteness which should come with and justify such apparently laborious stippling.

In the category of works that appear to indicate the preference for a neutral scale of colour, if not a tendency to blackness and heaviness, may be placed Mr. W. E. Lockhart's forcible but rather blackish view in Lasgo, Fifeshire, "The Birthplace of Robinson Crusoe" (36); the "Lever's Water" (58) and other landscapes, by Mr. Cuthbert Rigby, the modest truthfulness of which is accompanied by an inclination to purplish opacity; Mr. H. Moore's vigorous "Storm Clouds" (346); Mr. F. Powell's view on a Scotch loch (317), with a steamer leaving its trail of black smoke in the thick haze—very true within its intention; Mr. Buckman's nicely-felt moonrise at "Kingsdown, near Deal" (11); Mr. Hale's "Pallanza, Lago Maggiore—Sunset" (122), in which, however, the colouring is as beautiful as it is pearly and melting, though the texture is rather "woolly;" Mr. Marsh's gruesome "Sea Cave at Dunluce, Ireland" (67), with the reflected spectral light of the cavern that illumines a party of ghostly tourists enveloped in ulsters contrasted against the golden sunlight at the entrance—but whence comes this electric lighting, and why paint so ugly a subject? and Mr. J. D. Watson's quaint "Rivals" (247)—i.e., a jester (by-the-way, a young gentleman disguised) in motley Mediæval suit, with cap, bells, and bauble, and a monkey, the latter occupying the chair of the master of both, to whom, that is, the monkey, the jester is making a mock obeisance. This is a drawing of some importance, but not free from heaviness; and, on the whole, we think "The Bathers' Pool" (164) preferable. Surely Mr. Marks has painted a rather sorry farce in "Wine and Water" (302), with a youth in costume, of no date, if not Mediæval, holding a champagne bottle, and a damsel crowned with water-lilies, bearing a bull-rush in one hand, and in the other—equally emblematical, certainly—a tap, such as the watermen put into the plug-holes in hard frosty weather. And what a curious absence of colour of the artistic kind is there in this "decorative design!"

Mr. Henry Wallis has often proved himself a colourist approaching the Venetian standard, and there is evidence of the fact here in his view of a favourite haunt of several of our poets, "Between Hampstead and Highgate" (68), bathed in golden summer after-glow. But his principal drawing, "A Sextett during the Terror" (90), which occupies a post of honour, is a study of effect, merely in coloured, but mainly black, chalks. To paint a picture of the subject an additional study for the colour would be desirable. Otherwise there is great merit in this composition of amateur instrumentalists (as were some of the most blood-thirsty terrorists), playing so heedlessly, while the frequent clank and thud of the guillotine might be heard not far off—fiddling away, like Nero while Rome was burning. The important gestures of the first and second violin as they sway to the time are cleverly suggested; very good, also, is the management of the lighting from the large casement, through which we see the towers of Notre-Dame and the picturesque spires and house-tops of Old Paris in the Cité. Mr. Walter Duncan evinces a healthy relish for colour in his buff-jerkined Cromwellian troopers (130 and 141); but they rather recall lusty braggarts of the Sir Hudibras type than Cromwell's self-mortifying iron-sides. Several small Venetian views of Miss Clara Montalba show that the young artist possesses a rare colourist instinct, which imparts to all she does the dignity of style; she has, however, yet to learn to subordinate that instinct to the facts of nature—not by any means to suppress it. Mr. Albert Goodwin has exchanged his usually rather vague treatment for more positive realisation in "Dartmoor" (19), all ablaze with golden gorse alternated with heather in its full bloom of crimson. Mr. E. A. Goodall and Mr. P. W. Brierly send fruits of a recent sojourn, in company, at Venice, and both appear to have gained as colourists by the trip. Mr. Goodall was at home at Venice, yet his "On the Laguna" (242) strikes us as stronger and fresher than former studies from the same locality; whilst among his Egyptian subjects we do not remember one possessing the full, deep tone of the "Evening Effect" (213) in the Nile Valley, with the sunset sky reflected in the still pools of the subsiding inundation and a sunbeam lingering on the apex of a distant pyramid. The advantage of sketching at Venice to Mr. Brierly is most marked. Always the artist has been esteemed as a trustworthy and skilful, if somewhat matter-of-fact, painter of shipping; but the butterfly hues of the Venetian bragozzi and the dreamlike loveliness of the city as she lies moored in the Adriatic, like her own gilded Bucentoro, reflecting the ever-varying effects of her changeful climate, seem to have awakened in him a new sense of colour; and we were not at all prepared for the sweetness and beauty of his studies, "Abreast of the Riva dei Schiavoni" (255), "San Pietro di Castello" (95), and "Murano" (287). In no artist's works, however do we observe so complete a change of style as in those of Mr. Thorne Waite, if we should accept his "Out-Door" studies (106 and 118) here as indicating what may be looked for in his finished drawings. The works he exhibited two years back, however poetical, were decidedly conventional and vapid: they had nothing in common with such a powerful direct transcript from nature as the "Valley of the Arun" (159); or "Amberley Church, Sussex" (303), with its poetic twilight effect—a small drawing on the first screen—than which, as combining vigour with delicacy, there is nothing finer in the gallery.

Having given what we deem to be most of the "news," so to speak, of the exhibition, we would gladly dwell, had we space, on the evidences of improved or continued good form in the contributions of Mr. A. P. Newton—Scotch lake and river subjects; Mr. S. Read—now, in this gallery, almost the sole, and certainly a very worthy representative of architectural work—see his "Chapel in the Cathedral of St. Gudule, Brussels" (72); Mr. C. Davidson—landscapes; Mr. D. Cox, jun.—Welsh scenes about his father's haunts; S. P. Jackson—landscapes, river, and coast scenes; Mr. A. Glennie—views of Florence and nearer home; Mr. Alfred Fripp—"Star Hole, Lulworth, Dorsetshire" (177); Mr. E. F. Brewtnall—"The Spring" (259); Mr. E. Radford—"A Penny for Your Thoughts" (132); and the scenes at home and abroad by Messrs. Naftel, T. Danby, G. H. Andrews, Collingwood Smith, T. M. Richardson, Walter Goodall, J. J. Jenkins, H. P. Rivière, and T. O. Richardson. Nor is the animal department less adequately represented by the admirable draughtsmanship, the full yet fresh colouring, and the masterly execution of Mr. Otto Weber's pastorals; by the sweet soft tone and gentle sentiment of Mr. Brittan Willis's cattle-pieces; by the long-practised skill of hand of Mr. Frederick Tayler, as in "Staghounds" (23), and still more pleasantly in the small drawings on the screens, and in Mr. Basil Bradley's St. Bernard mastiffs (112). But how could we speak in detail of all these works when we have not yet mentioned such maestri—happily their merits are too well known to require comment—as Mr. E. Duncan, whose sober power is not less discernible inland than on the angry seashore; Mr. George Fripp, whose harvest and hay-fields are as perfect in drawing and keeping within their modest limits as ever; Mr. A. W. Hunt, whose "Whitby" (144) and other studies continue to remind us of Turner, though, as must be observed, with increased insubstantiality; Mr. Carl Haag, who even in the comparatively unimportant drawing of a caravan approaching "The Ancient Bridge of Smyrna" (136) gives us a taste of his quality; and—last, not least, but rather like a king closing a procession—the President, Sir John Gilbert, who is not only at his best, but is seen to especial advantage in the guise of semi-sketches. It is most exhilarating to come from much in this collection that is finical and timid to the Old-Master-like grande manière, the robust exuberance, and wealth of tone in this "Night March" (164) of fifteenth-century chivalry, casque and corslet flashing back the flare of the flambeaux, or glimmering in the moon-glint; or these most effective compositions of picturesque figures and landscape "The Return Home—Wind and Rain" (198), "Prisoners—October Evening" (31), and Don Quixote declaiming to Sancho Panza in the wood (338). Here we have colour giving up not a whit of its value as it grows in depth. Beyond all to be noted is the fine balance between the generally warm, broken hues of the figures, the tertiary citrates and russets of the landscapes, and the cool greys of the skies.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

This society has been of essential service to many a young artist, and its exhibitions gain rather than lose by the forced reduction of the number of works hung, since its removal to more limited quarters in Conduit-street. But, though it has our best wishes, we cannot ignore the fact that in this present winter gathering are still to be seen various forms of tasteless, untaught incompetency, and painty vulgarity in much larger proportion than can be found elsewhere. There are, nevertheless, several pictures which deserve mention for assured merit, and many more which seem to present promise, though scarcely any are sufficiently representative to demand criticism within our very restricted space. We have marked for approval more or less qualified the following:—"A Stirring Event in the Village," by A. Ludovici; "Going to Market—West Coast of Ireland," looking on the sea, by W. H. Bartlett—luminous, full of emphatic colour: a work of conspicuous promise by a very young painter. "Sunset on the Thames," one of several agreeable landscapes by G. S. Walters. "A Labour of Love," a monk carving a crucifix, by L. C. Henley. "A Legend," by Miss B. Meyer—one of the most curious pictures we have ever beheld: scene, an open place in a Flemish town; date, fourteenth century; a group of figures before a reciting monk, other groups about a fountain, and a mender or maker of pottery; the peculiarities of Leys greatly intensified in the characterisation of the figures and the unnaturally sombre tone; withal presenting unmistakable evidences of invention and capacity. "Hay Time," by J. E. Grace; "A Scheveningen Fisherwoman," by E. Hume; "The Splügen Pass," by H. Goodwin; "The Bazaar, Cairo," by P. Pavy; "The Wine-Bearer," by H. T. Schafer; "Flowers," by W. J. Muckley; "Mid-Afternoon," by D. Farquharson; "Words of Comfort," by J. Lobley; "The Haunt of the Sea Nymphs," by A. J. Woolmer—in which, as usual, we see the evidence of the wherewithal to have made a fine painter wasted on studio fabrications of phantasmagoric unrealities; "Pets," by J. Morgan; "Langstrath, Borrowdale," by J. Peel—the greens too blackish, otherwise very good; "A Highland Home," by Haynes King; "Indecision," by H. Caffieri; a female figure watching "Gold Fish," by R. J. Gordon; "Rural Belles, Black Forest," by C. Baucrle; "Oat Harvest," by J. Clayton Adams; "Vale of the Conway, North Wales," by A. B. Collier; "Croquet," by E. Hughes—noticeable for its painstaking, but painfully hard; "Fire in a Dutch Village, Moonlight," by F. W. Meyer; "A Storm Cloud," by B. Evans; "The Doone Valley, Exmoor," by Sidney Hodges. Also contributions by H. B. Jones, G. E. Hicks, G. Grey, Y. King, J. Finnie, J. W. B. Knight, J. Hayllar, T. O. Hume, G. de Breanski, E. J. Cobbett, C. Smith, and W. D. Sadler. There are likewise a few water-colour drawings of merit.

The private view of the Winter Exhibition of the Institute of Painters in Water Colours takes place to-day (Saturday). The gallery opens to the public on Monday next.

English artists are invited to contribute to the International Exhibition of Fine Arts that is to be held at Munich next year from July 1 till Oct. 31. Medals are to be awarded.

The remains of the late George Cruikshank were removed yesterday week from Kensal-green Cemetery to their final resting-place in St. Paul's Cathedral—the repairs which the crypt was undergoing at the time of the lamented artist's death having been completed.

The prizes gained by the City and Spitalfields School of Art were distributed on Friday of last week by Viscount Enfield.

An Art-Loan Exhibition will be held in Kilmarnock next year in aid of the fund being raised for the Burns monument.

The sixth annual exhibition of the Glasgow Art Club, consisting of 167 paintings, of which report speaks favourably, is now open.

M. Clésinger, the sculptor, has executed and presented to M. Gambetta a terra-cotta reduction of the statue of the Republic which adorned the terrace of the Champ de Mars.

Monteverde's sculpture, "Jenner vaccinating his Son," which attracted so much notice at the Exhibition, has been brought by the Duchess of Galliera for a hospital which she has founded at Genoa.

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Mdlle. Ambre made her third appearance here on Thursday week, when the opera of "Faust" introduced her in a new character. As Margherita, she acted with much earnestness and dramatic feeling, in some points with marked originality of conception. This was particularly evident in the cathedral scene, at the close of which the artist gave a powerful representation of the horror of the repentant girl, when her prayers and penitence are mocked by the taunts of the fiend following her even to the cathedral. The effect produced by Mdlle. Ambre's simulation of temporary madness in lieu of the conventional sudden shriek and fall, was very impressive. A severe cold, for which a printed apology was issued, somewhat interfered with the lady's vocal performance, in spite of which, however, the intelligent artist was apparent throughout.

On Tuesday Mdlle. Ambre appeared for the fourth time, it having been the first occasion here of her sustaining the character of Gilda in "Rigoletto," in which she both acted and sung with good effect, particularly in the great scene with her father, the unhappy Jester, in the palace of the Duke. Some traces of her recent indisposition were still occasionally observable, but the performance of Mdlle. Ambre was nevertheless artistic throughout. Signor Mendioroz was a very efficient representative of Rigoletto, the Court Jester; and the cast was otherwise good, having included Miss Purdy (Maddalena), Signor Runcio (the Duke), and Herr Behrens (Sparafucile).

The specialty of the week, indeed of the season, will be the performance of Weber's "Oberon," for the first time for fourteen years, announced for this (Saturday) evening. Next week will be the last but one of the present series of performances.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The concert of last Saturday derived a special interest from the performance of one of the late Hector Berlioz's most important works, his orchestral symphony entitled "Harold en Italie," in which the composer is understood to have embodied his own impressions received on his visit there in 1830. It was performed, under the composer's direction, at the last New Philharmonic concert of the season of 1855; since when, we believe, it had not been heard entire in this country until revived by Mr. Charles Hallé at Liverpool and Manchester early in the present year.

The death of the composer took place in 1869, and from that time his music has been largely ignored here, the chief exception being in the case of the Crystal Palace, where several of his overtures and the March Hongroise from the "Faust" cantata, and that from the "Harold" symphony, have been given on different occasions. Of one of his most important works, "La Damnation de Faust," we spoke a few months ago, in reference to its performance at Her Majesty's Theatre, at a concert given there by M. Pasdeloup, of Paris.

Whether Berlioz will retain the high position accorded him by some of his contemporaries, who styled him the "French Beethoven," is open to doubt, but that he was a remarkable man, both as a didactic and critical writer and as a composer, admits of no question; and some of his music deserves occasional revival, both for its own sake and as illustrative of its school and period.

The "Harold" symphony belongs to the class of compositions known as "programme music," in which a series of movements is intended to express certain incidents or sentiments indicated at the head of each division. A prominent feature in the symphony is the obbligato part for viola, which is intended to represent—in the words of the composer—"a kind of pensive dreamer, after the model of Byron's 'Childe Harold,' amid the poetic scenes with which my wanderings in the Abruzzi has furnished my memory."

Amidst much that is wild and eccentric—as in all Berlioz's music—there are many portions of the "Harold" symphony that are impressive and beautiful. The opening movement, entitled "Harold in the Mountains—Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness, and Joy," is very expressive of contemplative sadness, and the transition to genial gladness. The following "March and Evening Prayer of Pilgrims" has always been the favourite portion of the symphony, and narrowly escaped being encored on Saturday. It is highly picturesque in subject and treatment, a special effect being obtained by the reiteration of a dissonant note representing the convent bell, and gradually dying away in the distance. The realisation of the prolonged diminuendo by the orchestra on Saturday was truly admirable. Part 3, "Serenade—the Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his Beloved," is full of melodic beauty of a pastoral kind; the finale, "Orgie of Brigands—Reminiscences of the preceding scenes" being in Berlioz's wildest manner, chiefly a series of uncouth and incoherent noises, thus leaving a disagreeable impression at the close of a work containing much that is highly interesting. As already indicated, the orchestral playing, under Mr. Manns's direction, was excellent, special praise being due to Herr Straus for his fine interpretation of the difficult solo part for the viola, which is frequently prominent throughout the symphony. The remainder of Saturday's programme consisted of Agatha's cavatina from "Der Freischütz," well sung by Mrs. Osgood; "Brahms's "Song of Destiny," for orchestra and chorus; and Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm.

Mdlle. Janotha was the pianist at this week's Monday Popular Concert, at which she played, with great effect, Beethoven's thirty-two variations on a theme in C minor; and, for the encore, a mazurka of Chopin—besides which the lady sustained the pianoforte part of Brahms's quartet in A. A string quartet of Spohr's, in the same key (op. 93), was introduced for the first time. It is a composition in the brilliant style, intended specially to display the principal violinist of the party, in this instance Madame Norman-Néruda, whose playing was admirable in execution and finish. Mdlle. Redeker sang arias by Giordani and Stradella, and songs by Henschel and Jensen, with much expression and refinement. Mr. Zerbini was the accompanist.

The fifth of the present series of Mr. John Boosey's London Ballad Concerts took place on Wednesday, with a programme of the usual attractive and varied character—the fourth of the Saturday evening concerts, similar in character, being announced for to-night (Saturday).

The third and last of Mr. J. S. Shedlock's third series of "Musical Evenings" took place, in the concert room of the Royal Academy of Music, on Wednesday, when the first part of the programme consisted of pieces by Chopin; the sonata for piano and violoncello, a "Nocturne" transcribed for violin solo by Herr Wilhelmj, and three pianoforte solos.

The first concert of the South London Choral Association at St. James's Hall took place yesterday (Friday) evening, with a miscellaneous selection of solo and choral pieces.

The week's performance of English opera at Covent Garden Theatre, announced by Mr. S. Hayes, are to begin this (Saturday) evening with "Maritana," followed by "The Waterman," with Mr. Sims Reeves as Tom Tug.

The Royal Society of Musicians voted, at their last monthly meeting, £20 for the Edwin Ellis fund, and £15 15s. for the Wadmore memorial. It will be remembered that Mr. Ellis (violinist and conductor) and Mr. Wadmore (vocalist) died recently, each leaving a family unprovided for.

THEATRES.

Mr. James Albery has distinguished himself in the records of the week as the author of two new pieces produced at two theatres: one on Saturday at the Princess's, and the other on Monday at the Haymarket. We prefer to treat of the latter first, as the more deservedly successful. It is entitled "The Crisis," and is a free adaptation of M. Emile Augier's "Les Fourchambault," which received in Paris a more equivocal reception than the English version of it has in London. Here its acceptance on Monday was instant and complete. This was owing solely to the excellent dialogue which Mr. Albery has supplied, and the general merit of the acting, some of which, indeed, was first-rate. Ahead of all must be cited Miss Louise Moodie as Mrs. Goring, the sufferer from an informal marriage, and yet the benevolent genius of the piece, whose good conduct and judgment so largely conduce to the happy results with which the sympathising audience are finally so thoroughly satisfied. A more finished piece of acting was never presented, and Miss Moodie must be pronounced as having made the part the leading rôle. The next great part, but in an opposite style, is that of Mrs. Denham, to which Mrs. John Wood gave a breadth and a prominence that achieved for it a positive triumph. The dialogue of the character has been most skilfully manipulated for effect, and contains some of the most salient touches of Mr. Albery's wit. Another characteristic part is that of the radical Lord William Whitehead, who seeks in Haidee Burnside a rich match, but pretends the most disinterested affection. Mr. D. Fisher, jun., acted this invidious rôle with his usual skill, and thoroughly indicated the real scoundrelism but specious respectability of the political pretender. Another difficult but effective rendering was that of Mr. W. Terriss in the part of the merchant's son, Fawley Denham, a hypocrite of the first water, in the guise of a polished gentleman; while that of his father was supported with great force by Mr. Howe. But we must not omit to ascribe due credit to Mr. Charles Kelly's John Goring, whose noble conduct saves all parties when "the Crisis" arrives which forms the turning-point of the action. The two interesting ladies whose married happiness is dependent on the necessities of the plot—we mean Blanche Denham and Haidee Burnside—were pleasingly personated by Miss L. Buckstone and Miss Eastlake. The drama commanded the profound attention of the house; the applause throughout being frequent, and in all cases deserved by the brilliancy of the dialogue by which it was evoked.

The piece at the Princess's is the joint production of Mr. Albery and Mr. Joseph Hatton—the latter gentleman, we believe, having furnished the plot, which is of the most rambling kind; and the former the dialogue, which is below the author's usual mark. It is entitled "Number Twenty; or, The Bastille of Calvados," and is got up at considerable cost. The main incident is of a mechanical sort, that of the prisoner's escape over the ramparts and towers of the Bastille. The piece, of course, is not without some merit; but we are not in a position to award it the praise which a drama associated with the name of Mr. Albery ought to deserve, and therefore prefer to abstain from further criticism.

Miss Wallis appeared on Wednesday at Drury Lane for her benefit as Imogen in Shakspeare's romantic drama of "Cymbeline;" Mr. John Ryder appearing as Iachimo, and Mr. Edgar Compton as Posthumus.

Mr. Barry Sullivan, the tragedian, was entertained last Saturday at a national banquet in the Exhibition Palace Dublin—The Lord Mayor of Dublin occupying the chair.

LUTON AND THE STRAW PLAIT INDUSTRY.

The visit of the Prince of Wales to Luton this week is a fitting occasion for us to give some Illustrations of the straw plait manufacture for hats and bonnets, which is carried on chiefly at Luton and Dunstable and in the neighbouring villages. Luton is a pleasant Bedfordshire town, prettily situated amongst the hills, five miles east of Dunstable, about thirty miles north-west of London, and twenty south of Bedford. Its population is less than 20,000. Luton Hoo Park, the residence of Mrs. Gerard Leigh, who has this week entertained his Royal Highness as her guest, is a fine demesne of 1670 acres, well wooded, and of varied surface, laid out by the famous landscape gardener, "Capability Brown," with the river Lea flowing through it, and with a stately house, rebuilt since the fire of 1843, containing a beautiful chapel, ball-room, and other handsome apartments. The town possesses a fine old Gothic church, with transepts, nave, aisles, choir, and chancel, and with a square tower, and containing monuments of historic interest. We give an Illustration of the scene in the Plait Hall. The local manufacture and trade are the subject of a concise statistical memoir, compiled by Mr. T. G. Austin, Superintendent Registrar of the District, and published by Mr. P. O'Doherty, Market-hill, Luton. We also find among the useful and instructive series of little books, called "British Manufacturing Industries," published by Mr. E. Stanford at Charing-cross, and edited by Mr. G. Phillips Bevan, a volume of "Textiles, Clothing, and Sundry Industries," which gives us a good account of straw plait. This peculiar industry, as we learn from Miss Strickland, was imported under the patronage of Mary Queen of Scots from Lorraine into Scotland, and was afterwards transplanted hither by her son James I., or more probably by the Napiers, then owners of Luton Hoo. The straw plait at first made was thick and heavy, being composed of whole straws of common English wheat; and it was in the eighteenth century, by the ingenuity of some French prisoners of war, that the use of split straw was substituted, and a machine was invented for splitting them. Leghorn hats then came into competition with the English straw, till Mr. Thomas Waller, some fifty years ago, found the way to produce the Tuscan grass plait at Luton. He also introduced the Brazilian or palm-leaf hat, which is now made chiefly at St. Albans, and is largely exported to Australia; it is plaited all in one piece from the centre of the crown. English straw plait, though esteemed the best in the world, has of late years suffered greatly from the competition of the Canton or Chinese plait; and, we presume, from the fashion of silk bonnets for ladies' wear. The straw is grown in the adjacent districts, along the northern slopes of the Chiltern Hills, and in some parts of Hertfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, and Berkshire. There are some light wheat soils thereabouts found worth cultivating for the sake of the straw alone, without reckoning the value of the corn. The ears of corn are cut off and laid apart, instead of threshing; the straws, tied in bundles, are then subjected to a course of treatment which was described by Mr. A. J. Tansley, in his lecture to the Society of Arts in 1860. The sheath of each straw is stripped off, and the upper portion is reserved for plaiting, while the root portion is cast away. The operations include those of sorting, cutting into lengths of nine inches, splitting each length into half a dozen strips by drawing it through a tube armed with steel splitters, "milling" the straws under weighty rollers to take out their stiffness, plaiting, clipping off loose ends, "bunching" or dividing the plait into links, steaming it, and bleaching it with sulphur. The plaiting work some years ago was mostly done by little children in the "plait schools," kept by a class of old women in the villages round Luton, whose occupation has been stopped by the Education Act of 1870. An expert workwoman can make forty yards of straw plait in a day of twelve hours, but will only earn 7s. 6d. a week; yet, in the busy season, there are some who come from London to Luton or Dunstable for temporary employment. Others find occupation in sewing hats and bonnets, in bleaching, brushing, dyeing, and other subsidiary work. The straw-cutting forms a distinct branch of the trade, and is carried on in the different villages of the district. The operator first cuts the straw into convenient lengths, removing the knots and the loose sheaths, sorts it by passing it through wire sieves, and does it up into bundles, which are bleached by being exposed to the fumes of sulphur.

The work of making straw plait is carried on in the villages of the whole district from St. Albans to Dunstable. Country folks plait as they sit at their cottage doors in summer or at their firesides in winter, as they walk the village street, tend sheep on the hillsides, or pay a visit to the market town. The next operations are joining the plait, and sewing the plait into hats and bonnets by machine or by hand. (These and the following sketches were made at Messrs. Vyse, Sons, and Co.'s factory at Luton.) The plait, being made in short lengths, is joined together into one long piece for machine sewing, and wound upon a large reel, from which it is supplied to the sewing-machine. The machine shown in the sketch is Vyse, Sons, and Co.'s patent concealed stitch machine, and is driven by steam, the attention of the worker being confined to the guiding of the work. It is only of late that this sewing has been done by machine, and much of the work is still done by hand. Pressing straw hats into shape by hand labour and by machine is also shown. After the plait has been sewn into hats or bonnets, these are stiffened by being passed through a solution of gelatine and dried. As they are somewhat shapeless they are now pressed into shape, either by being pressed by hand with a heavy iron on blocks of the required shape, or by means of machine power. In the latter case heated zinc moulds, of various shapes and sizes, as the demands of fashion require, are used, and, the hat being placed in the mould, heavy pressure is applied from above. In the process of crimping, in addition to pressing the hat into shape, the mould impresses a pattern on to the straw. In the sketch of "crimping," the protuberance shown on the under surface of the upper part of the machine is a part of a bag made of stout indiarubber, and this, when the mould is closed by the upper part of the machine being lowered and securely fastened, fits into the interior of the hat. This bag is then distended by water forced into it by the action of condensed air, and a pressure of many tons thus brought to bear on the hat, which is forced to take the impress of the zinc mould.

It is the intention of the Admiralty (the Standard says) to recall the Black Prince, commanded by his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, to England, to be paid off and put out of commission. His Royal Highness has now been serving afloat since February, 1876.

The following legal appointments in Ireland, consequent on the resignation of Lord Justice Christian and the death of Judge Keogh, have been approved by the Queen:—Mr. Gerald Fitzgibbon, Q.C., to be Lord Justice of Appeal; the Hon. Michael Harrison, Judge of the Court of Bankruptcy, to be a Judge of the Common Pleas Division; Mr. Hugh Holmes, Q.C., to be Solicitor-General for Ireland; and Mr. Serjeant Robinson, Q.C., to be Judge of the Bankruptcy Court.

THE WAR IN THE TRANS-VAAL.

The British military force in South Africa, under the command of General Lord Chelmsford, is engaged in a serious conflict with Sekokuni, the powerful chief of a nation called the Makatees, inhabiting the north-east region of the newly-annexed Trans-Vaal province. This extensive inland territory, situated beyond the Orange River Free State and Natal, is several hundred miles distant from British Kaffraria, which was lately the seat of a Kaffir war, maintained by the Galekas and Gaikas, apparently not at all connected with the present hostilities. There is, however, in the country along the east coast, to the north of our province of Natal, a very important branch of the Zulu nation, ruled by their King Cetewayo (this name is pronounced "Ketchwayo"), whose disposition has recently given alarm to the British colonists. The dangers of a protracted or doubtful war against Sekokuni would be greatly increased by the contingency of his being enabled to form an alliance with Ketchwayo, or by a temporary check to the British arms encouraging the latter to disturb the Natal frontier. These circumstances have induced Lord Chelmsford and Sir Bartle Frere, the Governor of the Cape Colony and of the other British provinces in South Africa, to make urgent applications for military reinforcements. Her Majesty's Government are complying with their request by dispatching above two thousand additional troops, with large quantities of arms and warlike stores, from different ports and arsenals of the United Kingdom. The 99th Regiment sailed this week, part from Gravesend and part from Southampton, and some of the Royal Engineers. The expenses on this account will probably be laid before Parliament within a few days, together with those on account of the Afghan War, in order to justify the required vote of credit. We cannot here narrate the long history of the disputes with Sekokuni, who has always claimed entire independence for himself and his people, and who actually defeated the former Dutch Republican Government of the Trans-Vaal, previously to its annexation by Sir Theophilus Shepstone in 1876. The agricultural and mineral resources of this province would have obtained a prosperous development, and it would have been rendered a desirable field of European settlement, but for the unhappy quarrel with its native neighbour, whom it is now deemed expedient to subdue by a regular war. This is a question of policy and national justice, which Parliament should be invited to discuss, and upon which we do not pretend to offer a definite opinion. The reader who desires to learn something of the facts may be referred to Messrs. S. W. Silver and Co.'s "Handbook of the Trans-Vaal;" also, to a pamphlet by Mr. A. R. Campbell-Johnston, "South Africa, its Difficulties and Present State," published by Effingham Wilson.

A correspondent from Cape Town says:—"The acts of Ketchwayo and the increasing restlessness of the Zulu tribes are the occasion of this state of warlike expectancy. Several of the Zulu regiments have lately been mobilised and marched to the King's head-quarters. Their movements have had the effect of producing a mischievous alarm among the European and native communities in the neighbourhood of his territory. On Oct. 20 large bodies of men were reported to be on the march from the King's Kraal to the Trans-Vaal border; and the German settlement of Lunenberg, the inhabitants of which are in a state of defensive preparation, on the Pongolo river, was threatened to such an extent that the officer commanding at Utrecht thought it advisable to move two companies of the 90th Regiment to that place from Utrecht. The General, Lord Chelmsford, accompanied by Major North Crealock, his military secretary, had just returned to Maritzburg from a fourteen days' ride (370 miles) round the Natal Zulu border when this information was received, and no time was lost in hurrying up five companies of the 90th and two guns to replace those detached from Utrecht, so as to strengthen that part of the border. To meet the collision which may at any moment arise, the General is daily expecting three companies of the Buffs from Mauritius; he will then have only the 13th Light Infantry, the 90th Light Infantry, the second battalion of the 24th, two companies of the first battalion of the 24th, the 80th, and 400 or 500 Mounted Volunteers of Natal, and 200 or less police to meet the 40,000 to 60,000 Zulus, who are the most military of the native tribes of South Africa. There is perfect confidence in the General, but it is felt that the position of our forces will be very much strengthened by the arrival of the two infantry regiments, for which, as already mentioned, application has been made to the War Office."

Meantime, we present two Illustrations of the Trans-Vaal war now going on, from Sketches by Captain Wadely, of the 13th Light Infantry Regiment, taken at Fort Oliphant and on the road to Fort Weber, the latter place being thirty miles from the first-named. The river Oliphant flows northward from Middleburg into the highlands, where it turns eastward to join the Limpopo beyond the British boundary. The fortified camp, lately established on its banks, has a parapet constructed of earth and stone, mixed with brushwood; it stands upon a rising ground, 100 ft. above the river, and contains a hut for the officers, built of reeds fastened on a framework of poles, and daubed with mud; also, the frame of a store-house, to be completed against the rainy season; and quarters for the garrison, consisting of a hundred men of the 13th Regiment and some colonial volunteers. The gun shown to the left hand in this Sketch is a small Krupp four-pounder, which is very handy and useful. Fort Oliphant is surrounded by trees and bush; the river is about 100 yards wide. The country between this and Fort Weber is a plain of red sand, dotted with scrubby bush, and with a few large trees, but with huge hummocks of granite, some of them 20 ft. high and 200 ft. in circumference, rising abruptly out of the ground. The Kaffirs are accustomed to build their kraals among these rocks, and to fortify them with stone walls, loop-holed for musketry, "which are very nasty to get into." There is plenty of sport for quiet days on the Oliphant river, which abounds in fish, while bucks of different kinds, pheasants, partridges, and guinea-fowl afford good shooting.

News has been received from the Cape to the 12th ult. There is no news from Zululand, but military preparations continue on the part of the British. A wing of the 24th Regiment has been transferred from King William's Town to Natal, and the Natal force has been sent to Greytown. The 88th Regiment is at Cape Town. A stronghold of the Kaffirs on the eastern frontier of the Trans-Vaal has been successfully attacked by our troops. Commodore Sullivan has gone on a special mission to Delagoa Bay in her Majesty's ship Active. The pacification of Griqualand is stated to be complete, and a Commissioner has been appointed to investigate the affairs of the northern border.

The arrivals at Liverpool last week of both live stock and fresh meat, from the United States and Canada, were again very large, the latter being about the largest quantity that has arrived in a single week this season, consisting of 5914 quarters of beef, 1039 carcases of mutton, 415 dead pigs, and 1000 tubs of fresh butter. The totals of live stock were 771 head of cattle and 1227 sheep.

OBITUARY.

MRS. TAIT.

Mrs. Tait (Catharine), wife of the Archbishop of Canterbury, died in Edinburgh on the 1st inst. This lady was the youngest daughter of the Venerable W. Spooner, Archdeacon of Coventry, by Anne Maria, his wife, fifth daughter of Sir Lucius O'Brien, third Baronet, of Dromoland, in the county of Clare, great grandfather of the present Lord Inchiquin. She was married, in 1843, to the Right Hon. and Most Rev. Archibald Campbell Tait, D.D., the present Archbishop of Canterbury, who was then Head Master of Rugby. He subsequently became Dean of Carlisle and Bishop of London, and was translated to Canterbury in 1868. Mrs. Tait leaves two surviving daughters; her only son, the Rev. Craufurd Tait, Vicar of St. John's, Notting-hill, and one of her daughters, died this year. The Archbishop of Canterbury has been indeed sorely afflicted within the last twelve months; two of his children and now his wife have been taken from him.

MR. G. H. LEWES.

The death of Mr. George Henry Lewes, essayist, historian, and philosopher, occurred on the 30th ult., at his residence, North Bank, Regent's Park. He was born in London in April, 1817, and was educated under Dr. Burney, at Greenwich. His earliest employment was that of a clerk in a mercantile house, but philosophy weaned him away from the City desk, and also from the study of medicine, to which he applied himself for a time. In 1838 and the following year he lived in Germany, studying its language and metaphysics. In 1845, having previously written largely in the leading magazines and periodicals, he gave to world his "Biographical History of Philosophy," which was published by Charles Knight in four volumes. In the following year there appeared from his pen "The Spanish Drama," which was followed in 1849 by the "Life of M. Robespierre," and in 1853 by "Comte's Philosophy of the Sciences." More recent among his writings are "The Life and Works of Goethe," in two large octavo volumes, "The Physiology of Common Life," and a work on Aristotle entitled "A Chapter from the History of Science." Mr. Lewes was also the author of several dramas and novels, and was the first editor of the Leader and the Fortnightly Review.

MR. ALFRED SYDNEY WIGAN.

We have to record the death of Mr. Alfred Sydney Wigan on the 29th ult. at Folkestone, in his sixty-fifth year. Mr. Wigan was born at Blackheath, Kent, on March 24, 1814, and started in life as a professor of music. Subsequently he aspired to become an actor, and made his first appearance at the St. James's in 1838, under the name of Sydney. Under that of Wigan, however, he appeared at Covent Garden in November, 1839, then under the management of Madame Vestris, on which occasion he played the part of Sir Otto of Steinberg in Sheridan Knowles's play of "Love." In 1843 he migrated to the Strand, having two years previously married Miss Leonora Pincott, who joined the Keeleys' company at the Lyceum in April, 1844, whither in due time she was followed by her husband, who adapted for that house several clever French pieces, in which successively he acted the principal characters. Ultimately he became the lessee of the Olympic, which opened under his management Oct. 17, 1853, and was made successful by his skilful performance of French parts. His artistic merits were at once acknowledged in such pieces as "The Bengal Tiger," "The Lucky Friday," "The First Night," "Still Waters Run Deep," and "Retribution." He was also known at the Adelphi in the drama of "House or Home." In October, 1860, Mr. Wigan became manager of the St. James's. Here for three seasons he and his wife distinguished themselves. His next engagement was at the new theatre in Long-acre, the Queen's; and in 1868 and 1869, at another new theatre, the Gaiety, he added to his reputation. Illness then interrupted his successful career. On July 6, 1872, Mr. and Mrs. Wigan took a benefit at Drury-Lane, at a morning performance, under distinguished patronage. Mr. Wigan was undoubtedly a man of varied talent, and within a certain range an actor of consummate ability. His delineations of character were sometimes minute and acute to a degree; this quality it was that won for him credit as a consummate artist, in which character it may be said, "his soul was as a star, and dwelt apart," so distinct was his style from that of all his contemporaries.

The deaths have also been announced of—

Colonel H. C. Wade, Royal Artillery, on the 26th ult., aged sixty-four.

General Thomas Coryndon Luxmoore, late Royal Engineers, on the 26th ult., at Tunbridge Wells, aged eighty-three.

The Very Rev. Llewelyn Lewellin, M.A., D.C.L., Dean of St. David's, Principal of St. David's College, Lampeter, and Vicar of that parish.

The Rev. Thomas George Postlethwaite, M.A., late Vicar of Hatfield-heath, Essex, on the 21st ult., at Leamington, aged fifty-eight.

Mary, Lady Clerk, wife of Sir George Russell Clerk, K.C.B., G.C.S.I., and widow of Colonel Stewart, on the 26th ult., at Winton House, Basingstoke.

Alexander Carter, Esq., J.P., of The Spring, Kenilworth, and Petersham-terrace, London, on the 24th ult., at Kenilworth, aged forty-three.

Lieutenant-Colonel Peter Grant-Peterkin, late H.E.I.C.S., on the 24th ult., at Greeshop, Forres, N.B., in his ninety-second year.

George Edward Montagu, Esq., late Captain 84th Regiment, J.P. for the county of Wilts, only surviving son of Admiral John William Montagu, of Wilcot and Stowell, Wilts, on the 23rd ult., at Vermont, St. Saviour's, Jersey, in his thirty-seventh year.

John Hurly, Esq., J.P., on the 17th ult., at his residence, Fenit, in the county of Kerry, aged forty-five. He was the second son of John Hurly, Esq., J.P. and Clerk of the Crown, in the county of Kerry, by Anna Maria Theresa, his wife, only daughter of Colonel Hugh Hill, of Mount-hill, Armagh.

Abraham Darby, Esq, J.P. and D.L. for Bucks, J.P. for the counties of Monmouth and Brecknock, on the 28th ult., at Trehirfydd, near Brecon, in his seventy-fifth year. He was the eldest son of Edmund Darby, Esq., of Dale House, Colebrookdale, Salop, by Lucy, his wife, eldest daughter of John Burlingham, Esq., of Catharine Hill House, Worcester, and married, in 1839, Matilda Frances, eldest daughter and coheir of the late F. Darby, Esq., of Sunniside House, Colebrookdale.

George William Rowley, Esq., of Priory-hill, St. Neots, Hunts, on the 21st ult., in his eighty-third year. He was son of Oswald Rowley, of St. Neots, was a J.P. and D.L. for Hunts, and served as High Sheriff of that county and Cambridgeshire in 1854. He married, in 1820, Jane Catherine, only daughter of Thomas Mein, Esq., and leaves, with other issue, a son, George Dawson Rowley, Esq., of Morcott Hall, and CHESS IN THE CITY.

In the following Game, played at the City Chess Club, Mr. W. N. POTTER yields the odds of the Pawn and two moves to Mr. GORDON SMITH.
(Remove Black's K B P from the Board.)

WHITE (Mr. S.)	BLACK (Mr. P.)	WHITE (Mr. S.)	BLACK (Mr. P.)
1. P to K 4th 2. P to Q 4th 3. B to Q B 4th	P to Q Kt 3rd	and the attack must soon be foiled. If on the other hand he had played 14. P takes P to prevent Kt to K 5th, White has a good answer in 15. Kt to K sq, &c.
This mode of shaping the Pawn and two-move attack is decidedly inferior to posting the Bishop at Q 3rd.		15. Kt to K 5th	Kt takes B
3.	P to K 3rd	16. Kt takes Kt	R to B 4th
4. Kt to K B 3rd	B to Kt 2nd	A very forcible stroke, and one exceedingly difficult to parry.
5. Q to K 2nd	B to K 2nd	17. Kt to K 2nd	Q to R 5th
6. Kt to Q B 3rd	Kt to K B 3rd	18. Kt to Kt 3rd	Q to R 6th
7. Kt to K 5th		19. Kt to K 3rd	R to Q 4th
7. P to K 5th seems preferable, for if the Kt retreats White has gained time; but, if 7. Kt to R 4th, then—		20. Q to B 3rd	R to K B sq
8. P to K Kt 4th	Castles	21. Q to B 4th
9. P to Q 5th	Kt to B 5th, &c.	White must be credited with great care and patience in conducting the defence against such a fierce attack. Here his conception is plausible enough, to move the R-ok from B square and play the Queen there, but he has not time to carry it out, and should have taken the Q B P at once. Even in that case, however, Black can still pursue his attack by 21. R to B 3rd.
7.	Castles	21.	R to B 3rd
8. Castles	B to Q 3rd	22. Q takes P	R to B 3rd
9. Kt to Q 3rd	Kt to Q B 3rd	23. Q to Kt 8th (ch)	K to B 2nd
Mr. Potter justly remarked that the sacrifice of two pieces to which this move leads can hardly be sound; the conception is a happy one, nevertheless, for it gives Black an excellent attack, and produces a highly interesting game.		24. Q to B 4th (ch)	K to Kt 3rd
10. P to K 5th	Kt takes Q P	If 24. R to B 3rd, White can play 25. Q takes B and 26. Kt takes R. The elegant finish that follows must have been foreseen by Mr. Potter when the last move was made.
11. Q to Q sq	Kt to K sq	25. Kt to K 4th	R to R 5th
12. P takes B	Kt to B 6th (ch)	26. Q to Kt 3rd (ch)	R to Kt 5th

14. Q to Q 2nd	Kt takes P	28. K takes R	R to Q 8th Mate.
This is the very crisis of the game, and the move in the text is the best course for Black. He saw, of course, that he could recover one of the pieces by 14. Q to R 5th, but then follow

CHESS INTELLIGENCE.

The attempt to form a general association of the metropolitan chess clubs has been abandoned, notwithstanding the liberal offer of Mr. G. W. Medley to provide a handsome trophy from the funds of the Lowenthal trust for competition among the members. Mr. Medley has been requested to distribute the amount among the several clubs referred to, and any club desirous of participating in the proposed distribution should send particulars of the place of meeting and the number of regularly attending members to Mr. Wilson, secretary of the Excelsior Chess Club, 45, Grovelane, Camberwell. We venture to think that such a plan as this, if carried out, can have no permanent influence upon the cultivation of the game, and that the encouragement of amateurs to play chess for money prizes must necessarily prove prejudicial to its advancement. If the members of the suburban chess clubs will not play for a Challenge Cup, why should there not be a problem competition for it, under the auspices of the British Problem Association? The committee of that body should have no difficulty in guaranteeing the safe custody of the trophy, and problem composers will be found willing enough to strive for the possession of such a symbol of honour.

A new chess club has been organised in Londonderry: president, Mr. W. Kennedy; committee, Dr. Doake, Messrs. W. Young, and W. Comachie; honorary treasurer, Mr. J. Morrison; honorary secretary, Mr. J. Boarland. There are now three chess clubs established in the "Maiden City," besides the chess club attached to the news-room.

There was a large assemblage of members at the rooms of the Bristol and Clifton Chess Association on Saturday last, when Mr E Thorold, of Bath, played six games simultaneously, winning all of them. At a meeting of the committee of the association the following resolution was proposed by Mr. W. Berry, seconded by the Rev. J. Greene, and carried unanimously:—"That this committee desires to record with deep regret the removal by death of one of its most distinguished honorary members, Captain H. A. Kennedy, who was the first president of the club, and who, by his liberality and great reputation as a first-class chessplayer, was greatly instrumental in raising the name of the Bristol Club to its present high position. That the secretary be requested to enter this resolution in the minute-book of the association."

The will of Mr. Walter Cave, formerly of 4, Mincing-place, and late of Eaton-place, Exeter, has been proved, the personal estate being sworn under £70,000.

Mr. Henry Thomas Richardson, of Brynhyfryd, Pwllheli, who died recently, and was, in conjunction with his father, the inventor of the tubular life-boat, has by his will bequeathed £10,000 at the death of his widow for the purchase and maintenance of life-boats at Pwllheli and Deal. He also gives £3000 towards Rhosygwalian church, Bala.

The total number of private bills for next Session, of which the plans were deposited at the Railway Department of the Board of Trade last Saturday, is 105.

Commander Cheyne gave a lecture on Monday evening, in the City Hall, Glasgow, upon his proposed expedition to the North Pole. He said that when the ship had gone as far as possible, he proposed with six sledges to go over the ice a long distance, and then, by means of three balloons lashed to one another, he would try to get to the Pole. After making observations, he would send back two of the balloons, and endeavour with the third to proceed to an inhabited part of Russia. A committee was appointed to assist him with funds.

A supplement to the London Gazette contains an announcement of several promotions in and appointments to the Order of the Bath, and of military promotions among the officers who have rendered distinguished service during the recent operations in South Africa. Lord Chelmsford is appointed a K.C.B., and the following officers are appointed Companions of the Bath:—Colonel R. T. Glyn, 24th Regiment; Colonel W. Beliairs, unattached; Colonel C. W. Elgee, Royal Artillery; Colonel H. W. Palmer, 90th Regiment; Colonel W. O. Lanyon, C.M.G., 2nd West India Regiment; Lieutenant-Colonel F. W. E. F. Walker, Scots Guards; Lieutenant-Colonel W. Lambert, 88th Regiment; Lieutenant-Colonel H. J. Degacher, 24th Regiment; Deputy Surgeon-General J. A. Woolfryes, M.D.

The annual exhibition of cattle, sheep, pigs, and poultry, was opened last Saturday in Bingley Hall, Birmingham. The entries in each department are more numerous than last year, and the general quality of the exhibits is superior to those of many preceding years. In Hereford steers exceeding three and not exceeding four years old Mr. Fred Platt, of Hereford, won first honours, and also the £100 prize awarded for the best Hereford in classes one to five. A special prize of £100 was won by Mr. Edwin Hubbard, of Lowestoft, for the best shorthorn heifer not exceeding four years old, together with the first prize in the class. In Devons a special prize of fifty guineas, together with the first prize in the class, was carried off by Mr. Samuel Kidner, of Milverton. There were sixteen exhibits of Scotch breed, and in this department a special prize of £50, as well as the first prize in the class, was won by Mr. M'Combie, of Aberdeen, for the best polled oxen or steer of any age. To Lord Lovat was awarded the Elkington Challenge Cup of the value of one hundred guineas; the one-hundred guinea prize offered by Messrs. James Gibbs and Co., of Mark-lane, London, for the best animal in any class, and also the prize of £50 for the best animal in classes 19 and 24, including the crossbreds and animals not eligible for any of the other preceding classes. The Elkington Challenge Cup, however, must be won two years in succession or any three years by the same exhibitor before he becomes the possessor. The prize was last year secured by Mr. Stratton, to whom it was also awarded in 1875. In fat steers exceeding three and not exceeding four years old, Lord Lovat was again the successful competitor.

SIR G. DUNCAN GIBB, Bart., M.D.,
Physician to the Westminster Hospital.
"The value of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL as a therapeutic agent in a number of diseases, chiefly of an exhaustive character, has been admitted by the world of medicine; but, in addition, I have found it a remedy of great power in the treatment of many affections of the Throat and Larynx, especially in Consumption of the latter, where it will sustain life when everything else fails."

LENNOX BROWNE, Esq., F.R.C.S.E.,

"The action of Dr. de Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil has proved, in my own experience, particularly valuable, not only in those diseases for which it was originally employed, but also in many cases of weakness of the Singing and Speaking Voice, dependent on Bronchial or Laryngeal Irritation, and in all forms of Strumous Enlargement of Glands, and Discharges from the Ear."

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.
JAMES EPPS AND CO., HOMŒOPATHIC CHEMISTS.

THE "Civil Service Gazette" says:—
"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly-nourished frame."

THE "Naval and Military Gazette" says:—
"The nutritive qualities of cocoa over either those of tea or coffee are now so generally acknowledged that the steady increase shown by official statistics in its consumption during recent years ceases to be a matter of surprise. One of the first firms to popularise this now indispensable adjunct to our breakfast-table was Messrs. Epps and Co., whose name, since 1839, has been so continuously before the public, and whose Homœopathic Cocoa is as familiar in our homes as the proverbial 'household words.' Those whose business it has been to watch at Messrs. Epps's works the elaborate and complex processes, and to note the care and labour bestowed before the crude cocoa bean is considered ready for consumption, cannot but admit that the popularity Messrs. Epps's productions have secured is fully deserved. The vastness of these works may be imagined when it is stated that four millions of pounds of prepared cocoa alone are prepared there yearly. The reputation gained, now many years since, for Mr. James Epps's preparation, both for its purity and its value as a dietetic, has been more than maintained. A constant increasing demand fully testifies to this—which must be as gratifying to Messrs. Epps as it is certainly flattering to the good faith they have kept with the public to secure so gratifying a result."

"All the Year Round" says:—
"Having now disposed of fancy chocolate, let us stroll to the Euston-road, hard by the Regent's Park, to Epps's cocoa manufactory, where may be studied the making of cocoa on a stupendous scale, giving a just idea of the value of these articles, not as luxuries, but as actual food."

THE "Court Journal" says:—
"In a climate so varying and trying as our own, to maintain sound and uniform health, our daily diet cannot be too carefully and attentively studied. Advancing science and recent discoveries have within the last few years been instrumental in adding several most valuable additions to our comparatively short list of dietetic foods. Foremost among these should be ranged cocoa, which, although known here several centuries previously, only came into general use within the last forty years. One of the first to popularise this now indispensable adjunct to our table was Mr. James Epps, whose 'Prepared Cocoa' has gained such just repute for its excellent and nutritious character. Prepared originally on homœopathic principles, in a soluble and convenient form, and easy of digestion, it met a public demand, speedily became popular, until now Messrs. Epps produce over four millions of pounds of their cocoa a year, and their manufactory is the largest of its kind in this country."

"Cassell's Household Guide" says:—
"We will now give an account of the process adopted by Messrs. James Epps and Co., manufacturers of dietetic articles at their works in the Euston-road, London."

THE "Morning Advertiser" says:—
"In the middle of the seventeenth century an announcement appeared in one of the few journals of that period, to the effect that 'out of Bishopsgate-street, at a Frenchman's in the street that is called Grace-church-street, is retired a house, is an excellent West India drink, called chocolate, to be sold at reasonable rates.' This is the first record we have of the introduction of cocoa into England. For a time it flourished as a fashionable drink, and then, like all fashions, subsided. Nearly two centuries after, in 1832, the duties, which had been almost prohibitive, were greatly reduced, and one of the first to take advantage of re-establishing the popularity of cocoa was Messrs. James Epps and Co., the Homœopathic Chemists. Under the name of 'Prepared Cocoa' they introduced a soluble and convenient preparation, which required no boiling, and was palatable and highly nutritious. It met a public want, speedily became popular, and year by year has increased in demand, till the consumption now exceeds four millions of pounds yearly."

THE "Christian World" says:—
"'If I am to take cocoa,' said I, 'I must know what it is made of; I must examine the process; I must dive into the mystery of its manufacture; I must see and judge for myself what are the ingredients of which it is composed.' With this view I made my way to the manufactory of James Epps and Co., in the Euston-road."

"John Bull" says:—
"In no branches of industry are recent scientific and chemical discoveries more generally applied than in those upon which our food supply is so largely dependent. The laziness of the last generation have in many cases become the daily necessaries of the present. A forcible illustration of this is to be found in the enormous increase in the consumption of cocoa year by year—a result due, in a great measure, to the increased facilities for its manufacture. An idea of the vast extent of this industry may be gained from the fact that one firm alone—that of Messrs. Epps and Co.—now sell over four millions of pounds annually. The duty which period an almost prohibitive duty was levied. In 1850 the total amount consumed in this country was less than half a million pounds yearly. At the present time one firm alone, that of Messrs. James Epps and Co., the Homœopathic Chemists, sell annually four million pounds."

THE "Civilian" says:—
"In the seventeenth century, before either tea or coffee had found their way into the English markets, chocolate was a favourite beverage with the luxurious classes at that period; it then fetched an almost fabulous price per pound. To-day, when modern science and enterprise have placed it within the reach of every class, cocoa is not only still regarded as a palatable and refreshing drink, but is valued for its nutritive and dietetic qualities. One of the first, we believe, who may be credited with introducing cocoa in its present form is Mr. James Epps. Prepared on sound dietetic principles, Epps's Homœopathic cocoa contains all the nutritive properties of the native product in such a form that they are rendered thoroughly soluble, and, therefore, much more easy of digestion. The natural superabundance of fat present in raw cocoa is, moreover, not only counteracted, but made to serve one of the most essential functions of sound diet. Messrs. Epps's works are now, perhaps, the largest in the country, the cocoa produced there amounting to many million pounds a year."

"Land and Water" says:—
"Through the kindness of Messrs. Epps, I recently had an opportunity of seeing the many complicated and varied processes the cacao bean passes through ere it is sold for public use, and being interested and highly pleased with what I saw then, and being interested and highly pleased with what I saw during the visit to the manufactory, I thought a brief account of the cacao and the way it is manufactured by Messrs. Epps to fit it for a wholesome and nutritious beverage, might be likewise of interest to the readers of 'Land and Water.'"

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

CHRISTMAS NUMBER

DECEMBER, 1878.

ON CHRISTMAS DAY IN THE MORNING. DRAWN BY MISS M. ELLEN EDWARDS.

Nos. 2059, 2060.

On Christmas Day in the Morning.

(See Illustration.)

Two little maidens, Nelly and Sue,
With the aid of their dear sister Prue,
Sang a carol one Christmas morning;
And this is the song those girls did sing
While "all the bells on earth did ring
On Christmas Day in the morning."

This is the ever-sacred morn
When Christ in Bethlehem was born,
Then let us in glad homage raise
Our hearts and voices in His praise.
Poor is our best attempt, we know,
But He doth judge the heart, and so—
If we but strive to do aright,
And be well-pleasing in His sight—
Our song may be as sweet to Him
As that of quiring Cherubim.

With Christ for pattern, let us pray
For all mankind on this blest day—
For Christian people, and as well
For all who on this earth do dwell:
For His sweet grace is unconfined,
And wooing as the soft south wind;
More bounteous than the summer rain,
Fast ripening flower and fruit and grain;
More largely liberal than the sun,
That sheds its beams on every one.
Nor, while we pray for others, let Us our poor feeble selves forget,
But beg of God's all-loving care
A larger, deeper, tenderer share.

No costly gifts or odours sweet,
Have we to lay at Jesus' feet;
Only the simple offering
Of children's humble praise we bring.
What, though we are not great or wise,
A loving heart He most doth prize:
So as we grow in years may we
More tender and more gracious be,
And thus make daily life divine
As worship at a sacred shrine;
Each household duty's least event
Made holy as a sacrament.
O let us ever children be
In innocent simplicity;
Though steadfast in our purpose, still
In all things bending to His will;
With prompt obedience acquiescing
In chastisement as well as blessing.

Thus ever striving for the good,
And taking it as daily food,
Ourselves with Christian grace adorning,
We may His praise the better sing,
While "all the bells on earth do ring
On Christmas Day in the morning."

ENIGMA.

In Eden's Garden I was known;
And even now, fond lovers own
That, when by aid of me they meet,
They find a Paradise as sweet.
Viewed this way, that way, I 'm the same:
Now give me, if you please, a name.

REBUS.

Many a lady you may know
Feebly faltering through me go,
While another seizes me
With a sweet audacity;
Like Diana in the chase,
Nothing checks her splendid pace,
As she throws her very soul,
Quite ecstatic, in my whole.

Take my head away and you
One of Nature's darlings view.
Bird or beast I do not tell,
That is left for you to spell.
Running quietly along,
Humming to myself a song,
All unwearied, day and night,
I maintain my wayward flight.
Many a dainty spot I know,
Where the sweetest violets grow,
Coaxing me in vain to stay
For a short-lived holiday;
Still my heedless course pursuing,
Though it be to my undoing.
Soon or late, 'tis Nature's law,
I shall feed the greedy maw
Of some monster, my own kin,
Thirsting much to suck me in;
Some big brother lies in wait
Me to swallow, sure as fate—
Who himself will swallowed be
By a greater one than he.

One more member severed, I
Surely am about to die;
Certain 'tis that I am ill.
Ha! there 's spirit in me still!

Lop another limb away
And I 'm debonair straightway;
Cause of rollicking delight,
Topsy-turvying day and night;
Running, lightning-like, through veins,
Cheering hearts and firing brains.
But I must confess, in brief,
Candidly, that I 'm a thief;
From the victims I ensnare
Stealing what they ill can spare.
Double in my present trouble,
I make other folk see double;
Doubling up the strongest wight
Who well measures not my might.
Dublin town owns me with pride
Lords-Lieutenant take my side;
Nor alone in Dublin known,
Through the world my fame is blown.
With a brand, so men aver,
Potent as Excalibur,
I am still a jolly fellow,
Making all men blithely mellow.
Medley thus of contradiction,
What am I—a fact or fiction?—J. L.

MICHAEL GARGRAVE'S HARVEST.

BY MRS. J. H. RIDDELL,

AUTHOR OF "CITY AND SUBURB," "GEORGE GEITH," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

THE CORN IN THE GROUND.

To the north of Eldon and to the east of Wilson streets, in the Finsbury district, there is a small square, only to be approached by way of Long-alley. It is an unpretentious little square, hemmed in on all sides by high walls and great warehouses, with a look of age about it, nevertheless, calculated to mislead the curious passer-by—with wonderfully elaborate doorways; with halls wainscotted, if narrow; with red-tiled roofs, and a general aspect of decayed respectability that might well induce anyone unacquainted with the antecedents of the neighbourhood in which it is situated to commence moralising concerning the mutability of fortune in the matter of houses as well as men.

In the whole of the city of London there is probably not a less interesting locality than this. First a lake, then a swamp, then a plague-pit, then a stretch of open fields, the resort of gamblers, gymnasts, quacks, mountebanks, and itinerant preachers, then the site of a dreadful mad-house; lastly, a great railway terminus, surrounded by appropriate goods-yards and goods-stores; all that now thickly built-over tract lying between Bishopsgate and Moorgate, and Worship-street and Liverpool-street, is in any historical or antiquarian sense as far from interesting as a neighbourhood can well be.

And yet just as an accident can happen in any locality, as history can be made in any spot, so men and women can face their troubles anywhere, as badly or as bravely as the case may be, in a City lane as in a fashionable terrace overlooking Hyde Park.

The man whose story I have to tell was, on a certain winter's evening towards the close of eighteen hundred and sixty two, all alone in his office in Queen-square fighting out a battle with himself.

He did not reside in the City, using one of the old houses in the square off Long-alley for stores and offices, and living where his works were situated, near Hackney Marshes, on the river Lea.

Too obscure at every stage of its existence to be deemed deserving of being designated by name on any map, Queen-square was even in those days considered so little desirable from a business, as well as a social, point of view that rents ruled very low, and its houses could be had for an "old song."

Now-a-days, premises there might, judging from appearances, be hired upon even easier terms, for the whole square is in a transition state. It is waiting, evidently waiting for what may happen. It does not mend its windows, or clean its paint, or repair its pavements, or scrub its stairs, or wash its window ledges, or whiten its doorsteps.

With a very dirty face, it stands staring at the goods-station of the North-Western Railway—daily expecting the bill-stickers to come round and paste posters all over its house-fronts as a preliminary to the bricklayers and labourers who will follow in due time, making no long tarrying when their turn arrives, and cart the whole square off as old building materials that will all be worked up again in the erection of shoddy houses in remote suburbs.

The auctioneer is advancing rapidly down Long-alley—he has reached some contemporaries of Queen-square, gutted them of their contents, stripped an end off one and part a front off another, and put up a big board, stating that this eligible plot of building land is for sale.

Higher up—nearer Sun-street, or what was Sun-street, but is now partly a railway and partly a dismantled thoroughfare—he has sold many plots of land, many lots of building material, and erected a bran new church, to say nothing of minor edifices.

The tide of destruction must shortly engulf Queen-square, and before this time next year its site will be covered by a block of warehouses, or a Board School, or perhaps by another railway station. The place which has known it will know it no more—dingy bricks, red-tiled roofs, twisted chimneys, small-paned windows, ornamented doorways; all these things will disappear, and in their stead will rise colossal buildings that have business stamped upon them from basement to roof.

When Mr. Gargrave had his offices at number three, however, Queen-square wore a different aspect. It was then a cosy, sleepy, out-of-the-way nook, not very far from the Bank of England, the Stock Exchange, the Royal Exchange, the Mansion House, and other places of the same sort which serve as useful landmarks to those who go down into the deep waters of London business, but quiet and secluded as a remote corner of Epping Forest. Not a vehicle could disturb its repose; there was no carriage-way to it either for lumbering waggon or Lord Mayor's coach. In Long-alley, as in most other retired spots in the busy City, children held high carnival when the evenings drew out, and the summer days were long and favourable to the sports affected by juveniles of that period; but in most seasons of the year, and at most hours of the day, Queen-square was deadly quiet—silent and lonely as a forgotten graveyard.

No Broad-street station then close at hand, no North-Western yard bounding the eastern side of Long-alley. Passengers from the Shoreditch terminus then took their dreary way westward through Worship-street, one end of which was formerly known by the appropriate name of Hog-lane.

Even in those days the houses in Queen-square were growing dingy. For many years time had been artistically tinting them with layers of dirt, and no restorer in the person of an energetic landlord had thought it worth while to smarten them up with paint and varnish, whitewash and fresh papers. There was a respectable grime about the appearance of the square which conferred upon it a look of old-fashioned stability, and argued either that the tenants were of old standing, and not particular concerning light and cleanliness, or that they were new, and for reasons of their own not disposed to be exigent.

The business pace was not so fast then as it has since become, and a trader at that time did not need periodically to turn himself and his goods out of doors, rebuild his premises, and sacrifice his stock every few years.

Other times, other manners. The manners of these times are no doubt very desirable, but they were not such as would have found much favour in the sight of staid commercial men at the time when Michael Gargrave was striving to win his way upwards to pecuniary success.

Never a quieter or less risky business than that he was engaged in. Never a more careful plodder along legitimate and beaten highways than he.

For years he had pursued one steady and monotonous course, working hard himself and insisting that those he employed should do the same, paying his way honestly, keeping his books fairly, opening accounts cautiously, making few bad debts, and selling his goods at such prices as left a sufficient margin of profit to cover all reasonable and likely contingencies. Upon the whole, not an unsafe basis upon which to build a secure and profitable trade; and, had Mr. Gargrave only remained steadily true to his own convictions, he need not, on the evening when I venture to take my readers to Queen-square, have remained so late at office, perplexed with doubts and assailed by a subtle temptation.

Some months previously he had been tempted by a firm in Liverpool to adventure upon the consignment of a large amount of goods to the foreign correspondents of the firm in question. A certain portion of the risk was taken by the house in Liverpool, who agreed to pay the sum agreed on "six months after date;" while the profits of the speculation—to call the transaction by its proper name—were to be equally divided between Mr. Gargrave and Messrs. Brent and Stanhope.

On the face of it, an arrangement which seemed prudent and feasible enough; but there were two, if not three, weak points in the affair—one, that the sum involved was larger than a man in Michael Gargrave's position should have considered himself justified in running the slightest risk of losing; the second, that the goods jeopardised had nothing to do with his regular business, were quite outside his ordinary trade, and were consequently invoiced to him not in the regular way of commerce—that is to say, not sold by constant supplier to constant customer, but procured upon the strength of an established credit, and the fact that the house from which he bought believed him to be possessed not merely of a good business, but of sufficient means to meet all his liabilities.

If there were any other objection to be put into the scales when carefully weighing the prudence of the transaction it was this—that, under the most favourable circumstances, six months was too long a time for a person in his position to lie out of money which he himself was bound to provide. It made the certainty of his own payment fall too close upon the uncertainty of another payment.

In plainer words, it was, to use a business expression, "too close a shave;" for, though it sometimes happens that out of such encounters a man may escape by the "skin of his teeth," still, it is difficult to pass through such an ordeal without endangering many things which should be held very sacred, being jewels beyond price.

But the inducements held out had been very great, and Michael Gargrave was only human. He believed he could meet his engagements without difficulty, and he also believed he saw his way to a very large profit. He knew others had made considerable amounts by engaging in similar transactions. His venture had been approved by the London representative of the country manufacturerers from whom he purchased the goods. The Liverpool house was of old standing, and all the persons of whom he had made inquiry spoke highly of the personal probity and commercial standing of Messrs. Brent and Stanhope.

Given that a risk was to be run at all, he seemed to have neglected no reasonable precaution to secure that it should be as small as possible, and yet here was the result—the natural result, as any dispassionate outsider, or Job-comforting friend, would have been sure to remark—the money was lost, and the goods were lost too.

Whosoever else might have made anything out of the transaction, he had not, and he knew that now he never should.

There was not the smallest uncertainty about the matter. He could take out his books, if he felt so inclined, and write "bad" against Messrs. Brent and Stanhope's account with a feeling of the most perfect conviction.

Confirmation of the disaster had reached him a couple of hours previously, and he understood thoroughly that since he left home in the morning his position was quite changed, and that altogether for the worse.

Quite enough to perplex a man and cause him to regard the future with dread and doubt; quite enough to account for books pushed on one side, and letters lying unanswered, though regular post time was long past and gone; for the frown on his forehead, and the depths of thought into which he seemed to have plunged. And yet the mental battle he was fighting had nothing at first sight to do with his loss, or Messrs. Brent and Stanhope, or his future; and as he kept stabbing his blotting paper all over with the point of his steel pen, he was no more arguing out the pros and cons of the way he had been swindled than he was conscious of his visible employment.

He had sat exactly in the same position for an hour, doing exactly the same thing, haunted by precisely the same words.

"Remember the corn in the ground." "Think of the corn in the earth."

With a dull persistency these two sentences, having taken possession of his memory, wandered through his brain; he could not get rid of them; no matter of what else he tried to think, his thoughts kept chiming to that refrain.

It was quite by chance, or what seemed chance, that he had heard the words at all. At the time they produced no apparent impression upon his mind. He had gone and come, he had slept and waked, he had eaten and drunk, he had worked and rested; the days and the nights had passed, and the sentences had seemingly lain dormant, like the seed of which they spoke, and yet in a moment they had sprung into active life, and were clamouring to be heard with an urgency that brooked no refusal.

For an hour he had been listening to their voice, trying at times to get rid of the sound, striving at others to elude the self-evident meaning of the principle involved; but it would not do.

All in vain he endeavoured to shut his ears to the ever-recurring warning.

It was a faithful finger-post, cautioning him against following an evil path, though that way looked fair and easy, and the other seemed dark and beset with difficulties.

It was the choice given to Christian in the Pilgrim's Progress over again; and Michael Gargrave knew this.

He was not a man of brilliant parts or of wide education; he had never been to college and not very long at school; but the things it is most essential to know may be patent to the meanest understanding without an accurate acquaintance with Greek and Hebrew, and the capacity of a child can grasp the truth that he who sows tares must not expect to garner grain.

"Remember the corn in the ground." Not precisely in the sense Michael Gargrave applied it had these words been used by the preacher who spoke them, but they were so relevant to the position in which he found himself that he felt constrained to take the sentence for a text and construct a sermon out of them.

"That which a man sows he shall surely reap."

Yes, and he knew the statement applied to each man as well as to all men. No exception in this case was needed to prove the rule, though everyone undoubtedly seemed to think so.

If he scattered evil he should ensure for himself and others a plentiful harvest of ill. Yes, that was the short and the long of the matter, if he believed the testimony of those who had so sown and so reaped. And he was forced to believe it. In the silence by which he sat surrounded as by some palpable presence, the "whisper in his ear" sounded distinct as if enunciated by the clearest voice.

Yet it was hard to pay heed, if paying heed meant relinquishing his own desires. Many a man, he thought, would regard such hesitancy folly—such a renunciation as he vaguely contemplated, an act of insanity.

"Came in the very nick of time." "It seemed perfectly providential." "I could not have weathered the storm without it." "It was a most lucky chance that the letter happened to arrive on the very day." These, he felt, ought to have been some of the sentences he looked forward to uttering when he had got safely to the end of what threatened to be a perilous journey; but he could not imagine his saying them. No! Such words other men had spoken and would speak again, but he might not do it.

Not for him such sowing, even though Fortune herself seemed to have been at the trouble of bringing him the seed.

He did not see that it would be totally wrong, but he could not convince himself that it would be perfectly right.

If he put the gift from him, it almost amounted to signing the death-warrant of his own commercial existence. Such a chance might never occur again. Just when one door—as represented by Messrs. Brent and Stanhope—was banged in his face, another insidiously opened.

Was he justified in thrusting such an opportunity aside? Was it not his duty even, in the interests of another person, to accept without question, and use without hesitation, the goods the gods had sent him?

Faster and faster went the pen, stabbing deeper and deeper into the paper; then, suddenly pushing his chair back from the table, he rose, and, with hands thrust deep in his pockets, began to pace the room with slow and measured steps.

"Take the money while you have the chance; you did a profitable and safe trade so long as you stuck to your own business; and there cannot be the slightest shadow of risk in the matter."

So the devil, tempting him, urged, and plausibly.

"If you are foolish enough to let this opportunity slip you will be ruined, nothing can save you," continued this voice, egging him on.

"Do not come to any decision to-night, at any rate," it added, in order, by protracting the struggle, to weaken his judgment and allow fresh reasons for accepting the boon to develop. "To-morrow will be quite time enough for you to make up your mind."

"You cannot run the risk of losing the results of years of labour, of leaving your home, and of beggaring Mr. Holding's daughter. He trusted her future to you—remember that."

"If it had not been intended that you should take advantage of such an opportunity it would never have been thrust in your way."

"Recollect, 'there is a tide in the affairs of men;' and if you do not float off the rocks while this tide is flowing you will certainly go to pieces."

And the other voice said nothing all the while, save

"Remember the corn in the ground."

And he did remember.

Through frost and snow, through the dark days of December and the long nights of winter, the seed he sowed would live and bear fruit after its kind in all the summers and autumns to come.

No; he would not do evil that good might ensue; he would not purchase safety at such a price.

The corn he planted he should not dread to see sprout.

Other sirens besides those who dwell on the silver sands and sing their songs by the margins of rivers there are who lure men to destruction. Temptation can assume a thousand forms, and appear in as many disguises; but as regarded this seduction Michael Gargrave, now clearly understanding its nature, was not to be drawn into yielding to it.

"No," he said, finally drawing a long breath, like one who after encountering some great danger realises at last that he has escaped it. "However it may go with me, I will not save myself by putting her little all in jeopardy," and, without any further hesitation, he resumed his seat at the table, opened a drawer, took out one sheet of note-paper and one envelope, and was about to lay both on his blotting-pad when he noticed the stabs in it, which bore evidence to the length and intensity of the late fray.

With an impatient gesture—the gesture of one who, in the habit of keeping himself well in hand, is disgusted to find he has unconsciously broken bounds—he cut off the sheets so maltreated, and, tearing them into small pieces, threw them into the waste-paper basket.

Then, taking a pen, he directed the envelope to

Mrs. Brockley,
The Myrtles,
Eastlea,
Southshire;

but paused for a minute ere beginning to write.

As a rule, hesitancy concerning what he should say was not a failing of Mr. Gargrave; but he had been hesitating all the evening over the very question involved in his letter, and it seemed natural that the words conveying a refusal, which to him meant so much, should scarcely flow glibly from his pen.

To his right lay a yellow envelope, to his left a pink, and, perhaps to stimulate his faculties, he opened the former and read once again the few lines traced on the paper it contained.

If brevity be the soul of wit, that telegram could only be regarded as a highly humorous composition. This was how it ran:—

From Penkey, Liverpool, to Mr. Gargrave, 3, Queen-square, London.

Brent bolted—Stanhope in gaol.

The note which next he drew out of the pink envelope was longer, but quite as much to the point.

It was written in a crabbed hand, that of a person evidently unaccustomed to much correspondence; but the meaning intended to be conveyed appeared clearly enough.

The lady addressed her correspondent as Honoured Sir, and took the liberty "of informing him that a mortgage on certain lands (which she mentioned) having been that day paid off in a cheque drawn upon a London bank, she trusted he would excuse her freedom in asking him to get it cashed for her.

"Knowing, also, how very clever he was in all business matters, she would feel more obliged than she could express if he would 'put the money out' for her at good interest. It is a small sum certainly," added the good lady, "but perhaps even in your own business you could turn it over, so as to make more of it for me. Whatever you do with it will satisfy me, for in your hands I know it must be safer than in any bank.

"Begging pardon for taking up your time reading about my affairs,

"I am, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"ANN JANE BROCKLEY."

Mr. Gargrave, with a smile flitting over his face, read this epistle to the end, and then answered it thus:—

"Dear Mrs. Brockley,—

"Your note inclosing Mr. Merrilow's cheque has arrived safely. I will pass it through my account to-morrow; and, as Consols are now low, invest the amount for you in Government stock.

"I cannot advise you to run any risk with your money. High interest means, as a rule, bad security; and it is better for you to rest content with a smaller percentage than to peril your means of subsistence. Should I hear of any good mortgage or desirable investment, I will not fail to let you know, and, assuring you that my services are always at your command, I remain, yours faithfully,

"MICHAEL GARGRAVE."

He did not re-read or copy this letter, but placed it in the envelope he had previously directed, sealed, and stamped, and put it in the pocket of his top-coat.

Then, only waiting to lock up his drawers, he took his hat, turned out the gas, and, making his way down stairs, opened the hall-door and passed into the night.

CHAPTER II.

LUCY.

Following the crow's flight as nearly as he could, Mr. Gargrave, after over an hour's walk, found himself crossing the wide stretch of marsh land which was the nearest way to his home.

It had been a tolerably dry season, and the waters of that well-watered region were consequently content to keep to their natural channels, and leave the marshes, or mashes, as the adjacent population preferred to call them, available for foot passengers.

Those marshes are lonely enough now after dark, but they were far lonelier then; Wick Hall was still standing, and not one of the streets that have since been built over its site were thought of.

After leaving Bethnal-green he scarcely met a dozen persons, and all of those he encountered before reaching Hackney-wick.

Once Wick Hall was behind him he seemed to plunge into a region of utter solitude. It was a clear, cold night, with stars shining above, and a sharp breeze blowing over the marshes, and as Mr. Gargrave stood still for a minute, about half-way along Temple Mill-lane, the silence and the loneliness of the place struck him with a sense of desolation he had never before experienced. Whence he had come were the lights of London, the teeming streets, the crowded houses, the ceaseless noise, the never-ending stream of restless human life; and now where he stood there was not a trace of any living being but himself.

Away in the distance, the trees in Epping Forest loomed black against the sky, through the Lea Valley a train hasted off northward; down towards Stratford the signals on the railway showed lurid and ever-changing lights; while in the other direction—out towards Lea Bridge, and Homerton, and Lower Clapton, and Leyton, there was perfect stillness, and almost total darkness.

Here and there, far off, a lamp glimmered fitfully, but other evidence of habitation there was none.

The wind whistled about the marshes, bringing with it a fresh keen air from the flat wide Essex lands, and as it blew around him, something in its eerie sound, or in the wide expanse of desolate country in the midst of which he stood, or in the sad look of sky and earth, or in the mournful murmur of the water, flowing sullenly in divided channels on its course, struck Mr. Gargrave with a sudden sense of personal loneliness, of being uncared for, unloved, which was bitter exceedingly.

It was strange he had never, through all the struggling years of his London career, known the same feeling before; but it came upon him now with rushing force—with overpowering conviction.

What he could do, what he could give, what he could bring, what he could withhold, might and did signify much to many persons; but for dear love's sake no one cared about him—not a single creature in all the world.

Unless, indeed, it might be Mrs. Dodson. But no; he could not except even Mrs. Dodson.

"In her heart she is really and truly fond of nothing except that greedy little beast Tommy," he decided, irritably; and, as anger is always a certain corrective of sentiment, Mr. Gargrave, waxing hot as the memory of all Tommy's sins of commission and omission recurred to him, walked forward, considering that, after all, it signified very little whether anyone cared for him or not.

"As matters look now," he mused, "it is far better no one should be waiting for me at home whose heart would ache for this trouble that has come upon me. If I had a wife now, and children, my case would be very hard indeed; but, situated as I am"——

Then he paused in his mental sentence, for, situated even as he was, with neither chick nor child, nor wife nor brother, the position was very serious—so serious that he could not, with all his courage, and he had plenty, put the thought of it lightly aside.

The place where he lived has long been pulled down; but once upon a time it was a pretty spot and picturesque, situated on the Essex side of the Lea, there (by reason of the water taken from it by Hackney Cut) quite a modest stream, at the bottom of a country lane, wild and rural, with great thorn-trees, that in the pleasant May-time were white with blossoms and scented the air far and near; with deep ditches, the banks of which were covered by grasses and mosses, and sweet wild-flowers.

A pretty place, in very truth. As I write of it London and its houses, and its streets and its noise, and its endless, endless tramp of human feet, and roll of carriages and rumble of carts, fades away and the country stretches all around. I see the elder-trees a mass of leaf and flower, and the turkeys roosting in them. I look at the laburnums drooping over the water; there is a perfume of lilac in the air, and where the long grass grows beside the bank a fish rises at intervals. There is a modest cottage, with its gable-end towards the Lea, and a fair garden in the front, small and well kept, filled with flowers, among which bees, who have their straw-thatched houses in a well sheltered corner, go humming all the long summer day.

No lack of life about the tiny house; see how the pigeons strut to and fro along the red-tiled barns and take long flights over the wide marshes beyond; the hens are prating in the yard, which has one gate opening into the lane and another giving on a field running up the slight ascent and sloping to the west, so that the last rays of the evening sun fall upon it.

Behind the house, and not far from it, is a great barn, converted into a factory by the late owner, a Mr. Holding. Upon the trade carried on there two men in succession built their hopes of competence. Mr. Holding, one of those men, had built more than this, for he expected to make his fortune under the high pitched roof.

So far as he was concerned, however, death had stepped in and frustrated that design; and now the collapse of Messrs. Brent and Stanhope seemed likely to disappoint the anticipations of his successor.

It was of these things Mr. Gargrave thought drearily as he crossed the wooden foot-bridge spanning the Lea, and passed the White Hart, and so made his way to the little by-road which led to his house.

No had grown very fond of the house. Since it became his own he had devoted every minute of his leisure time to beautifying it. Originally but an humble cottage, he had so changed its aspect that not a person who passed failed to remark its beauty. The rustic palings were his own handiwork. He had put up the trellises against the walls, on which roses, and jessamine, and clematis, and honeysuckle clustered. His hands scattered the grass-seeds over the tiny lawn close beside the river. There was scarcely a tree, or bush, or shrub about the place with which he had not some association of labour and pleasure. All seasons had been cheerful to him there. Not an inch of the country round about but was familiar to him; the field paths, so cool and free from dust; the foot-tracks beneath the forest trees; the glades where the holly and the bracken, and the blackberries and the gorse grew together in wild entanglement; the green banks of the Lea; the old mansions standing secluded, and not to be found by ordinary pedestrians,—these things, simple and poor though each might be if taken singly, made up a whole of familiarity, association, and memory which twined round the man's heart and bound it to his home with cords of love.

And it was quite upon the cards that he should lose the place he had laboured to secure. All his humble prosperity seemed to him, as he walked home that night, a thing of the past.

He was weary; and when a man is tired he is generally prone to be desponding. He was faint for want of food, for he had eaten nothing since breakfast. He was exhausted, for the excitement which had hitherto sustained him was all but passed way. He was lonely, for he had no one with whom to share his trouble. He had owned nothing but that pretty cottage and that snug business, and now both were in jeopardy.

He could have saved them, but he would not—not at that price.

Stratford church clock was striking eleven as he lifted the latch of the outer gate and walked up the short path leading to the hall-door.

He was about to put his key in the lock, when the door opened, and a girl holding a light in her hand exclaimed,

"Oh! I am so glad you have come! I heard the clink of the gate. Are not you very cold? I have kept up a good fire."

"Thank you, Lucy!" he answered, as he spoke taking off his hat and coat, and then passing straight into the parlour. "What a glorious fire!" he added; and he went up to the hearth and stood rubbing and warming his hands before the blazing logs, while the girl changed the position of the covers laid for his supper and drew a chair nearer to the heat.

"Do not trouble yourself," he said, at last, turning round and noticing what she was doing. "I am not really cold—not cold through. It would be strange if I were, for I have walked from the City."

"Walked!" she repeated. "How tired you must be!" And she touched an easy-chair, as if inviting him to rest in it.

"No; I do not think I am;" he answered. "Where is my sister?"

"She had a bad headache, and went to bed quite early."

"Poor Matilda!" he ejaculated, with a sigh, which had probably more reference to future possibilities than to present ailments.

"She so often has bad headaches," remarked the girl, with some trace of wonder in her tone, for expressions of sympathy were not much in Mr. Gargrave's line.

"Yes," he answered, mechanically; and, dropping into the arm-chair, relapsed into reverie.

"Are you ready for supper now?" asked the girl. "Shall I draw you some ale?"

He roused himself at her question, and recalled his wandering thoughts.

"I do not require any supper, thank you," he said. "But why are you attending to these things? Where is Mrs. Dodson? Has she gone to bed with a headache also?"

The girl laughed, low and pleasantly.

"Oh, no!" she said; "but she thought Tommy was a little feverish, and that he would not rest till she went up stairs."

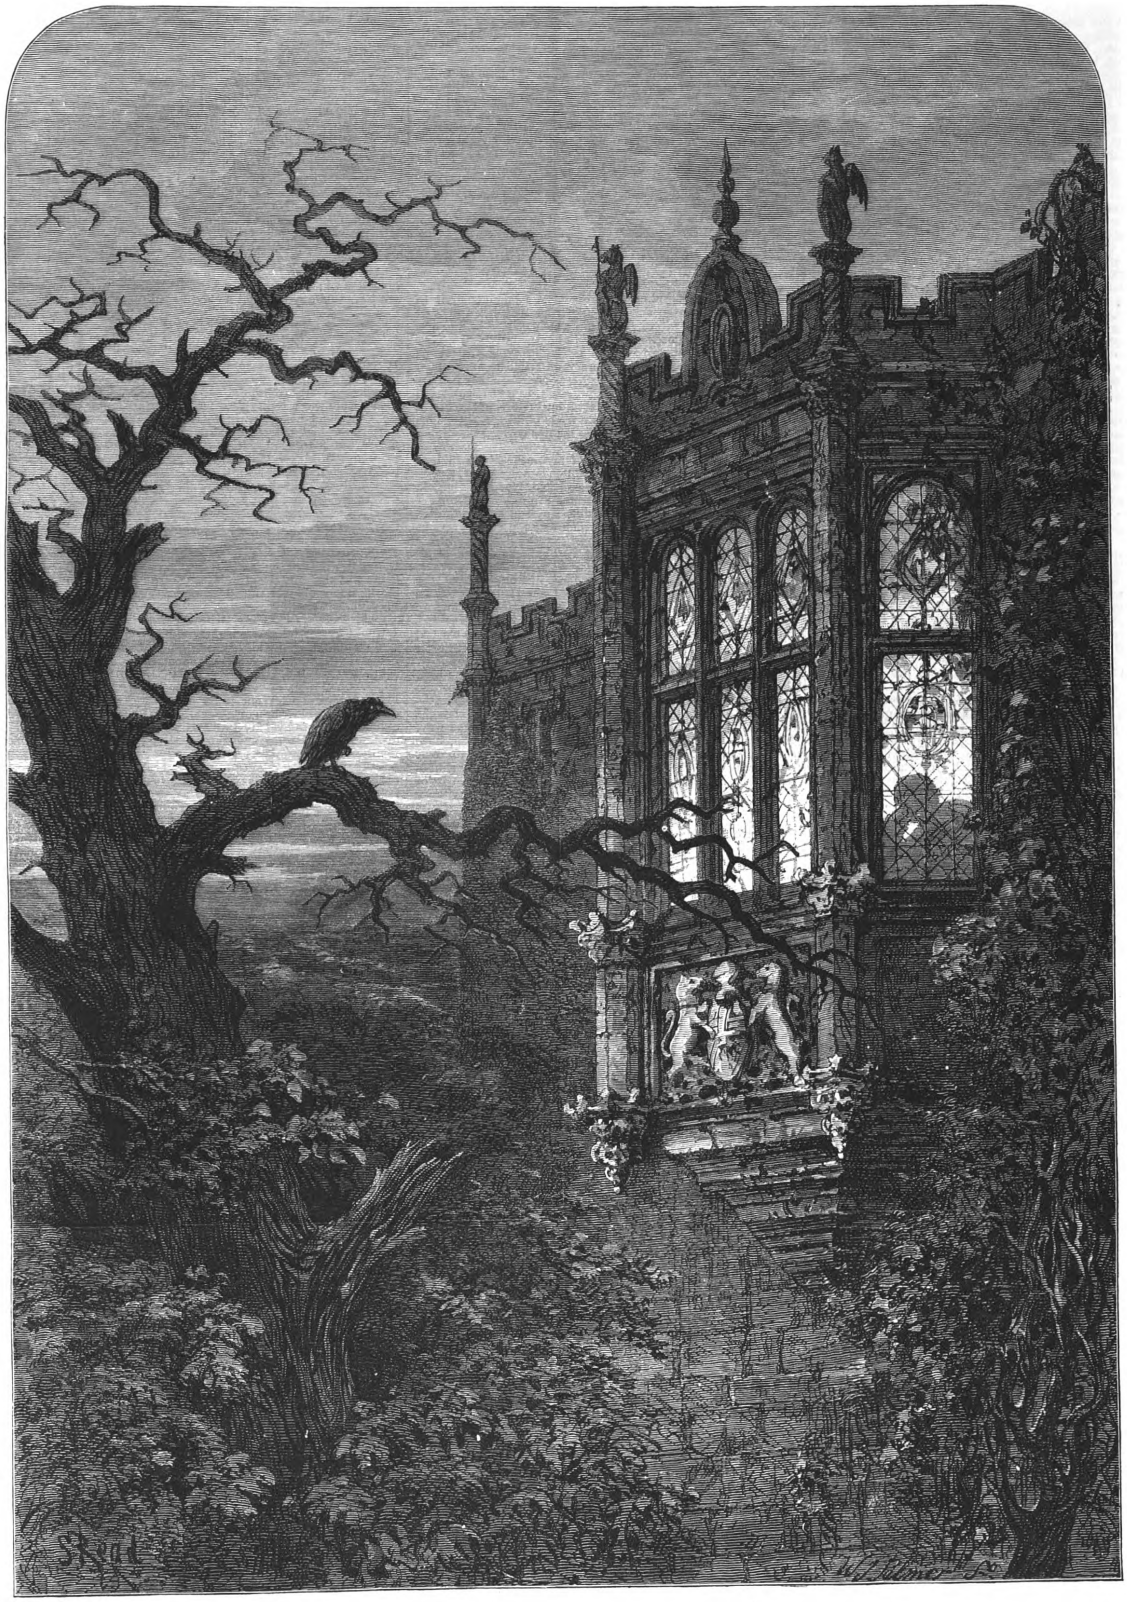
"—— Tommy!" Mr. Gargrave exclaimed, viciously. It was not his habit to use naughty words, and his behaviour so surprised Miss Holding that she said, shocked,

"Oh! Guardian!" with a sort of gasp on the oh! as if she had been plunged suddenly into cold water.

"I beg your pardon, Lucy," apologised Mr. Gargrave; "but I have no Christian feeling towards that boy."

"I do not think anybody has," answered the girl, her eyes dancing with fun. "Mrs. Dodson left everything ready for you, though," she went on, eager to do justice to the over-fond mother. "I wish you would eat a little of this fowl, and let me get you some ale. You do look so tired."

"Thank you, Lucy," he said again; "but I cannot eat or drink. I do not want anything you could get for me—really I do not; so you had better follow the good example set by my sister and Mrs. Dodson, and go to bed."



Evidently Miss Holding was accustomed to yield unquestioning obedience to her elders, for she lighted her candle and said good-night to Mr. Gargrave, and left the room without uttering another word.

When she had got so far as the bottom of the narrow staircase, however, she paused and hesitated; she looked back towards the door she had just closed, then she proceeded upstairs, very slowly, stopping for a moment on each step when she reached the top of the flight she paused again, and, this time without any hesitation whatever, tripped down into the hall and re-entered the parlour.

She found Mr. Gargrave pacing up and down the room as he had paced up and down his office.

OUR NOBLE ANCESTOR. DRAWN BY F. DADD.

AN EVIL OMEN. DRAWN BY S. READ.

"What is it?" he asked, thinking she must have forgotten something.

"I came back to ask if you were ill. I felt afraid you must be," she answered, with a shy timidity of manner which proved that her intercourse with Mr. Gargrave was neither close nor familiar.

"Ill, child? What in the world made you think I was ill?"

"I do not know. You do not look well. You seem different"——

"There is nothing the matter with me, Lucy," he said, as she stopped and seemed confused. "That is, nothing the matter with my health. I got an annoying letter this morning; and to-night I have been having a fight"——

"A fight!" echoed the girl, looking him over as though she expected to see some visible tokens of the encounter referred to.

"Not that sort of a fight," he explained, "only a quarrel with myself. It is all over now, and I am quite right again."

He had ceased his walk and was standing on the hearthrug as he told her this, his back to the fire, his face towards her.

The light from the candle she held, as well as from two placed upon the table, fell full upon him, and with a certain wonder and curiosity Lucy Holding looked at her guardian as she had certainly never looked at him before.

On his side, he looked at her in return; and, as he did so, it struck him that she was very pretty.

Something in her attitude, something in her expression, something in the way the shadows came and went across her face, some feeling unconsciously awakened and shining through her eyes, attracted and arrested his attention.

Yes; she had the effect of beauty, if she were not really beautiful; and it passed through his mind that she might grow beautiful.

Hitherto, if he thought about her appearance at all, it was but to consider that her eyes were too big and her mouth too wide; but now there was a wistful sweetness in the one, and a sympathic tenderness about the other, which transfigured her whole countenance.

She stood for a moment looking at him steadfastly and innocently, as a child might have done; then she said, "I am sure you are ill, only you will not say so. Do let me get you something. I can go into Miss Gargrave's room without disturbing her, and fetch you sal volatile, or red lavender, or eau de cologne. She keeps them all on her dressing-table."

Mr. Gargrave laughed outright. "Why, Lucy," he exclaimed, "you might as well offer to bring me some rouge and a plait of false hair, as the things you have mentioned. There, run away to bed, child."

"I do not like to go when you are ill"——

"I am not ill," he persisted; "that is, not ill in body."

"Then you are ill in mind, and that is far worse," she said, with a pretty wisdom.

"Why, how should you know, Lucy," and then he stopped suddenly, recollecting the one great grief which had left the girl an orphan.

"I wish you would let me do something for you," she continued, with quiet insistance. "It seems so strange to see you eating no supper."

He did not answer her immediately. All at once it recurred to him that the trouble which had come was as likely to affect her as him; that girl, child almost, as he had hitherto considered her, their interests were so interwoven, whatever of evil or good touched him must touch her. There were special reasons also to which hitherto he gave little heed why at that time if difficulty should come, difficulty even without ruin, she must be told all the ins and outs of the affair.

It had never been his habit to speak of any of the details of his business before his woman-kind. The circumstances of his early career in London were such as to render him reserved and self-contained, and in the surroundings of his later experiences there was nothing to induce communicativeness.

A foolish woman and a thoughtless child! If Mr. Gargrave ever summed up the persons composing his domestic circle he must have done it in those words. A woman who so thoroughly despised all business that she ignored, as far as she could possibly do so, the fact that but for business she would lack even daily bread; and a child who had been brought up so completely in the midst of commerce that it seemed to her as natural and as uninteresting as the mill-round of every-day existence.

Miss Gargrave considered that if right had been right—if everyone had his own—she ought to be the sister of a wealthy country gentleman instead of a "mere struggling trader;" whilst all Miss Holding knew about her own position was that her father had founded the factory which Mr. Gargrave, who she understood was come of grand people, carried on.

She had begun to call him guardian soon after he took up his abode at the cottage. First, Mrs. Dodson, the housekeeper, so styled him, and subsequently Miss Gargrave, when she brought her fan, and poodle, and laces, and essences, and ailments, and fine ladyism to the cottage, never dreamt of speaking of him to the girl as anything else.

By Mr. Holding's will he was left guardian to that gentleman's daughter, and of the complications connected with the making of that will Miss Gargrave and Lucy and Mrs. Dodson were utterly ignorant.

Mr. Gargrave, however, was not ignorant; and as he stood before the fire silent thoughts, bitter and self-reproachful, coursed through his mind.

Amongst the tangle of ideas one only was perfectly plain—Lucy must know, and know soon. He had considered the matter as affecting her when he refused the control of Miss Brockley's money; but he had not thought of telling the girl the position of affairs.

How and in what way he should now best enter into explanations with her was a problem—one he never, probably, could have solved for himself, but which she unconsciously was making plainer.

"Lucy!" at last he said.

"Yes, Guardian," she answered. All the time he was silent she had remained silent also, looking sometimes at him and sometimes at the fire, but waiting patiently for him to speak.

"Put down that candle and come here; I have something to say to you."

There was only one topic concerning which she felt sensitive; and, thinking what he desired to say must have reference to it, she blushed deeply as she obeyed.

He was considering the same topic, but only as it bore upon money matters. The girl had a lover who was personally distasteful to him, whose father he disliked, whose mother he disliked, whose brothers and sisters he disliked, and whose self he both disliked and despised. Nevertheless, there being nothing actually against the young man and his family—quite the contrary, indeed—he felt constrained, when asked for his consent, to agree that they should be engaged.

He did not throw any difficulties in the way of an early marriage, either; though the idea of the girl he remembered a little child being old enough to marry and be given in marriage at first struck him with a strange sense of unreality.

"Why, I must be getting an old man myself," he considered, when Mr. Suttaby first broached the idea of "my Russell and your Miss Lucy making a match of it;" and he was right. Age does not always count by years; and at thirty-three Mr. Gargrave looked over forty, and old enough to be guardian to all the parish.

Miss Holding had always regarded him as quite an aged person; but then youth is ever apt to take that view of those who are set in authority over them.

Mr. Gargrave, she imagined, was set in very high authority over her, and she consequently felt afraid that what he had to say concerned the young man she called Russell, and that he was going to find fault with her or him.

But Mr. Gargrave's first words dispelled this idea.

"I have had a great blow—a great trouble I should say—to-day," he began, correcting his first statement, as he remembered how literally she had interpreted the word "fight."

"I am very sorry," she said; and she looked sorry, though unintelligent.

"I have lost a large sum of money," he proceeded.

"Where?" she asked. "Oh! how did you manage to do that?"

It was hard work; it always is hard work to explain business matters to those who know nothing whatever about business.

The simplest terms in the language of commerce bear to outsiders a totally different meaning from that it is intended to convey, and the disaster and ruin which can be told to the initiated in half a dozen words has to be painfully interpreted and painfully repeated in the ears of those to whom City terms and City phrases are scarcely more intelligible than so much Greek.

Mr. Gargrave was patient, however. He was accustomed to this non-comprehension; for, let a business man be careful and silent as he will, sometimes a trade phrase must pass his lips, and such phrase never did pass his lips without eliciting a disclaimer from Miss Gargrave.

"I do not mean literally out of my pocket," he said, in answer to the girl's speech. "I did not lose my purse, as you did last summer, or have my pocket picked, like Mrs. Dodson. No, Lucy; it is a worse business than anything of that kind. I have made a bad debt; or, in plainer English, been swindled out of an amount of money which must produce serious embarrassment if not ruin."

"Ruin!" she repeated, aghast. That expression, at all events, was comprehensible.

"I did not mean that altogether," he said, hastily. "I may be able to pull through. I hope I shall; but it will be difficult work—cruel work," he added, as if speaking to himself.

"I wish I could help you," she cried. And she clasped her hands as she spoke, and all her innocent heart looked out tenderly through her eyes. "Oh! I wish I could."

Her simple words pierced his very soul. If, through him, she were brought to sorrow—if, through him, the small fortune her father hoped would be secured to her should be utterly lost—how could he bear the burden of his remorse? He had thought of this before, but he had not thought of it in the same way. If he had—but no, he could not, after due deliberation, have acted differently. He could not believe that the way to right one wrong was to perpetrate another. With eyes shut—blinded by hope, and egotism, and lack of the especial sort of experience now bought so dearly, he perilled the inheritance of this girl, the whole of which had been—morally, if not legally—intrusted to him, but, with his eyes open, he could not strive to retrieve an act of mad folly by committing a crime.

For it would have been a crime—as he told himself over and over, while fighting out his battle—to use Mrs. Brockley's money in sustaining his own credit. But yet, the contingency of losing the widow's modest competence was remote, and the difficulty of preserving his position and Lucy's not pressing. Had he been right? Had he not been too hasty? Might he not, even yet, use the means which lay in his very hands? Pish! was the argument all to be gone over again; was the demon of temptation rampant as ever; having made his choice, could he not abide by it whatever might betide; yes—whatever—

"Lucy," he said, hoarsely—he felt he must speak to someone, though the understanding of that someone might be no more able to grasp his meaning than that of a child in arms—"I could to-night have freed myself from anxiety about this affair. I had money enough to pay the liabilities I have incurred and plenty to spare beside, offered to me—sent to me—but I refused to use it."

"Did you? Was not that a pity?" she commented, wondering at his agitation, but having only the vaguest comprehension what he was talking about.

"I will tell you exactly how it happened. An old lady in the country sent me up a large sum—that is, a large sum to me and to her—to invest for her. She bade me use it in my own business if I pleased. I know she wanted me so to use it, because she believed it would be safe in my keeping."

"Yes, and it would surely," murmured the girl.

"No, I say it would not have been safe. I could not have made it absolutely secure. I might have lost it—business is never a certainty; what is good to-day may be bad to-morrow. I might have saved myself for the time being—for always, perhaps—and I might also have done no harm to her; but then, upon the other hand, there was a chance, and I dared not encounter it. No matter what became of this business—your father's business—I could not run the risk of beggaring her. Was I right?"

"Of course you were right," answered Lucy; but she would have answered the same had he reversed the position.

She had been brought up in the creed that Michael Gargrave could do no wrong; and though she puzzled over the story he told, and wondered most of all at his telling it to her, she was content to accept his reading of it as correct beyond doubt.

He saw the picture he presented seemed blurred and misty to her unaccustomed eyes—that although she was struggling to comprehend him she really did not understand the position.

"All this may affect you, Lucy," he said, after a pause, resting one arm on the mantelshelf and looking earnestly at her as he spoke.

"How do you mean?" she asked, in her childish simplicity.

"I will try to keep all harm from you," he went on; "but it is necessary for you to know that harm may come—harm I may be powerless to avert. I should like to-morrow to have a long talk with you about our relative positions. I think it is better for me to tell you how we came to be situated towards each other as we are. It is too late to go on talking now. You must be tired. If you do not get to sleep soon," he added, with an effort to speak lightly, "you will have pale cheeks in the morning."

"They are always pale," she said with a little pout, touching them with her fingers as she spoke. "I wish they were redder."

"They would not be half so pretty if they were," he answered without thought.

No need, then, for her to desire damask roses instead of white. Swift and hot the telltale blood rushed to her face, suffusing the cheeks she had despised with a colour which for the moment changed the character of her countenance.

Not knowing why she blushed, yet ashamed of blushing, she cast down her eyes and averted her head while she bade her guardian good-night.

"Good-night," he said, smiling kindly yet sadly, as he looked upon her fair young face. "Good-night. God bless you!" and he released the hand he held.

When for the second time she walked up stairs it was with a dazed and confused sensation that she had formed the acquaintance of another guardian and a second Michael Gargrave. For the first time in all the long years she had known the friend her father trusted she felt as if he were a living man and not an abstract impersonation—as if he were intelligible to her, interesting to her—something of kin as well as of kind, as if she could talk to him without fear, and listen to him speaking with sympathy. After she was in her own room she thought of him for a long time—thought about all Mrs. Dodson had told her anent the former glories of the Gargraves—thought without one spark of impatience of Miss Gargrave's endless narratives and pettish lamentations.

Upon his side, Mr. Gargrave also thought deeply concerning his ward; but when he had finished his cogitations he could not have told anyone what he had been thinking about her.

CHAPTER III.

SOMETHING ABOUT THE GARGRAVES.

It was true, as Miss Gargrave said, that her brother had not been brought up a "mere trader."

Michael Gargrave himself would have been the first to add, that "more was the pity," and to admit there might be a considerable amount of truth in the remark of Mr. Russell Suttaby—called not after the statesman, but after his godfather, a well-to-do clothier and one of the "Worshipful Company of Fan-makers"—that he "had not been brought up to anything half so honest."

Mr. Russell Suttaby, an exceedingly callow-looking youth, who thought himself an authority in neckties and poetry, who despised his own "governor," who felt ashamed of his mother—really in her way an admirable parent and capital manager—felt an unreasonable annoyance whenever Miss Lucy Holding mentioned any fact connected with Mr. Gargrave's ancestors.

It was not Mr. Gargrave's fault that he came of an old stock; but young Mr. Suttaby spoke as though it were not only his fault but his sin.

"If I had to earn my living in a stuffy old glass-works I would at least have sense enough to drop a lot of disreputable old grandfathers, who, I'll be bound, were no better than they should be," remarked Mr. Russell one summer's evening, when he and Miss Holding and his sisters were taking their walks abroad over the wide if not lovely expanse of Wanstead Flats. Mr. Russell Suttaby, clerk in a stockbroker's office, considered himself in all respects much superior to his lady-love's guardian, and was never weary of implying that he thought so, that little matter of old family notwithstanding.

"It is of no use talking to me about what a man was. All I concern myself with is what he is," was one of the many remarks on the subject of the Gargrave ancestry in which he indulged.

"My father founded the glassworks, and Mr. Gargrave never says a word about his grandfather or his father either," said Lucy, in defence both of her guardian and his business, upon the occasion of that walk across the flats.

"Well, if he does not, that old woman does, at any rate," persisted Mr. Suttaby. "I hate to go near the place. She looks as if she despised everybody—as if she was always smelling something unpleasant. I am sure her scents and perfumes, and airs and graces, are enough to make anyone sick."

"Her mother was a great heiress," remarked Lucy, deprecatingly.

"Then why has she no money?"

"And her father ought to have had Brayley."

"Then why had he not? If he ought to have had it, he would have had it. People can't be done out of their rights nowadays; it is all nonsense. Besides, what was Brayley—what is it? I dare say it is not worth a penny more than my uncle's house at High Beech. That is a place you must see, Lucy. My uncle has lovely gardens, the finest apricots I ever tasted. Are not they splendid, Jane?"

Thus appealed to, Miss Suttaby said they were, and in her turn proceeded to enlarge upon the beauties of the High Beech Paradise. Lucy meantime remaining silent, but unconvinced—snubbed, but not defeated.

To have despised the Suttabys would have been to despise the rank to which she herself belonged—to object to a man because he did not come of great people would have been to object to her dear, dead father, whom she had loved with all her loyal heart; but it was one thing to look down upon personal surroundings and another to speak slightingly of the Gargraves because they chanced to belong to a good family.

Though a disadvantage, it certainly was a fact that Michael Gargrave had been brought up to regard himself not as the possible but as the certain future possessor of "Brayley," in Southshire.

He was the eldest son of his father, Rokeby Gargrave, and when that gentleman had attained to the age of forty there only intervened between himself and Brayley the life of one sickly boy.

Brayley was a fine property, still a fine property, and one well worth coveting, spite of the fact that it was not the fault of any previous Gargrave a single rood of land belonged to the family.

Let them otherwise differ as they would, and as they did, in tastes, habits, modes of thought, the possessors of Brayley had almost from time immemorial been agreed that the only way to enjoy their ancestral estate was to make ducks and drakes of it.

With wonderful industry they each in succession devoted themselves to this experiment in ornithology, and it was only the law of entail, and those feuds which seem for providential reasons to rage in some races between owners and heirs, that had years previously prevented Brayley passing into the hands of some "Manchester man" or City millionaire.

Pride in the old place they took none, or, for that matter, pleasure either. For more than a century, at any rate, never a master of Brayley but had managed before his death to reduce his income to a merely nominal allowance; never a heir stepped into his predecessor's shoes who had failed to contract such engagements as fettered him pecuniarily for the remainder of his natural life.

Amongst the Gargraves, since the family decadence commenced until the advent of this sickly lad, Owen, not a single minor had been owner of the property—not a chance had occurred for money to accumulate during the childhood or boyhood of one of the line.

Middle-aged, or even old men, they succeeded to the estate (already heavily encumbered by a mortgage contracted so long previously that the nature of its origin had become a matter of tradition), burdened by debts incurred during a weary period of expectancy; by post obits; by bills; by life insurances; by all the shifts and devices to which needy men are compelled to resort while running barefoot because another man wears his own slippers too long for their convenience.

In the beginning of his career Mr. Rokeby Gargrave had been deprived of some of the advantages for pursuing the family branch of study, inasmuch as not being the eldest son of the eldest son, it was on the cards that some small Gargrave might be born, who should "cut him out," as Mr. Rokeby tersely phrased the results of the possible contingency.

His brother, however, being of a non-marrying disposition, and Mr. Rokeby Gargrave of a sanguine temperament, that gentleman, of nowhere in particular and of no profession at all, began, ere long, to consider himself, except as regarded that trifling matter of actual possession, the actual owner of Brayley, but the Jews, being of quite another way of thinking, utterly declined to embarrass his future prospects for him. Thrown thus back upon first principles, Mr. Gargrave, after he had spent his own fortune, derived from his mother, spent the fortune his wife brought him.

There was nothing in particular to show or to refer to when the two fortunes were gone; but it was the Gargrave way to get as little for money as gentlemen well could; and society therefore neither marvelled nor complained when the typical duck and drake alone remained to show Mr. Rokeby had ever possessed a halfpenny.

After that period of living upon capital, Mr. Gargrave lived partly upon his wits, which alone might not have supplied a nutritious diet, and greatly upon the faith of tradespeople.

Even now, despite co-operative stores and other incentives to radicalism and unbelief, there are left some shopkeepers who do possess an amount of faith at once pleasing and touching; and while Mr. Rokeby Gargrave was "waiting for his own," credit, as a rule, was the rule, and cash with order or money on delivery quite the exception.

Anyhow, Mr. Rokeby Gargrave did not send cash with his orders or pay for his goods on delivery—very much the contrary indeed; and such was the faith or folly of butcher and baker, and fishmonger, and all the rest of the purveying fraternity, that Mrs. Gargrave number one died without having experienced any of those privations she would indeed have found it very difficult to bear.

Having given her, on credit, a handsome funeral, provided and conducted by Messrs Velvet and Plumes, the eminent upholsterers, Mr. Gargrave looked about him. It had never been a failing of his to take very long views; indeed, voluntarily he would never have viewed his affairs at all.

Time, however, had passed on, and the credit and "promise-to-pay" system was wellnigh exhausted.

Accounts came in at less and less distant intervals; creditors called oftener than Mr. Gargrave liked; lawyers wrote to know what he proposed doing;" and even the schoolmaster who was training up the future owner of Brayley sent a letter stating that unless Mr. Gargrave could manage to post a cheque by an early date he must with much regret decline receiving Master Michael Gargrave after the Christmas holidays.

Things were therefore very bad indeed with Mr. Gargrave; and yet, in very truth, he had never been so near Brayley as at that period. Contrary to all expectation, his brother had married; but he was now dead, and there stood between Mr. Gargrave and fruition but one frail life—a life which no company would have insured, and which the doctors said could not possibly last long.

Nevertheless, as the boy had lived, the boy might live, or at all events drag on, for a considerable period; and in the mean time Mr. Gargrave's creditors wanted a settlement, and, failing a settlement, ceased to solicit the honour of his patronage—indeed, they refused his patronage altogether.

Thus, as has been said, Mr. Gargrave found existence difficult. Though he had removed to a new locality, the legend of his impecuniosity could not readily be left behind, and the tradespeople in his fresh neighbourhood were distressingly unanimous in refusing to let their goods leave their shops until paid for.

"If this goes on," said Mr. Gargrave to himself, with a simple yet tragic earnestness which proved how startling and unexpected was the situation, "I shall starve. I must write to my uncle."

Now, the uncle referred to was a shrewd old bachelor, who had never evinced any great liberality towards his sister's son, and it was not in the least degree likely he would assist him at this crisis. Nevertheless, Mr. Rokeby Gargrave wrote.

When the reply came, which it did promptly, it contained the simple statement that, however unpleasant the prospect of starving might seem to his nephew, it was a matter which could not be supposed to interest him.

"You speak of America or Australia," he proceeded—Mr. Gargrave having, indeed, mentioned those far-off continents as his possible destination. "If I am to starve," he said, "I had better do so where I am unknown."—"You speak of America or Australia. There is plenty of land to be had in either of those countries for a mere song, and emigration will cut the knot of all your present difficulties. If a five-pound note would be of any assistance to have in your pocket when you land (I conclude you mean to work your passage out), say so, and you shall have it by return of post. After all, it is a comfort to reflect there are places where a man willing to work need not starve."

This, being more than Mr. Gargrave could bear, he in his turn, dispatched an epistle covering four sides of a sheet of letter-paper, which commenced:—

"Sir,—A five-pound note would be of no use to me whatever;" and ended by saying that the writer considered Mr. Edward Rokeby "a disgrace to his order"—the last observation being emphasised by no less than three dashes.

This closed the correspondence; and once again Mr. Gargrave had to face his difficulties.

As for work, he never contemplated such a possibility. Begging he would not have minded—but then begging seemed of no use.

There was only one thing to which he could turn his attention, and on that he immediately concentrated his energies.

He would marry.

"Poor dear Matilda!" he thought, as this mode of extrication occurred to him. "She was always thoughtful; she died most opportunely."

So it got abroad that Mr. Rokeby Gargrave was going to marry "money;" and his creditors (creditors, as a race, are much given to catching at straws), believing, possessed their souls in patience till such time as that money should be applied to liquidating their little accounts.

For his first wife Mr. Gargrave, guided by prudential motives, had married a lady older than himself. In his second he selected—once again guided by pecuniary considerations—a girl just emancipated from a boarding school.

She ran away with him—he was a man who had always charmed women—and left behind the greatest part of her fortune.

Eighty thousand should have been her "dot:" but she (quite unconsciously) forfeited seventy-five thousand by marrying without the consent of her guardians.

"Was ever so unlucky a dog born!" exclaimed Mr. Gargrave, after a very bad quarter of an hour with those gentlemen. Then his troubles began in earnest; then came writs and lawyers' letters, and threats and performances.

The unanimity which prevailed amongst his creditors was wonderful. They all wanted one thing, and they all tried to get it in one way.

"There is a monotony about this," remarked Mr. Gargrave airily, trying to put a brave face on the matter; but no one could look at him and fail to see the struggle was too much for his selfish, indolent temperament. He grew thin and peevish; he worried his lawyers and bullied his family; he cried out that it was unjust; he swore a great many times—for about this time there was much variety in his language if not in his theme—that it was too bad he should be kept out of his own by a weazened, sallow, deformed, crofling cripple. He said his dead brother ought to have been ashamed of himself; he said the mother must be a very wicked woman; he called heaven and earth to witness that there had never been a man so wronged and persecuted as he; he demanded justice from the sun, and the air, and all those gods and goddesses, the names of which were about the only things remaining in his memory of an expensive classical education.

He declared he must go abroad, must leave his native country, and lay his bones upon a foreign shore, when once again fortune relented and dealt him another trump.

A very distant relation died, and left him twenty thousand pounds; and within a week after came a very sad letter from Mrs. Gargrave, saying she was about to take her son abroad.

It was a forlorn hope, but she meant to try it; and if Mr. Rokeby Gargrave, of whose misfortunes she had been sorry to hear, and on whose recent inheritance she begged to congratulate him, liked, during her absence, to take up his abode at Brayley, she would be very glad to think that the old place was so suitably occupied.

"Heaven be praised!" cried Mr. Gargrave, too excited at first to explain the cause of his delight to his wondering family. "Brayley is as good as our own. I wonder what those fiends of tradespeople will think now? They shall not have another order from me, if they asked for it on bended knees"—which lost a little of its point owing to the fact that no tradesman with whom Mr. Gargrave had ever had transactions was likely to desire their renewal upon any terms whatever.

Then, indeed, came a time of prosperity, during the continuance of which Mr. Gargrave basked in the sunshine, and caused his money to melt away like snow in thaw.

What matter about that paltry sum, however. Pooh! the whole amount was not equal to one year's income of Brayley.

When remonstrated with, as sometimes lawyers and others will remonstrate, even though they feel remonstrance useless, Mr. Gargrave was wont to reply,

"When poor Owen goes, of course I step into everything at once; and then, think of the accumulations. I am sure I don't wish the lad dead; but still, life must be a burden to him. Each post may bring the news that he is gone."

But the posts came in without bringing any news of the kind. According to his mother's account, the young fellow grew no stronger, but still he clung tenaciously to life. If it were indeed a burden, he seemed in no haste to lay it down.

"The doctors keep him alive," his uncle remarked, "but the vital spark is a mere glimmer. Any day or hour we may expect to hear it is extinguished altogether."

And strong in this faith, and perhaps to keep his hand in practice, Mr. Rokeby Gargrave went on spending as though he had come into a million instead of twenty thousand pounds.

In this time of prosperity young Michael shared. He had his horses, his dogs, his guns; anything the young heir might have possessed, and more freedom than any young heir would have been permitted.

He was not well educated; that, his father observed, might be regarded as a matter of quite secondary importance.

"It does not require much learning to spend thirty thousand a year," the older man was wont sapiently to remark. "And he will have that, at any rate, when I am in the family vault. Better have good health than a knowledge of all the tongues living or dead. What did study do for my poor brother? He might have been alive now if he had not addled his brains with that Hebrew trash he was so fond of."

When Michael Gargrave was about sixteen years old some friend of the family suggested the propriety of his being placed in the way of learning a profession.

"You must remember," reasoned this individual, "that your nephew is not dead yet."

"And none of us wish him to be," retorted Mr. Gargrave, in an access of virtue. "To grudge a poor creature like that a few months of life—if living it can be called—we should, indeed, be mercenary."

"But supposing he should live for, say, twenty years?"

"My dear fellow, I can't suppose an impossibility. It is a mere question of time, and not a question of a very long time first, either, I am afraid."

But, still, no harm could be done by educating your son for a profession."

"Well, I am not so sure of that. A landed proprietor should, in my opinion, be a landed proprietor pure and simple, not a parson, or a lawyer, or a doctor, or a soldier, but just the owner of the soil, with his interests concentrated in the soil and those who reside upon it."

"Humph!" commented the friend, who knew very well indeed that the Gargraves had far too often found their interests widely at variance from the interests of the men who rented their farms and tilled their fields.

By the time Michael Gargrave was eighteen it may be a question whether his father did not again consider the owner of Brayley an unreasonable time about that simple little matter of dying.

Creaking gates should not stay on their hinges for ever, and the young fellow had been creaking for over twenty-one years.

Further, Mr. Gargrave had not only run through his fresh patrimony, but exhausted his fresh credit. From the time when his nephew came of age things had been a little "difficult" for the elder man, and when things began to be "difficult" they generally end by becoming unpleasant.

"If that fellow lives much longer," he said to his wife, "I shall have to go into the Gazette."

"The sooner the better, dear, I should think," she answered, with exasperating amiability, "and then we shall be rid of those dreadful people who are always now asking us for money."

While affairs were thus once again hovering on the verge of ruin: when, in fact, nothing but the Brayley property could have saved Mr. Gargrave, news came to England that a new physician had been so successfully treating the young heir that there was every hope of his yet been restored to health.

"Poor thing!" said Mr. Gargrave, pityingly referring to his sister-in-law. "Some quack has got hold of her, I doubt, now. Very likely the improvement she speaks of is but the final flicker."

It was a very hopeful flicker, at all events. Letter succeeded to letter; and finally Mrs. Gargrave announced that she and her son, who was very much better, trusted to return to England in the course of the following summer.

Here was a contingency no one had ever taken into calculation. That Owen Gargrave should recover would have seemed the wildest of all wild imaginings, and yet here he was recovering. He whose life had been thought scarcely worth a day's purchase was as likely to live as the best of them.

It was horrible, but it was true. Mr. Gargrave might rave and blaspheme; I regret to say he did both; but his utterances could not alter facts.

He said dreadful, unpardonable things—things which coming later to the mother's ears she never forgot and never forgave.

As for the creditors, they were "neither to hold nor to bind," they were simply furious. They called their debtor harder names than he called his nephew; and, in fine, from a storm of writs and clamour of furious tongues, Mr. Gargrave retired to the Continent, where he was in due time followed by Mrs. Gargrave and the junior members of the family—none of them, be it understood, quite destitute of the hope that they might yet return to England in triumph.

After all, there was but a life between them and Brayley, and who could tell?

CHAPTER IV.

MICHAEL GARGRAVE.

When the dark days come, friends are sometimes conspicuous by their absence; but at first around the Gargraves friends, such as they were, gathered in numbers.

To say truth, people could not believe in the extent and thoroughness of the collapse. Many persons found it impossible to believe that Brayley was virtually gone from Mr. Rokeby Gargrave; others could not credit the extent of his folly. A time, of course, arrived when everyone realised that Mr. Gargrave's sun had gone down in darkness—that for him there would be no more cakes and ale, though his son was gone into the City to "make his fortune."

"What is to become of Michael?" asked that young man's godfather when the collapse occurred.

"He, poor fellow? Oh! he'll have to go on 'Change, or something of that kind. It is a new thing for Gargraves to become tradesmen; but if I were a younger man I should devote myself to business. I should, indeed."

Business in the estimation of Mr. Rokeby Gargrave being a sort of gold-mine very easy indeed to work, though it could not be regarded as otherwise than infra dig. to labour in it.

"He will want some capital, though, won't he?" suggested the other, whose ideas on the subject were almost as hazy as those of the man he addressed.

"Capital? No, no; that is not needed in trade. Things are bought and sold without a shilling of actual money changing hands. All that is required is to know where to buy and where to sell."

When the family solicitor was consulted on this point, he expressed some doubts as to whether Mr. Gargrave's view of commercial matters could be regarded as quite correct; but, as he also had heard of fortunes being made by beggars—of millionaires who had originally been possessed of precisely five farthings when they crossed London Bridge, he felt chary of expressing any very decided opinion, and contented himself by offering to write to his agents and make inquiries.

In reply, his agents said he was quite correct in imagining that the amassing of large fortunes in trade was the exception, and the compassing of merely a moderate income, or sometimes no income at all, the rule. "Success depended," they went on to state, "not merely upon individual talent, but the circumstances in which the individual possessed of talent chanced to be placed."

"Very much depended upon a good beginning. A fair start was most important to a young man. The office he entered, the commercial education he received, were matters which sometimes proved of vital importance."

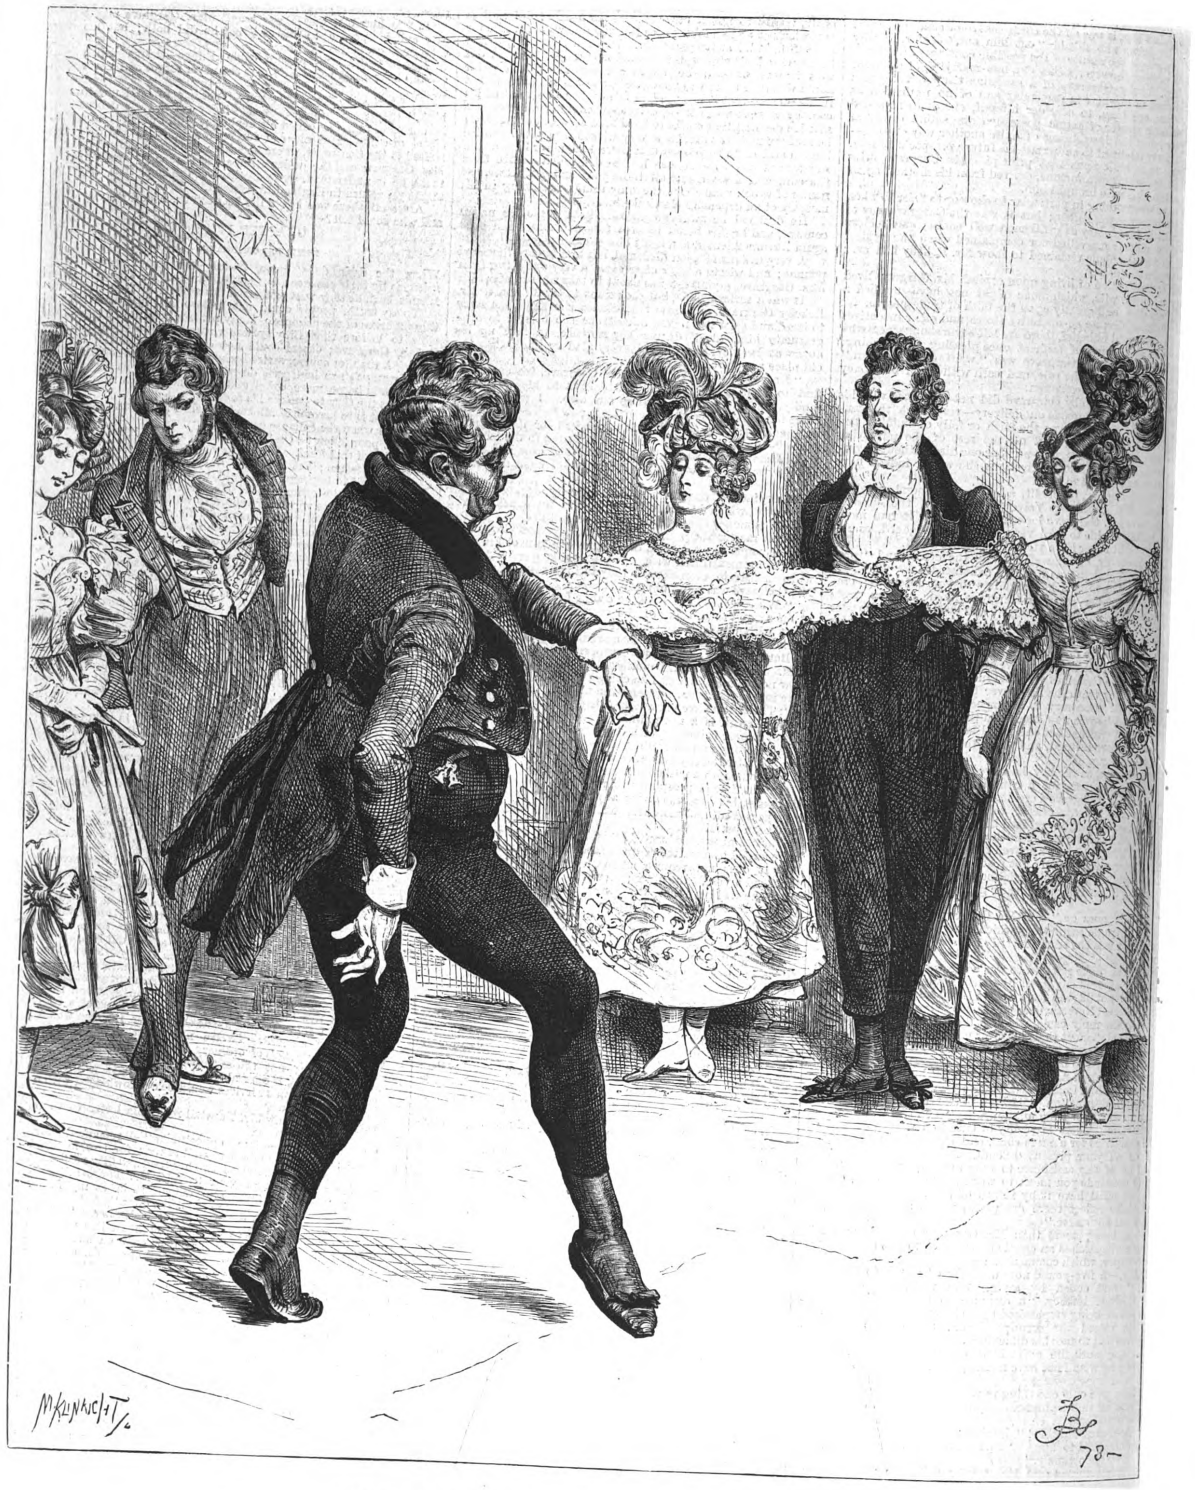
"That all sounds very sensible," said Michael Gargrave's godfather. "Write and ask them, Mr. Tunstall, if you please, whether by chance they happen to know of an office where a young fellow who has never given his attention to such matters could be trained into becoming a successful merchant."

Duly the letter was written, duly the reply came back. Quite by chance Mr. Tunstall's London agents did happen to know of a firm willing to receive the son of a gentleman (this was underlined), and instruct him in all the details of a most profitable business, for the moderate premium of two hundred and fifty pounds. The usual pecuniary consideration they received was five hundred; but as they (Mr. Tunstall's correspondents) were interested about the matter, the firm would take half that amount. Twelve months, they considered, might teach any person of ordinary ability all it was necessary for him to learn; but the arrangement could be extended beyond that period, if agreeable to both parties, in which case the young gentleman's services would be acknowledged with a suitable honorarium.

Very triumphantly Mr. Tunstall read this letter to those interested in its contents.

"Fine opening—fine opportunity"—remarked Mr. Gargrave; "but they might as well ask me for two hundred and fifty thousand, or, indeed, two hundred and fifty millions."

"It is very good of your friends, Mr. Tunstall," said Michael; "but you must see yourself it is, as my father suggests, impossible for me to accept the offer."



"Look here, Michael," broke in his godfather. "If you mean to work, and try to break through all this wretched tangle, I will help you. My income is only an annuity, as you know; but I have saved some few hundreds, and they may as well be yours now as when I am dead and gone. Now do not say a word, please. If you wish to get to work, Mr. Tunstall and I will settle all the preliminaries."

And so, without much more talk, it was settled. The generous old gentleman, risking his hardly-saved hundreds; and Michael, full of hope, and zeal, and faith in himself and London, accepted his godfather's offer as frankly as it was frankly made.

So to London he went. After a short time he found lodgings in Walworth, and walked thence, each working morning, to the offices of Messrs. Casserow, Glinton, and Co., Martin's-lane.

After his first introduction to that establishment he wrote a glowing account of its glories to his father and godfather. "There is so much plate-glass and polished mahogany and brass and lacquer work that one's senses are fairly dazzled," he said. "Each of the partners has a private office, the floor of which is covered with a Turkey carpet. Even in the waiting-room there is a library table as large and far handsomer than that at Brayley. The 'messenger' wears a livery, and is resplendent with silver buttons. There are five young fellows in the office, each of whom has paid a premium to come in, varying in amount from three hundred to six hundred pounds. I cannot yet quite make out what the business is. So far, not one of us has done anything except direct circulars and copy letters."

Time passed on, and Mr. Michael Gargrave still failed to make out what the business was. He had become almost perfect in the matters of addressing circulars and copying letters, and was longing for a change of occupation, when one afternoon two persons came into the office and asked to see Mr. Casserow, failing Mr. Casserow Mr. Glinton, failing Mr. Glinton the Company, and failing the Company the Manager.

Failing as regards even the last-named personage, the better-dressed of the two concluded "he would wait a bit."

When told the return of the firm that day was extremely uncertain he said that did not much matter to him, and he still thought he had better "wait a bit."

As he refused all offers of the newspaper, the clerks telegraphed meaning looks to each other signifying their belief that he could not read; and, as he volunteered no attempt at conversation, it was inferred he and his companion must be of unsocial dispositions.

About five o'clock Mr. Casserow, bustling into the office, beheld the pair who had resisted all efforts to get them into the waiting room.

"Oh! it's you, is it?" said Mr. Casserow, carelessly. "Step this way, will you?" and he opened the door of his own sanctum.

After a little while he rang his bell, and, saying that he should be engaged for some time, observed that the clerks need wait no longer.

Next morning, when the clerks arrived at business, they found the shutters up, and one of the yesterday's men in calm possession of the mahogany fittings, the many-drawered tables, the Turkey carpets, and the three safes.

Mr. Casserow, Mr. Glinton, the Co., or their money, they never saw again. The game, which had not been successful, was played out, and all the young fellows who had learned the business of addressing circulars and copying letters were adrift on the world of London.

For, as a rule, they were not merely dupes but poor dupes, and the amount necessary to teach them "business knowledge," under the auspices of Messrs. Casserow and Co., had been raised with difficulty by friends and relatives, in most cases badly off themselves.

All in vain Michael Gargrave searched for employment. He advertised; he answered advertisements; but there was a beautiful unanimity in the way people refused to have anything to do with him.

And when he came dispassionately to consider the extent of his own acquirements, he could not avoid feeling that people had reason.

"I can read and write and cipher," he thought; "and that is about all. Employers would be very foolish, indeed, to have anything to do with me; though my poor father believed I had but to come to London to conquer."

One day, when returning, thoroughly disheartened, from places where "No!" seemed the stereotyped answer on men's lips, he chanced to see stuck up in the dirty window of a pokey little wholesale glass warehouse a paper on which was written in round hand,

"A boy wanted. Enquire within."

After a minute's irresolution he crossed the threshold, and then paused to see what would happen next.

At a desk in the background sate a man who, on catching sight of him, came forward and said,

"What may your business be, Sir?"

"You want a boy," explained the young fellow, pointing to the legend in the window.

"Well, yes, I do," confessed the other, reluctantly, as one who felt he was being driven to make an irrelevant and unnecessary admission.

"Will you take me?"

"If you think you can play any of your jokes here you're mistaken, and will find yourself so, swell or no swell. Come, get out of this," and the irate trader pointed a very dirty hand towards the door.

"Pray do not be angry. I am not joking. I never felt less like joking in my life. I want work, and as I can't get man's work, let me try if I am able to do boy's. I do not care what it is—I 'll sweep out this place now, if you like; it looks as if it would be the better for it—only try me."

With his legs a little apart, with his hands thrust deep in his pockets, with a perplexed frown on his forehead, and a very dubious expression in his eyes, Mr. Holding surveyed the individual who made this proposition; but at last he said,

"Well, suppose I do?"

"You won't repent giving me the chance."

"Very well, then, you shall have a trial; but, remember, you will have to work."

"All right. What should you like me to work at first?" and Mr. Michael Gargrave was looking about him for a convenient nail on which to hang his coat and hat, when his employer arrested that purpose.

"I must have a reference," he said. "If the angel Gabriel came asking for a situation, I would not take him unless he gave me one."

"I am not an angel," answered Gargrave, laughing; "but I dare say I can give a satisfactory reference."

Mr. Holding said nothing in reply; but he watched with shrewd observant eyes the young fellow as he wrote down an address.

CHAPTER V.

MR. HOLDING'S VENTURE.

After all, the whilom heir-presumptive of Brayley had neither to wheel a truck nor sweep out the warehouse. Mr. Holding, having been grieved in spirit by long and weary experience of the general inefficiency and self-sufficiency of young men who came asserting they could do everything, knew how to value this good-looking, well-mannered stranger, who did his best, and who was most earnestly willing and anxious to learn; and, consequently, instead of taking Michael at his word, he put him straight to the desk, made him write letters, copy accounts, and finally initiated him into the mysterics of double entry and day-book and ledger work.

After he had been a month in Mr. Holding's service he wrote to his godfather an account of the collapse of Casserow and Co., only too happy that he could tell the kindly old man his money had not been totally thrown away.

"I am doing very well indeed," he said. "Mr. Holding pays me a salary; he is very kind; and I am in a fair way of learning something more about business than directing envelopes and copying letters."

From all which it will probably be inferred that Michael Gargrave was made of quite another metal than his purposeless, extravagant, foolish father.

Very bitter had been the young fellow's experience when the crash came. Very hard things were said to him by irate creditors. Home truths were told without consideration or delicacy—truths that made him wince, but that proved of incalculable benefit, nevertheless.

Roughly—very roughly—he was shown that there were other interests in the world besides those of the Gargraves. People thought it none the less hard to be "robbed of their money" by "a set of swindlers"—so some of Mr. Gargrave's creditors expressed the transaction—because the chief swindler was a "fellow whose ancestors wore chain armour in the thirteenth century," to quote poor James Hannay's definition of a gentleman.

No. If it were righteous that a man's children should suffer for his sins (and though he could not understand the reason for this hard truth he accepted its necessity), it was quite just that Rokeby Gargrave's eldest-born should have to earn the bread he ate, and be thankful he was able to get bread even on such terms.

Though scarcely more than a lad, he faced his difficulties like a man. When he went to Mr. Holding's he was still, like David, "but a youth, ruddy and of a fair countenance;" and it might have touched anyone acquainted with his antecedents to see how bravely he took up his burden, and without complaint or faltering bowed his shoulders under it.

Never brought up to know the value of money—for, indeed, not a creature in Mr. Gargrave's household seemed able to understand that there are but twenty shillings in a pound—during his first London experiences he wasted almost as much as he spent; not in riotous living or with any consciousness of being prodigal, but merely because he had still to learn how to fit his expenditure to his income.

Further, it was natural that the gorgeousness of Messrs. Casserow's surroundings should mislead him as to the stability of his own prospects. What more certain than that at the end of the twelvemonth his future services would "be suitably acknowledged;" indeed, in the goodness of his heart, Mr. Casserow once personally assured him that such should be the case.

Thus it came to pass that, economical though the young fellow believed himself to be, he computed everything upon too broad and liberal a scale.

His lodgings were too dear, his landlady too profuse in her ideas. If his food were plain, it was expensive; and he had always, perhaps, too much small change in his pocket. At all events, whatever the reason—and he could have given no reason for the fact: he less than any one, most likely—when the collapse of Messrs. Casserow, Glinton, and Co. came there was very little left of the amount his godfather had given him to provide necessaries during his year of probationship, and that little he further diminished by a loan to his landlady—an advance she called it, but as he had to leave his lodgings and she her house before a fortnight passed over their heads, perhaps the word gift more accurately described the nature of the transaction

Accordingly, when he asked permission to do "boy's work" he was almost at his last sovereign, and, as the salary Mr. Holding gave could certainly not be considered extravagant, Michael Gargrave often found the problem of living difficult.

But he never complained; to father, or godfather, or employer he never spoke of the straits to which he was reduced. Often he was cold, often he was hungry, always his food was insufficient, and he could have told of Sundays when he walked miles and miles to kill the weary time he was forced to stay out, so that his landlady might not suspect he had not the wherewithal to buy the dinners she professed herself willing upon the seventh day to cook.

Youth kept him up, however—youth and a certain dogged determination and laudable pride which he inherited from some forgotten ancestor, possibly one of the gentlemen who had figured in chain armour.

"So long as the seams of my coat did not get white," he said long afterwards, when speaking about this period of struggle, "I felt I could bear anything. Happily I had a good stock of clothes, and with care they lasted wonderfully; not quite so well as the garments of the Israelites perhaps, but still almost miraculously. By the time they were so shabby that I felt ashamed to give them away, I was able to buy suits that did well enough for business, though they might have made a West-End tailor weep. I never shall forget my poor father looking at me the first and only time I ran over to France to see him."

"What have you got on, Michael?" he asked, speaking more in sorrow than in anger.

In the first enthusiasm of going out to earn his living the young fellow—who understood well enough that his father's creditors considered not merely the personal belongings but the actual skin of the members of the family belonged to them, and could have found it in their hearts to nail the cuticle to the church doors by way of public example, as a gamekeeper hangs up a kite against some exposed barn—had chivalrous ideas of denuding himself of everything save his poorest and oldest garments, and selling off all he possessed for the benefit of those who had been despoiled.

His watch, his studs, his small stock of jewellery, consisting principally of presents from those who regarded him as the future owner of Brayley; these things he had collected together preliminary to offering them for sacrifice when his godfather quenched the flame of his ardour with this remark:

"Why, my poor Michael, all your goods and chattels would not pay the hundredth part of a farthing in the pound of your father's liabilities Keep your small possession, boy; and, if it be any comfort to you, remember, I say, these people are not so much to be pitied, after all. The sum total of the matter is that they played for high stakes and lost, and they are indignant accordingly If Owen had died, you would never have heard anything concerning the iniquty of running in debt, though the iniquity would actually have been just the same."

Concerning his new clerk Mr. Holding knew rather less than employers generally do know of their employés. He heard from his reference that Michael was respectable and of good family. With his own eyes he saw he was a gentleman, or what he called a "swell." The bloom was still on that peach, the rough world had not yet rubbed all the down of pleasant prosperity from young Gargrave's appearance.

That time when tailors might have wept to see the cut of his garments, and one by one the careful habits of younger days began, like the ruddy countenance, to fade away and be forgotten, had not yet arrived; and sometimes Mr. Holding, looking at the youth as he came briskly walking up to the office, would wonder vaguely how long he should keep him, when he would made it up with his friends.

For that Michael had quarrelled with his friends, and had come to London in a huff to seek his fortune was one of the fixed opinions of Mr. Holding's life; indeed, it may be questioned whether to the hour of his death he did not entertain a belief that young Gargrave had come into the city quite as a matter of choice.

"Perhaps there was a girl at the bottom of the business," thought Mr. Holding, whose forte did not lie in imagination; "but he is full young for that sort of thing. Perhaps they wanted him to go into the Church; some lads do object to be controlled by their elders."

Mr. Holding could not make the affair out—indeed, he did not puzzle much about it, except as any change in Mr. Gargrave's plans might affect himself.

Some hint of this sort he let drop when he proposed to teach the new-comer how to keep a set of books.

"Not that there is much good in your learning anything of that kind," he remarked, "as I suppose you will soon be going back to your friends."

Michael looked at him in amazement.

"They 're rich, arn't they?" proceeded Mr. Holding.

"Some of them are," answered the young man.

"Then they won't like your stopping much longer in the City, I take it."

"Oh! they don't mind," said Michael. "I may stop here for ever for all they care."

"I would not talk that way if I was you," remarked Mr. Holding; "it is never well for young folks to set themselves altogether against their elders."

"But I haven't set myself against my elders," explained this one "young folk," desperately.

Mr. Holding shook his head sagely.

"You see, their notions may be different," he persisted; and Michael gave up the task of explanation as hopeless.

Some time after this—a long time, indeed, as months count in any place, save in London, where days and weeks fly past at express speed—Mr. Holding recurred to his clerk's supposed position.

"You said your friends were rich, didn't you?"

"Some of them are," answered the young man, not caring to enlarge upon his father's position amongst his well-to-do kindred.

"A few thousands could be raised by 'em without much difficulty, perhaps?"

Michael Gargrave thought it possible, wondering what his employer's drift was in suggesting such a question.

"Do you think, now, any of them would feel disposed to buy you a partnership in a likely business?"

Michael answered that he felt particularly sure none of them would.

"Don't approve of your taking to trade, I suppose?"

"It does not matter much to them what I take to," replied the young man, "and, indeed, there is no reason why it should matter."

"I would not talk like that, I would not, indeed," remonstrated Mr. Holding, in whose ideas, as in his conversation, there was a certain monotony.

"I am only speaking the truth," said Michael.

"Well, I dare say you are; but there may be faults on both sides. Mostly there are faults on both sides."

Michael was about to answer that he did not see in this case why Mr. Holding should imagine there need be any fault at all; but he remembered how far his father's ways had led him out of the family fold, and held his tongue.

"I know of a thing that I thought might suit them if they had any notion of the sort," Mr. Holding remarked, after a long pause.

"Any notion of what sort?" asked the young man, whose thoughts had naturally followed his employer's latest sentence.

"Buying you a share—a partnership," explained Mr. Holding, who knew Michael was still almost as ignorant of trade terms as Michael at a later period found Lucy.

"They would not think of such a thing," said the young man, decidedly; and from his tone Mr. Holding felt more satisfied still that between his clerk and his clerk's "folks" there had been what he mentally called "a few words."

The years went by. Looking forward, Michael Gargrave never would have believed that they could have so flown; but they had come and they were gone, and the days at Brayley seemed like a dream; and the stony-hearted streets of London, the grind of office work, the privations of his City experiences remained a reality. He was doing better now. His salary was larger; he understood how to manage his resources; he had learned to do without, if he had not forgotten, those small niceties of dress and habits which in the outset of a career prove such a drawback to every man who does not figuratively commence the business fight in his shirt-sleeves.

A gentleman, unless he has ample command of money, is always in a civilised country at a disadvantage when set to earn his living, because the circumstances of birth and education have taught him to need so much. Upon the other hand, he can speedily learn to do without the things he has hitherto considered necessaries, because in that category he has generally placed lowdown in the list, if at all, personal luxuries—sleeping soft, eating often and of rich food, drinking of other than the simplest beverages.

At first it seems strange to have to consider such matters; but it is not difficult to deny himself; so at least Michael Gargrave discovered, and I believe his experiences will be found but the reflex of the experiences of hundreds of other brave lads from country parsonages; of "mothers' darlings," younger sons of country gentry, richer in pedigrees than acres; of all the goodly company that year after year have come up to swell the rank and file of that great and best business army which has for its motto, "Honour and honesty first; and wealth, if it please God to send it, afterwards."

Stinting himself, working hard, a very humble but a very efficient labourer amongst thousands of other labourers, Michael Gargrave had made his way upwards till he was in receipt of a fair income for so young and inexperienced a man.

A very faithful servant—a servant who would no more have dreamed of trying to form a trade for himself by stealing his master's customers and making a connection through his knowledge of his employer's correspondents than he would have thought of taking his money—a servant happily destitute of self-consciousness, of the belief that he did his work admirably, that he was too good for his position, and a "better man," morally, mentally, and socially, than the person who paid him his salary.

It was quite the contrary in some ways. Indeed, Michael felt the highest respect for Mr. Holding. Too new to London to understand the nature of Mr. Casserow and his confederates when he was copying their letters and directing their circulars, he knew now they were little if at all better than swindlers—men who, richly deserving to be prosecuted, managed nevertheless to keep themselves through all their rogueries within the letter of the law; but Mr. Holding was different altogether.

His word might well have been taken for his bond; in all the years spent in his office Michael Gargrave had never known him do a mean or dishonourable action.

His trade—a poor enough one when contrasted with that of many a man who did not work one half so hard—was as straightforward as himself. There could be no deception in it as regarded quality, and with reference to price he adopted the rule of a uniform percentage—so far as such a rule could, considering the fluctuations of cost and quantity of production, be maintained.

He had no secrets in his warehouse. His books, all of them, were open to his clerk, who could see what profits Mr. Holding made, what losses he incurred, what accounts were due to the business, what sums were owing by the business.

As to what Mr. Holding did with his profits young Gargrave knew nothing, however.

Except that he was acquainted with the address of his private house, Mr. Holding, out of business hours, might have been a total stranger to his clerk. Michael had never been asked inside his employer's doors, and it had never occurred to him that he wanted to be asked.

Of Mr. Holding in his domestic capacity, indeed, Michael never thought at all. He might have been a bachelor, a husband, a widower, the father of many children or of none, for all the young man knew or cared about the matter.

However admirable, Mr. Holding was not a man whose acquaintance many persons who met him in business would have been likely to desire. He was taciturn, and, when he did speak, prone to deliver himself as though his utterance of any sentence were something done against his will and under protest. A man whose manners were against him, and whose appearance was against him also; but who was possessed, nevertheless, of a warm heart and a faithful nature.

One morning in the summer, after he had completed his twenty-fourth year, Michael Gargrave, having then been five summers in Mr. Holding's employment, said to that gentleman—

"Do you remember, Sir, telling me long ago that you knew of a partnership which might suit me if my friends were disposed to buy me one?"

Mr. Holding laid down his pen and confessed that he thought he did remember the circumstance.

To anyone unacquainted with his peculiarities his tone was so unpromising that the conversation might well have ended here; but his clerk had not spent five years with him in vain, and so proceeded—

"Do you happen to know of anything which would suit me now?"

"That is as it may be," answered Mr. Holding, and spoke never another word till he had finished checking off an invoice, then he said—

"So you want to leave me, Gargrave."

"No, Sir, I don't want to leave you," replied the young man, not without emotion, for there was a tone of sadness in his employer's voice. "We have been together a long time, and no one need desire a better master; but I have a little money now, and I suppose I may as well go in for making more. Money seems to be considered the only good in this world, and, at any rate, there is nothing much else left to me to live for."

Mr. Holding looked at his clerk.

"It must be a young woman this time," he thought, but he only remarked—

"I would not talk like that if I was you. Money is very good in its way. There is nothing in its way better, but it is not all for anybody—it is not all by a great deal for you."

Michael did not answer—he thought at that juncture as he had thought several times before when his rich friends were on the tapis, that there was no use in trying to explain matters to Mr. Holding.

There is nothing that conquers taciturnity like taciturnity. In the very nature of things if one will not speak another must. Mr. Holding had often found this necessity forced upon him by his clerk's silence, and he found it now.

"About what amount were you thinking of investing?" he asked, after a pause, which seemed longer than it actually was.

"I have been left a legacy of over two thousands pounds," answered the young man.

"Ay! I noticed you had on a black band," said Mr. Holding. "A near relation?"

"No relation at all—but the best friend I ever had in my life or ever shall have again."

"I would not say that," suggested Mr. Holding, who intended the observation as soothing.

"Why not?" asked his clerk; "It is a fact. He was only my godfather; but I loved and respected him as I never"——

Michael stopped short. He had been going to add, "as I never loved and respected my father," but he paused in time. No man had ever heard him speak lightly of his parent, and he was resolved no man ever should.

"And he has left you this sum of money?"

"Yes, all he had to leave. I never expected anything."

And the young man turned his head aside and affected to be busily engaged in sorting over some letters. This precise form of trouble was new to him, and he did not bear it so philosophically as he had hard living and scant comfort in the early part of his career.

Further, Mr. Holding, this time, chanced to be right. There was a young woman—though she would have felt scandalised to think any one could dream of so designating her.

"Beware, she is fooling thee!" Michael's godfather warned him kindly and sadly.

The old man was staying in London so as to be near better medical advice than he could obtain in his own part of the country, and at his house Michael met the maiden "fair to see" who cost him, at that time, many a heartache.

A stately maiden, exceeding beautiful, with the lily and the rose sort of loveliness, blue-eyed, fair-haired. Ah! well and a-lack-a-day! and for him it was pitiful, though but play to her.

The time came when, looking in the toy-shop windows, Michael was ungallant enough to trace a strong resemblance between the plump fatuous-looking wax dolls, all tricked out in silks and laces, and his deceitful mistress, but that time was not yet; and, though the "young man" acknowledged the "young woman" to be wise enough in her generation for refusing to accept aught beyond his admiration, still the wound pained none the less for all that.

"I will turn the matter over in my mind," said Mr. Holding, after giving the young fellow time to recover himself. "The affair I mentioned long ago is still open; but I am doubtful whether it would suit you."

"Why?" asked Michael.

"It is not making the way I expected," answered Mr. Holding. "To be quite plain with you, it was a notion of my own, and I am not sure that it will ever come to much."

"I dare say it would come to enough for me."

"I can't tell. I don't know what your notions may be."

"They are not very extravagant," said Michael.

"Well, I will turn the matter over in my mind," repeated Mr. Holding, and took up another invoice as a hint that the conversation had better come to an end.

This talk took place on a Monday; and when the next Saturday came round Mr. Holding remarked,

"I think I have considered that business of yours in all its bearings; and if you would care to look at the thing I have in hand you are welcome to do so."

Michael said he was very much obliged, and he felt obliged.

"I won't have you walk into the concern in the dark," explained Mr. Holding; "so you had better come over to my place this evening and see what the affair is. If after that you think you would care for the business, why you had better take three months and turn it over in your mind. However you decide, there need be no difference between us as far as I am concerned."

Once again Michael thanked him.

"Yes, you had better come over to my place" repeated Mr. Holding, meditatively. "We can have a cup of tea, and then walk across the Marshes. Come just as you are, you know; there is not much in the way of fashion about Old Ford."

Certainly, it had never occurred to young Gargrave that there was much in the way of fashion about Mr. Holding. Nevertheless, he made such alterations in his attire as he considered respectful to that gentleman; and, free from the dust of the City, he repaired at the hour arranged to Old Ford.

Arrived there he soon perceived that upon whatever extravagance Mr. Holding might spend the profits derived from his business, it was not on house rent, or sumptuous raiment, or luxurious living.

His residence was small and dingy; the furniture it contained old, and, though substantial, of a description that laid as little claim to convenience as to elegance. The meal to which Michael brought the healthy appetite of a person unaccustomed to dainties, was of an eminently simple character—bread and butter (the bread brown and white), a madeira cake which no one touched); watercresses, and shrimps, a delicacy, Mr. Holding said, "I myself am very partial to," even though accompanied by strong black tea, very strong and very good, terms not often synonymous, but identical in this instance; because, as Mr. Holding explained, "I can't bear tea that has been left brewing"—could not be considered a repast open to objection on the score of expense.

"I generally pick a bit of something about nine o'clock," remarked Mr. Holding after he had watched with satisfaction his guest working steadily down a piled-up plateful of brown bread-and-butter. "I rarely trouble about eating much in the middle of the day; so, if you are sure you won't take any more tea, we will be off now, and by the time we get back we shall find supper nearly ready. Perhaps, though, you might like to sit a while," added Mr. Holding, who from the moment Michael entered the house had quite sunk the employer in the host. "No? Then I will get my hat. Thank you, Lucy," he added, as his little daughter brought him the article named. "You never let your father speak twice for anything, or look once for it himself, do you?" and he touched her head gently with his hand, by way of caress.

He was not a demonstrative parent, and yet Michael had not been five minutes in the house before he knew there was but one thing in the world John Holding loved—his motherless child.

"She is very like you," the young man remarked, as they walked away from the house; and, indeed, between the unformed and almost plain little girl and the rugged, ragged-whiskered, world-worn man there was one of those whimsical family resemblances which are as subtle as they are impossible to define.

So far as he had thought of her at all, Michael had considered the child ugly. He saw her eyes were too large, and her mouth too wide, and her skin too sallow; but, then, her father was not beautiful, and she resembled him.

"Do you think so?" said Mr. Holding, answering his companion's words. "Now, I always fancy she has a look of her mother;" and, as he spoke, there came an expression over his face Michael Gargrave had never seen on it before.

Almost in silence they pursued their way up Wick-lane, and thence across the Marshes, where, on that fine summer evening, plenty of people were walking.

"It is a pleasant place," remarked Mr. Holding; and Michael politely agreed with him, though, at the time, the calm monotony of that portion of the Lea valley did not strike him as particularly captivating.

"I have been across there in every sort of weather," observed Mr. Holding; and Michael tried to interest himself in the subject and failed.

If his employer had told him what they were going to see, the case might have been different; but Mr. Holding, having decided to hold over his secret for a crushing surprise, walked on, determinedly ignoring the topic of which both were thinking, and resolutely discoursing of others, many of which had not the remotest attraction for either of them.

It was upon that occasion Michael Gargrave received much information concerning the river Lea, and learned for certain Father Prout had nothing further from his mind than Hackney Cut and the Essex Marshes when he wrote

> For the bells of Shandon
> That sound so grand on
> The pleasant waters of the River Lee.

"That is quite another Lea," explained Mr. Holding, in answer to his companion's inquiry. "In the South of Ireland, I believe. My wife used to say those lines. She was wonderful fond of poetry and story-books."

Poor wife! poor husband! Michael would have liked to ask more about the dead woman, who was "wonderful fond" of things so much out of the husband's line of thought as poetry and story-books; but there was a set look round Mr. Holding's mouth that hindered his purpose.

The man had loved to hear those foolish verses, the meaning of which was never quite intelligible to him. He had never thought the words other than beautiful her sweet lips uttered. She had been dear to him, and everything she cared for was dear to him still, though she had been in her grave for ten long lonely years.

"She left me the child," he said more than a twelvemonth afterwards to Michael; and that legacy proved the ruling influence of his life. The child! It was for her he toiled and moiled—for her he kept "casting about" to improve his position—for her he struggled—for her he hoped.

So far as his own personal hopes went, they all perished one fair spring morning, when the larks were singing over the marshes, and the flowers were unfolding their blossoms, and the trees had donned their fair green raiment, and his dead love was lying in the darkened house, white and pure, an angel who could return to him no more, save in waking memories and in the deceitful dreams of night.

"That is the place," said Mr. Holding, pausing at length before a common-looking little cottage, with a piece of waste land stretching in front of it, and a great barn showing an expanse of red roof behind.

"That is the place."

"Oh! Is it?" answered the young man, not comprehending, but politely anxious to seem as if he knew all his companion meant to convey.

"You think there is nothing much to look at, I'll be bound?" surmised Mr. Holding, triumphantly.

"The farm buildings seem very good," said Michael. "Have you much land?"

"It's not a farm."

"Indeed! I thought it must be. What is it, then?"

"You shall see."

They passed round the end of the cottage—Mr. Holding remarking to a man digging in the garden, who touched his hat at sight of them, "Splendid weather, Daniel,"—and reached a large yard, roughly inclosed with a fencing formed of tallow-staves. About this yard was strewed a mass of odds and ends that filled the visitor's mind with the most intense astonishment. Stacks of fire-bricks, piles of planks, tons and tons of coal, mortar, barrels of lime, crucibles, and, more extraordinary than all else even to a person whose business lay amongst such brittle ware—a heap of broken glass of the very finest and thinnest quality.

"What on earth is that!" asked Michael, pausing before this small mountain, and eyeing it all over in critical wonder.

Even on Bankside he had never before seen so much broken glass at one time; and the Bankside barges were filled with quite another sort of material than this.

"Mr. Holding contemplated the heap mournfully; and then, turning to his companion, answered,

"That is my trouble."

"Your trouble!" repeated the younger man, astonished.

"Yes. You will see later on," said Mr. Holding, opening the door of the barn, and motioning Michael to enter.

In the barn there was literally nothing to see, though, several rows of the tiles having been removed, and skylights put in, the visitor was able to view the contents of the building from end to end.

A few rough benches against the walls, a few air furnaces at the end of the shed, some metal tubes, a waste of sand on the floor, and a number of spades and shovels piled together in a corner: there was nothing else. Michael looked to Mr. Holding for information.

Close to the door by which they had entered was a small office, partitioned off from the remainder of the building with rough deals, unplaned and unpainted. Whatever the occupation carried on, it was perfectly clear not an unnecessary sixpence had been laid out for either ornament or comfort.

There was barely space for two persons to move in this office; but, turning the key in the lock, Mr. Holding invited Michael to enter. Unlike the remainder of the building, the office received light from a window introduced into the gable. Upon the flat portion of the makeshift desk stood something covered over with a square of red baize. Mr. Holding removed this baize, and then there was disclosed to view a large glass shade, such as is used for the protection from dust of statuettes, timepieces, wax flowers, and so forth.

"You see that," said Mr. Holding, triumphantly.

"Yes," Michael agreed; "I see it."

"Take it in your hands."

The young man did so.

"Look at it."

The other complied, thinking he had heard something very like all this in a game for children.

"Bring it out into the yard," said Mr. Holding, eagerly. "Or let me carry it for you," he added, resuming his character of host, which did not sit naturally upon him, and which he had for the moment forgotten.

But Michael would not permit this. He insisted upon carrying the article into the open air himself, and then once again examined it carefully, though he could no more imagine why Mr. Holding set such store by it than he could conceive what he had been dragged across the Marshes to see it.

"It is a nice bit of glass, isn't it?" observed Mr. Holding.

"Yes, it is beautifully clear," answered Michael, who had learned to be a fair judge of such matters.

"As good as anything we ever had from abroad," suggested Mr. Holding.

"I do not think we ever had anything better," agreed his clerk.

"You perceive no defect or flaw in it?"

"No; how can I? There is no defect or flaw."

Mr. Holding took the shade lovingly in his hands, looked at its domed top, its shapely sides, its clean, smooth base, and then said,

"That is what I have been doing."

He waited for a reply, and Michael was consequently forced to say,

"I am afraid I do not exactly understand."

His tone was expressive of such bewilderment that Mr. Holding smiled with a smile delightful to see on the face of so grim-looking a man.

"It is English made," he answered, protracting the explanation of the mystery.

"I thought nothing of this sort was made in England."

"Neither it is, as a rule; but I made it." The time had come to make a point, and Mr. Holding deferred his opportunity no longer.

"You did!" said Michael, in bewilderment.

"Not personally. I didn't mean that; but it was made here. This is what I have had in hand."

Michael Gargrave once again took the glass and looked it over carefully, examined it inch by inch, held it between him and the light, held it out at arms' length, held it down, held it up, then he said:

"You amaze me."

"I thought it could be done," explained Mr. Holding modestly, "and I have done it."

They put the shade back on the desk, and covered it over once again with the red baize; they then took a leisurely stroll down the works, and Mr. Holding, his mouth opened at last, delivered a lecture upon this special branch of manufacture, which he demonstrated with examples.

"But it is not what it ought to be," he finished, "the breakages are something audacious."

"Do you mean you have made all that 'cullet' here," asked Michael.

"Yes, that is just what I do mean," was the answer.

They left the works after this, and wandered away from the place together.

Up the pleasant lane leading from the Lea, past more red-tiled barns, belonging to one of the farms owned by Lord Mornington, past the well kept house of a gentleman farmer, across the Leyton road, along Green Grove Lane, and so on to Leytonstone Churchyard, where the last rays of the evening sun were falling across a grave sadly dear to Mr. Holding.

They did not pause there, however.

"It is very quiet on the waterside, near Earl Tilney's old place," remarked Mr. Holding; "we can sit down there and talk a bit."

So they went there, and beside that little lake—scene once upon a time of so grievous a tragedy—sat down and talked.

"You see," explained Mr. Holding, "business is not what it once was, or times either for that matter. My father kept a shop, where I have now the warehouse. He lived over his shop, and made money enough to bring up a family in a quiet way and start them all fair.

"I had the goodwill of the business when I began; but my mother's little annuity had to come out of the profits. I was forced to pay an assistant, when my father had my services for my keep. The business was drained almost dry by the time all the family had got their trifle paid over to them, the lease was just upon out, and the rent now for the part we have is three times over what it used to be for the whole house. Then, trade is not so good; there are more in the business, and each week some fresh man starts. You know what my profits are, and I think, if you have considered the matter at all, must see they are not immense.

"Therefore, to cut a long story short, I cast about for something else that I should like better; for, to tell you the truth, I felt the confinement in the City telling upon me, and it somehow came into my head that if I could only start a glass works, such as nobody else owned, I might, at any rate make enough, before other folks got hold of the same notion, as would give me a little income for myself, and a moderate portion for the child. I am afraid I am tiring you."

"No," said Michael; "quite the contrary."

YOUNG FACES AND OLD FASHIONS. DRAWN BY M. W. RIDLEY.

MR. QUIVERFULL'S CHRISTMAS BOX. DRAWN BY A. HUNT.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.

If your hair is turning grey or white, or falling off, use THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER; for it will positively restore, in every case, grey or white hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots, where the glands are not decayed.

This preparation has never been known to fail in restoring the hair to its natural colour and gloss in from eight to twelve days.

It promotes growth, and prevents the hair falling out, eradicating dandriff, and leaving the scalp in a clean, healthy condition.

It imparts peculiar vitality to the roots of the hair, restoring it to its youthful freshness and vigour. Daily applications of this preparation for a week or two will surely restore faded, grey, or white hair to its natural colour and richness.

It is not a dye, nor does it contain any colouring matter or offensive substance whatever. Hence it does not soil the hands, the scalp, or even white linen, but procures the colour within the substance of the hair.

It may be had of any respectable Chemist, Perfumer, or Dealer in Toilet Articles in the Kingdom, at 3s. 6d. per Bottle. In case the dealer has not "The Mexican Hair Renewer" in stock and will not procure it for you, it will be sent direct by rail, carriage-paid, on receipt of 4s. in stamps, to any part of England.—Prepared by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

WHAT BEAUTIFIES THE HAIR?

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And pleases each one's fancies?
What adds a charm of perfect grace,
And Nature's gift enhances?
What gives a bright and beauteous gloss,
And what says each reviewer?
"That quite successful is the use Of 'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And makes it bright and glowing?
And keeps it free from dandriff, too,
And healthy in its growing?
What does such wonders? Ask the press,
And what says each reviewer?
"That none can equal or approach
'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
Like some bright hair beaming?
What makes the hair a perfect mass
Of splendid ringlets teeming?
What gives profusion in excess?
Why, what says each reviewer?
"The choicest preparation is
'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And makes it so delightful?
Because to speak the honest truth
Is only just and rightful.
What say the people and the press,
And what says each reviewer?
"That most superb for ladies' use Is 'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER

has gained for itself the highest reputation, and a decided preference over all other "hair dressings," as evinced from certificates and testimonials from the most respectable sources. Being compounded with the greatest care—combining, as it does, all the most desirable qualities of the best hair preparations of the day, without the objectionable ones—it may be relied on as the very best known to chemistry for restoring the natural colour to the hair, and causing new hair to grow on bald spots, unless the hair glands are decayed; for, if the glands are decayed and gone, no stimulant can restore them; but if, as is often the case, the glands are only torpid, THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER will renew their vitality, and a new growth of hair will follow. Read the following Testimonial:—

From Messrs. Wm. Hayes and Co., Chemists, 12, Grafton-street, Dublin.—"We are recommending THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER to all our customers as the best of the kind, as we have been told by several of our friends who tried it, that it has a wonderful effect in restoring and strengthening their Hair."

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION FOR LADIES.

Would you have luxuriant hair,
Beautiful, and rich, and rare
Would you have it soft and bright,
And attractive to the sight?
This you really can produce,
If you put in constant use
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
The hair it strengthens and preserves,
And thus a double purpose serves;
It beautifies—improves it, too,
And gives it a most charming hue,
And thus in each essential way,
It public favour gains each day—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

If a single thread of hair
Of a greyish tint is there,
This "Renewer" will restore
All its colour as before,
And thus it is that vast renown
Does daily now its virtues crown—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

No matter whether faded grey,
Or falling like the leaves away,
It will renew the human hair,
And make it like itself appear:
It will cure, beautify,
And every ardent wish supply—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

The constitution of the person and the condition of the scalp have much to do with the length of time it requires for new hair to grow; also the thick hair will depend much upon the vital force remaining in the hair-glands. New hairs are first seen to start around the margin of the bald spots near the permanent hair, and extending upwards until the spots are covered more or less thickly with fine short hair. Excessive brushing should be guarded against as soon as the small hairs make their appearance; but the scalp may be sponged with rain water to advantage occasionally. The scalp may be pressed and moved on the bone by the finger ends, which quickens the circulation and softens the spots which have remained long bald. On applying the hair-dressing it enlivens the scalp, and in cases where the hair begins to fall a few applications will arrest it, and the new growth presents the luxuriance and colour of youth. It may be relied on as the best hair-dressing known for restoring grey or faded hair to its original colour without dyeing it, producing the colour within the substance of the hair, imparting a peculiar vitality to the roots, preventing the hair from falling, keeping the head cool, clean, and free from dandruff, causing new hairs to grow, unless the hair-glands are entirely decayed. The MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER makes the hair soft, glossy, and luxuriant. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers, at 3s. 6d.; or sent to any address free on receipt of 4s. in stamps, HENRY C. GALLUP, Proprietor, 493, Oxford-street, London.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

When the hair is weak and faded,
Like the autumn leaves that fall,
Then is felt that saddest feeling
Which does every heart enthral,
Then we look for some specific
To arrest it on its way,
And THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
Bids it like enchantment stay.

It arrests decaying progress,
Though the hair is thin and grey
It will strengthen and improve it,
And work wonders day by day.
It restores the colour,
And brings back its beauty, too;
For THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
Makes it look both fresh and new.

What's the greatest hair restorer,
That the present age can show,
What produces wonders daily,
Which the world at large should know?
Why, THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
Eminently stands the first;
Thus its fame by countless thousands
Day by day is now rehears'd.

What beautifies, improves, and strengthens
Human hair of every race?
Why, this famous great restorer,
With the ladies is the rage.
And THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
Is the very best in use,
For luxuriant tresses always
Does its magic powers produce.

THE WORDS "THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER" are a Trade Mark; and the public will please see the words are on every case surrounding the Bottle, and the name is, C. GALLUP's is blown in the bottle.

"ELECTRICITY IS LIFE."

PULVERMACHER'S
PATENT
GALVANIC CHAIN-BANDS, BELTS, BATTERIES, &c.,
RECENTLY IMPROVED,
Approved by the Academy of Medicine of Paris and other Medical Authorities in England and Abroad.

VITAL ENERGY, it is well known, depends upon the unimpaired functions of the nervo-electric fluid governing the whole animal economy. Any deficiency thereof in the system manifests itself, according to the local parts of the body, by a variety of troublesome ailments, such as

Indigestion,	Asthma,	Local Debility,
Liver Complaints,	Bronchitis,	General Debility,
Neuralgia,	Paralysis,	Mental
Sciatica,	Epilepsy,	and
Deafness,	Rheumatism,	Physical Weakness,
Writer's Cramp,	Gout,	&c., &c.
Loss of Voice,	Constipation,

This is no conjecture, but an established scientific fact, and the curative powers of galvanic electricity, now recognised and adopted by the medical faculty throughout the world, have become established by the extensive use of Pulvermacher's Galvanic Appliances, the effectiveness and simplicity of which have enabled multitudes of persons to effect cures, to the surprise of patients and astonishment of antagonistic practitioners.

During the past thirty years the genuineness and efficacy of these appliances have been endorsed by great scientists and medical authorities; and the volume of testimonials from patients restored by this popular, because simple, remedy furnishes confirmatory evidence, which may be profitably referred to by those suffering from the above-mentioned ailments. See Pamphlet "Galvanism: Nature's Chief Restorer of Impaired Vital Energy," post-free for three stamps.

In order that the patient may be enabled to discriminate between those bona-fide statements and those put forward by unscrupulous adventurers solely on their own authority, Mr. Pulvermacher publishes the names and addresses to his Testimonials when practicable.

MR. PULVERMACHER begs to draw attention to the quotations from the opinions of competent medical and scientific authorities, including Sir Charles Locock, Bart., M.D., F.R.C.S.; Sir Henry Holland, Bart., M.D., F.R.C.S. and F.R.S.; Sir J. R. Martin, Bart., C.B., F.R.C.S., F.S.A., and F.R.S.; Sir W. Fergusson, Bart., M.D., F.R.S., F.R.C.S., &c., and Testimonials in his Pamphlet, "GALVANISM, NATURE'S CHIEF RESTORER OF IMPAIRED VITAL ENERGY," Sent post-free for three stamps.

ANOTHER SELECTION OF GENUINE PRIVATE TESTIMONIALS OF RECENT DATE.

GALVANISM v. NERVOUS DEBILITY.

"Bedale, Yorks, Sept. 30, 1878.

"Dear Sir,—I am happy to say I have derived great benefit from your Galvanic appliances, which I have worn during the past three months. I shall always be glad to recommend your Bands to any suffering from this disorder, without the slightest doubt as to their truly wonderful efficacy. You may make what use you like of this letter, using my initials only.—I am, Sir, gratefully yours, "W. T. H.

"Mr. Pulvermacher.

GALVANISM v. SORE THROAT,

"65, Earl Derby-terrace, Salford, "Sept. 24, 1878.

"Dear Sir,—I beg to say I have derived great benefit from the Appliance with which you have supplied me for a sore throat, from which I had been suffering for two years. I had also a constant accumulation of phlegm in the throat, and this has left me. I shall always recommend your treatment whenever the opportunity occurs. I am, yours respectfully, "A. HOUSE

"Mr. Pulvermacher."

GALVANISM v. INDIGESTION and NERVOUSNESS.

"Waytown, Kentisbury, near Barnstaple, "Sept. 21, 1878.

"Dear Sir,—I am glad to say I have been greatly relieved by your valuable Chains. I was suffering from indigestion and nervous complaint.—I am, yours truly, "Mr. Pulvermacher." "JOHN LEWELL."

GALVANISM v. GENERAL DEBILITY.

"Wraghy, near Lincoln, Sept. 17, 1878.

"Dear Sir,—In July last I purchased one of your Chain-Bands. I have much pleasure in telling you that I had not worn the Band more than a week before feeling very beneficial effects. I now feel a new man, being stronger in every way, both body and mind. I consider many sufferers might be made happy, so to speak, by the use of your Chain-Bands; and I trust this testimonial may induce others to use your Bands and derive, like this letter, considerable comfort. Please omit full name and address.—Faithfully yours, "Mr. Pulvermacher." "E. W."

GALVANISM v. NUMBNESS in LEGS.

Cadet Hospital, Royal Military College, Farnborough Station, Hants, Sept. 16, 1878.

"Sir,—I have much pleasure in telling you that I have derived much benefit from your Chain-Bands. The numbed feeling in my legs has completely left me. While the numbed feeling existed in my lower extremities I was gradually losing flesh, and from March in the present year until the middle of August I lost nearly three stones in weight; but, however, as sensation returned to me again I began to gradually gain flesh, and by this time have gained nearly a stone weight. I shall be happy to answer any questions addressed to me, and am, yours sincerely, "WILLIAM H WRIGHT."

"Mr. Pulvermacher.

GALVANISM v. GREAT NERVOUS DEBILITY.

"4, Walton's Building, Sunderland, "Sept. 12, 1878.

"Gentlemen,—I got one of your belts in June last. I was then suffering from bad circulation of the blood, hands and feet continually cold, great weakness, and irritation of the heart, painful despondency, and very great Nervous Debility—I think of as bad a nature as is possible. The circulation is now regular and pleasant, my spirits and mental energy restored, the weakness of the heart greatly diminished, and my nerves stronger than they have been for two years. You can make what use you please of my letter.—I am, Gentlemen, faithfully, "THOMAS ROBINSON.

"Messrs. Pulvermacher and Co."

GALVANISM v. SPINAL WEAKNESS.

"45, Russell-street, Wolverhampton, "Aug. 27, 1878.

"Dear Sir,—I have very much pleasure in stating that the benefit my wife received from one of your Bands for the spinal affection has far exceeded my expectation. She can now walk; and when I tell you that for seven months she could not stand or sit, but kept her bed the months she could not stand or sit, but kept her bed the whole of the time, you will think, with me, that this is a most wonderful cure. I will not enter into all the particulars of the case, but will just say that six months out of the eleven she was in Wolverhampton Hospital, without any benefit, though they were very kind and did all they could for her. You can make what use you like of this letter.—I am, yours truly, "WILLIAM EVANS.

"Mr. Pulvermacher."

GALVANISM v. LOSS of POWER in ARM.

"Shaw, near Oldham, near Manchester, Aug. 18, 1878.

"Sir,—Having entirely lost the use of my left arm from the over-lifting and over-exertion in a cotton factory, and thereby losing my employment, I was recommended to try one of your Chain-Bands. I sent for one only five weeks ago, and used it according to your printed instructions, and I acknowledge to you thankfully that it has made a perfect cure of my arm, which is now as well as the other. You are quite at liberty to make use of this; for without the use of my arm I should be lost in the world.—Yours gratefully, "P. J. NESBITT.

"Mr. Pulvermacher."

GALVANISM v. BRONCHITIS.

"Wortwell, Norfolk, Aug. 16, 1878.

"Dear Sir,—It will be interesting to you to know that about nine years ago I purchased your Galvanic Chain about nine years ago I purchased your Galvanic Chain from which I had been suffering for two years. After wearing the Chain a few days I began to feel better, and after a few weeks I was quite recovered. Since that time I have never had a return of bronchitis, although from various causes I have been often exposed to cold and wet weather. If you make use of this I should prefer that the initials only of my name should be given to the public: at the same time I shall be happy to answer questions that may be addressed to me through you.—I am, yours very truly, "R. F. B.

"Well, I got a long lease of that piece of ground—a snug piece, I call it; and I decided to use the old barn for the works. I did not want to lay out an unnecessary penny; and, further, I was determined to take no capital out of the warehouse—there is little enough in it at any rate—but to do the best I could with what little I had put by, and all I could save.

"We have lived very close, Mr. Gargrave, very close indeed, and yet the venture has been starved for want of money. The thing is not a success; I tell you that fairly; but I believe it might be made a success. You can see how much has been spent, for I have kept a record of every halfpenny, and you can come in and out when you please, if you have the least fancy for the speculation. You need not be in any hurry about deciding one way or other."

"As to that, Mr. Holding," said the young man, smiling, "I can decide now. I want some part of this legacy for another purpose, but the bulk of it you shall have whenever it is paid to me."

"No, no," exclaimed Mr. Holding; "I can't let you plunge into the thing like a moth at a candle. It is a big stake for you, and remember, though you may win, still, you may lose."

"So be it, then," answered Michael. "Whether I win or lose, you won't hear me grumble. I would almost as soon lose with you as win with another!"

CHAPTER VI.

EXPLANATIONS.

Into all the details of the story narrated in the last few chapters it was happily unnecessary for Mr. Gargrave to enter when, on the morning after what he called his fight, he and Lucy met at breakfast. If it had been necessary, it is doubtful whether in his then frame of mind he could have reverted to a time so long past—to a period the ideas and hopes of which he must have found it simply impossible to recall.

But there was no need for Lucy to be told.

He had to deal with later times—with a more immediate difficulty.

"Until last night, Lucy," he began, addressing his ward, who, in the absence of Miss Gargrave, still incapacitated from headache, was pouring out the coffee, "I never thought of you as anything but a child. Although you are engaged to be married." I somehow never realised you were almost grown up. I forgot you, like myself, were growing quite old."

She looked up, and smiled. Of course, he was old; but, after all, he did not look so immensely old as many people—Mr. Suttaby, for instance, and Russell's uncle.

Besides he looked younger when he talked freely and pleasantly, as he was doing on this bright winter's morning, while she presided over the cups and saucers.

As a rule, Mr. Gargrave did not indulge in much conversation in his own family circle. Breakfast, in particular, was with him generally a hasty and silent meal, often as not interrupted by a message from the foreman.

The change, therefore, from Mr. Gargrave silent to Mr. Gargrave talkative was not more strange than delightful. Even when he repeated his words of the previous evening, and said he wanted to speak to her about their relative positions, she only settled herself in her chair with a pretty gravity.

"You remember my taking tea with you once at Old Ford, Lucy?" he went on. "At that time I was clerk to your father, as young Terrol is clerk to me now."

"Were you?" Lucy opened her eyes wide. It seemed to her strange that he could ever have been anything like young Terrol.

"Yes; I had then been quite a long time in his employment. When I first went to your father I was quite a lad, little older than you are now. So we grew in mere process of time to know and understand each other, and he trusted me."

"He often said there was no one he trusted as he did you." Mr. Gargrave remained silent for a moment, then he resumed:

"When I had money enough we went into partnership. Your father started this place, but he wanted more capital to carry it on, and I was able to find the capital. Up to the time he met with that accident I do not believe he had ever felt seriously anxious about your future, because he always believed he could make sufficient out of this business to provide for your future. I will not say he was over sanguine, but he did think his ideas capable of being more largely carried out than—than"——

Mr. Gargrave broke off abruptly.

'At any rate," he resumed, "when he met with the accident he had not begun to save any money. He sent for me, and we talked over affairs as they stood.

"To take from the works the amount invested by him in them would then have secured you a very poor provision. In effect, we could not have taken that money out. We might have got another partner, or we might not. Except to us, there really was not money's worth about the place. As a 'growing concern' the works were profitable; but to try to realise them would have been merely to sell so many barge-loads of sand, so many crucibles, and so much personal experience and knowledge acquired with difficulty, and almost impossible to communicate. I hope I am making my meaning clear to you, Lucy?"

"I am trying to understand it," she said humbly and deprecatingly; but she need not have feared that he would feel impatient. He was thinking of the dead father and the hopeful long ago, and he had nothing in his heart at the moment save pity for the girl and self-reproach towards himself.

"Well, Lucy; your father thought there was but one thing to do. If he lived, he knew you were safe as he could make you; if he died, he thought he could trust me to look after your interests. So as not to complicate difficulties and hamper the trade at every turn, he left everything to me. He put me, to quote his own words, in his place, and I have tried, Lucy, to stand in his place, so far as might be. With all my strength I have striven to do the best I could for you as well as for myself."

"That I am sure you have," she exclaimed. "I never—never can thank you sufficiently for all your goodness."

"Ay! But I have not been good to you now; I have done ill instead of well."

"I do not understand," she said.

He told her: he did not spare himself. He spoke more of his own folly than of the roguery of Brent and Stanhope; he explained how the affair must cripple and might ruin him. He mentioned how it happened that Mrs. Brockley's money had been sent to him, and more unwillingly than all else—for the last thing, probably, of which a true man likes to speak is any religious impression—he repeated the sentence which, recurring to memory in his hour of need, decided his refusal of assistance he might be unable to repay.

"I heard the words by chance," he said; "I turned one day into a City church, where every Thursday a great preacher discourses to such citizens as care and have time to go and listen to him. The sermon did not particularly impress me at the time; but those words must have struck me, for they staid in my memory like the verse of some old ballad, and haunted me last night till I was sick and tired of thinking about them. You see they were true," he went on, speaking almost to himself, "and I felt them to be true; so I do not ask you this morning if I did right, for I knew it would not have been right to peril the poor old lady's money. What I do ask is that you will forgive me for jeopardising your fortune."

"Had I ever any fortune to lose?" she asked playfully. "I think you are mistaken."

"No," he answered. "Money has been made here; and as I refused to take Mr. Russell Suttaby into partnership, it was my intention to pay out by degrees such amounts as might ultimately make up the share I considered you justly entitled to receive. Mr. Suttaby said he should prefer what he calls "an agreed lump down" to any yearly payment, and he was coming over this morning to go fully into the matter with me.

She turned her ring round and round thoughtfully, then she said, "Wouldn't he lend you the money you need?"

Mr. Gargrave laughed as he answered. "No, Lucy, rich people are rarely ready lenders. Besides, he added, "even if I were willing to ask Mr. Suttaby's help, which I am not, it would be impossible for me to do so, as he has been rather pressing for a definite settlement, or at least for a date to be named when your fortune could be paid."

Lucy remained silent for a minute; then she said, gravely, "I didn't know I was to have any money."

"You foolish child! Did you think I should keep it all? Have I not always been your guardian?"

"I mean," she persisted, "I did not know they wanted any money."

"Why, all young ladies have, or ought to have, fortunes."

"If I were a man I should like to marry a girl without a shilling."

"That comes of reading my sister's romances," he said.

"I would not marry anyone who had a fortune. My mother had no money, and think how my father loved her to the last day of his life. Oh! if you have really any money of mine, make haste and lose it. I should hate to have a fortune."

"I am afraid, Lucy, it is lost already. But I will do my best to replace it as speedily as may be. What I fear is your marriage may have to be deferred for a time in consequence; that thought has been troubling me greatly." She looked at him with her great, soft, honest eyes, and answered,

"Then do not let it trouble you any more. We can wait ever so long—years and years, if that be all. And please never think again about that money. I do not want it, and I know Russell does not, either."

Mr. Gargrave entertained a decided opinion on that point, but he had no wish to discuss his impression with her.

"There is Mr. Suttaby now driving round to the counting-house, Lucy," he remarked. "I must go to him."

And so he went to tell Mr. Suttaby the best and the worst of the position.

CHAPTER VII.

EVIL DAYS.

One bitter day in the January following Mr. Gargrave's talk with Mr. Suttaby an elderly gentleman making his way with the wind up Holborn-hill met an elderly lady who was making her way against it.

Contrary to the mot—of the Irish wit—in this case the lady and not the wind was getting the worst of it, and when the gentleman met her she was indeed a sight to behold, a spectacle to pity.

Those were the days of crinoline; but, as her principles forbade her to walk abroad in a birdcage, the wind was making wild sport of her demure skirts, twisting them, flouting them, jeering at them and her, trying to blow her fur tippet—of an excellent quality, but obsolete pattern—off her shoulders, playing pranks with the feather in her old-fashioned bonnet, mocking everything about her, from the long black lace veil—real lace, as she said and believed, poor old lady—with which she tried to conceal her face to the tears in her faded eyes that would roll down her cheeks before, in the struggle with her enemy, she could raise a kerchief to wipe them away.

"Mrs. Brockley!" said the gentleman, pulling up. "What on earth are you doing here?"

"Oh, Mr. Herron! oh, Sir!" And her tears, at length obtaining complete mastery over conventionality, poured down her cheeks; while the wind, seizing his opportunity, whisked her veil back over her bonnet, leaving her face bare to the sight of the whole passing world of London.

Evidently a man of decision, Mr. Herron took the poor lady by the shoulder and turned her with back to the frolicsome wind, tucked her arm within his, and said, "Now tell me all about it."

But poor Mrs. Brockley was quite unable to tell him all about it. The battle she had been fighting with the wind—the noise of the streets—the surprise of meeting a person from her own neighbourhood, had so disconcerted her that she could not speak a connected sentence.

"Never mind," exclaimed Mr. Herron kindly; "we'll soon be out of this row, and then we can talk in peace."

To describe Mrs. Brockley as she walked along with Mr. Herron would be simply to portray a mixture of harmless vanity, innocent pride, dread and humiliation as to the state of her attire, and an underlying grief, which no personal anxiety or exultation could cause her to forget.

Mr. Herron was the principal solicitor at Eastlea, solicitor to all the county families, a very grand personage in Mrs. Brockley's estimation, and she "took it very kind of him," she said afterwards, "to be so pleasant and friendly with an old body like me, and in the middle of London, too."

Not far from the spot where he met his townswoman was a quiet hostelry, where the lawyer generally put up on the occasion of his frequent visits to town; and to this hotel he conducted his companion.

"Sit down and warm yourself," he entreated, leading her into a snug apartment, closing the door and poking the fire. "What is it? You are in some difficulty, and I can help you."

"I do not think you can, Sir," she answered; "but it is very good of you; and me taking away my bit of business."

"Pooh! Mrs. Brockley," he interrupted. "Do you suppose I bear malice about that. Ladies are sometimes apt to be headstrong. What is the trouble now. Don't think of me as a lawyer, speak as if I were only a friend."

Mrs. Brockley carried a reticule—a contemporary, probably, of the tippet and the black veil: from this she produced another pocket-handkerchief, with which she solemnly wiped her eyes, and said—

"If you please, Sir, I shall have to begin at the beginning."

"Very well," agreed Mr. Herron, and sat down resignedly.

"You know my poor dear husband had a nephew, Sir."

"Several," corrected the lawyer; "one a most turbulent fellow—Daniel—Jacob—Samuel—yes—Samuel: has he been troubling you?"

"He has always been coming to me for money, Sir, which, indeed, he ought not to have done, since I helped to make what Mr. Brockley left me; and a man, surely, has a right to do what he likes with his own."

"Humph! that's as it may be; but I suppose you gave this Samuel some and can't get it back again."

"No, Sir, I did not. I knew he was in a good way here in London—he told me himself his agency was worth three hundred a year; and he had money with his wife; and why should I give him what we earned so hard?"

"Why should you, indeed?" acquiesced Mr. Herron.

"When that mortgage was paid off," she continued, "as I could not go to you, Sir, for advice"——

Mr. Herron smiled a smile which was at once a vindication of his own astuteness and a reproach for her want of faith in his placability.

"At any rate, Sir, I did not like to go to you; and, as I scarce knew what to do about the money, I thought of young Mr. Gargrave—Mr. Michael. You remember him?"

"Of course I do—Rokeby Gargrave's son. Came up to London to make his fortune. He has done remarkably well?"

Mrs. Brockley shook her head, and began to cry again.

"Far from it, Sir. He is at this present minute in what I think Sam calls a 'Sponging-house,' close by here."

"Bless my soul!" said Mr. Herron. "I am shocked to hear this. But what is 'bred in the bone'—you know; and the father was—— Well, we won't talk of that. To return to your money. You did not send Mallard's cheque to him, I hope?"

"Yes, I did, Sir; the very day I got it."

"And he has spent it for you! Dear! dear! Like father, like son! I am most truly sorry for you, Mrs. Brockley. I am afraid it is a bad case. We must see what can be done, though. Give me all the particulars, and I will call on his lawyers."

"But I haven't lost a penny, Sir."

"My good lady, you have just told me you had lost it all!"

"No, Sir; it was you said that. I have lost no money by Mr. Gargrave; but Sam says he has. He came down to the Villa the other day by express, dashed in like a flash of lightning, says, 'I am ruined! I am beggared! I have lost my agency, all through you and your friend Michael Gargrave. You'll have to make it up to me. As for him, he is out of the way of wheedling old women for awhile. I have got him locked up safe enough!'

"He went on just as if he was not in his right mind. He frightened me to such a degree that I ran out of the house with only my cap on, and asked Mr. Giles, who happened to be passing, to come in and speak to him. Mr. Giles is very clever, as you know, Sir, and by degrees he gets to the rights of the story.

"It seems Mr. Gargrave lost a great deal of money by some dishonest people he had trusted, and in consequence could not pay the gentlemen for whom Sam is agent.

"He wanted time to turn round in, and all his other creditors but Sam agreed to this. Sam knew I had sent him up my money (for I told him so), and said Mr. Gargrave ought to have used it to pay him at any rate. At last, as I understand, they came to high words about the matter, and without more ado, Sam locked him up—"put the screw on," as he said. But Mr. Gargrave would not pay a bit more for that, and wrote down to the gentlemen in the country, and one of them came up and gave Sam notice, and said he would throw the whole thing into bankruptcy, and break Mr. Gargrave; and so Sam came to me, more mad than sane."

"And you returned to town with him, I suppose."

"No, Sir." He upset me so that I was all of a tremble, and when Mr. Giles got him out of the house and away to the train, I had to go to bed. I could not lift my head, Sir; no, not if life and death had depended on my doing it; but I could think, and I did, about the poor gentleman I had known from the time he was a mere child, and who when he was a lad used to come into the Brayley Arms, free and pleasant, as if it was his own home. He was always fond of me; and he used to bring me trout he had caught, and hares he had shot; and, oh! dear!—oh! dear! dear me!"

"It does you credit, it really does," murmured Mr. Herron. "And so you thought, Mrs. Brockley"——

"That I would come up myself and see him, and ask him to use my money, about which, as Mr. Giles said, he had acted most honourable. So I did come, Sir, by the Parliamentary. And I've seen him, Sir; and I might just as well have stopped at home. He won't touch a penny, he says. He was very pleasant, and tried to seem cheerful; but he looks broken-hearted—he does, Sir; and I am sure I am!"

"Humph!" commented Mr. Herron; and he sat silent for a minute while Mrs. Brockley wept and wiped her eyes, till, exclaiming, "I'll put this to rights," he got up and drew on his gloves and took his hat. "You must leave all to me, remember," he remarked.

"Very good, Sir," said Mrs. Brockley, meekly.

CHAPTER VIII.

MR. HERRON TO THE RESCUE.

Mrs. Brockley's statement was correct. Among all the persons before whom Mr. Gargrave considered it necessary to place the exact state of his affairs, only two made any difficulty about giving him the time he asked for. Those two were Mr. Samuel Brockley and Mr. Suttaby senior. The latter was unpleasant—the former very unpleasant. Mr. Suttaby did not say much, but what he did say was disagreeable.

As I have consented to the match upon certain conditions," he finished, "I will not back out of my consent if those conditions are fulfilled. I am a man of my word. But, mark ye! there must be a limit to the time of the engagement and no marriage, unless the money is paid down."

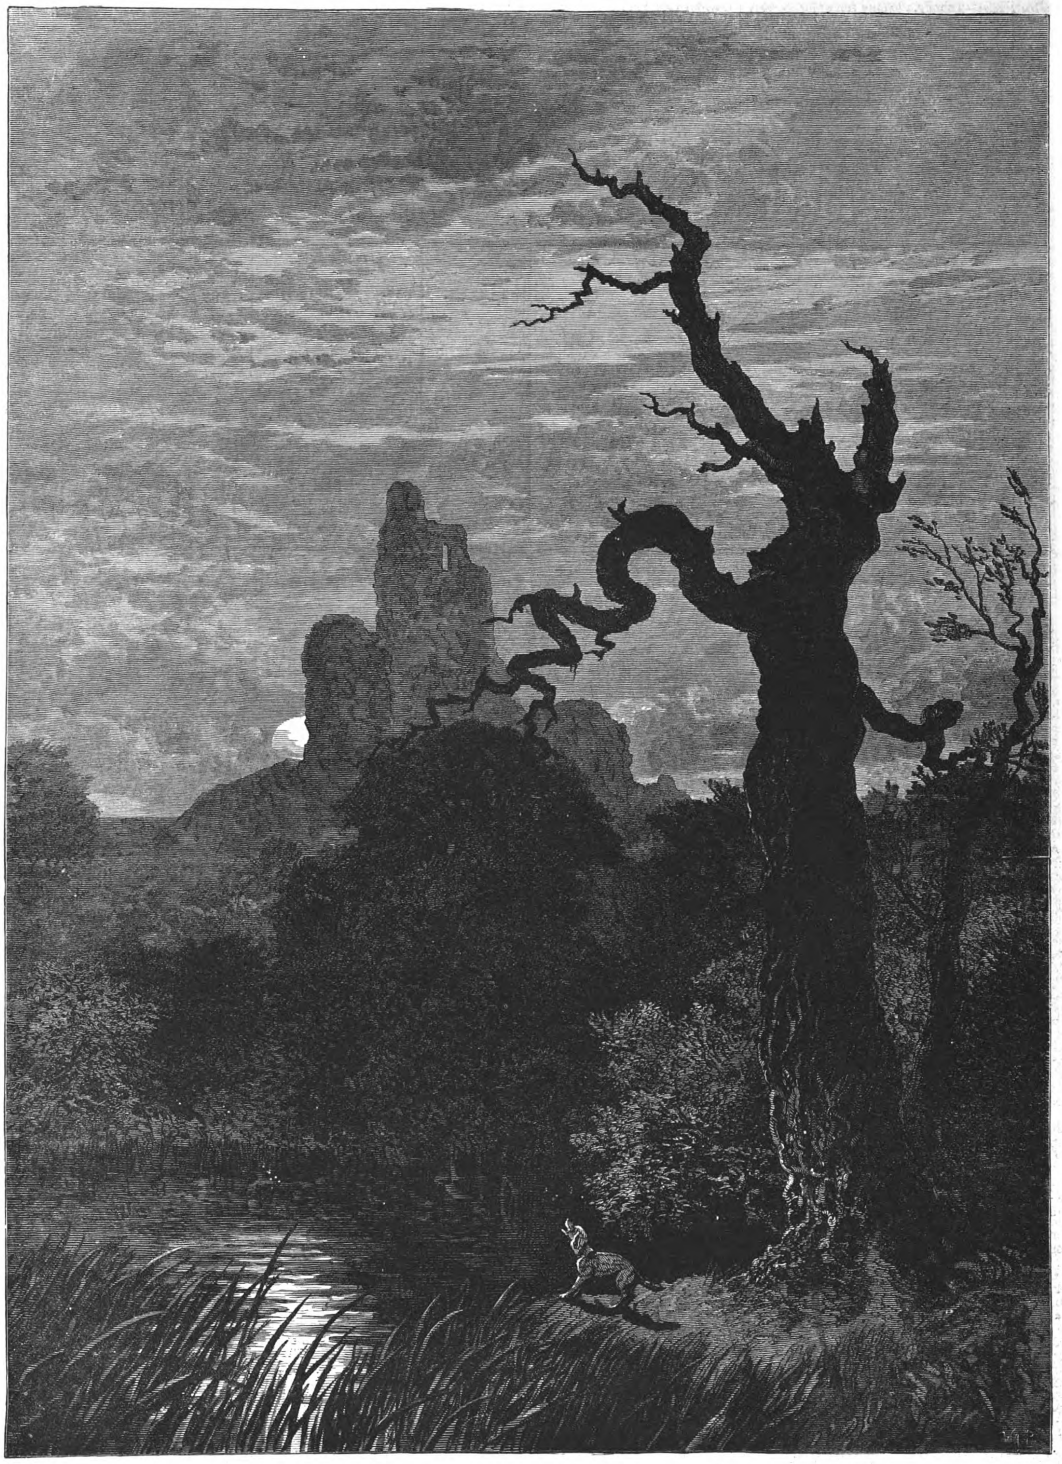
As for Mr. Brockley, gifted by nature with a loud voice and a hectoring manner, he exasperated Mr. Gargrave to an extent which rendered all chance of an amicable settlement hopeless.

He called the debt a swindle and the man who contracted it a swindler. He said he believed he had made a purse out of his aunt's money—or rather out of his uncle's money (which I ought to have had), he stated in parenthesis. He declared Mr. Gargrave's honest scruples to be mere blinds. He threatened what he could and what he would do; and, finally, Michael Gargrave defied him. "Do your worst; but keep out of my office! Keep away, or it will be worse for you."

"Oh! if you come to that"——

"Go down those stairs, before I pitch you to the bottom of them!" interrupted Mr. Gargrave; and Mr. Samuel Brockley took the advice and went.

The next day, as Mr. Gargrave was walking out of the Fenchurch-street station, a man accosted him in quite a confidential and familiar manner, and, explaining he was officer to the Sheriff of London, told Michael he had arrested him.



"Perhaps you would like a cab, Sir? You might not like to be seen walking with me."

There was an awful brevity about the whole proceeding which took away Mr. Gargrave's breath. It seemed like a hideous dream; and one part of what he beheld in it was Mr. Samuel Brockley standing on the pavement, waving his hand in derisive farewell as the cab drove away.

What followed was like a terrible nightmare also—days spent in a sponging-house in Cursitor-street—days during which time seemed to stand still—days when for the first time in all his active life he said at dawn "Would God it were night," and at night "Would God it were morning."

THE MISTLETOE BOUGH. DRAWN BY A. E. EMSLIE.

WHERE THE DEED WAS DONE. DRAWN BY MASON JACKSON.

Not but what people called to see him. In the goodness of her heart, Mrs. Dodson—housekeeper, as she called herself at the cottage—donned her bravest attire, and went to offer her condolences.

Tommy accompanied her—Tommy, the irrepressible—Tommy, against whom Mr. Gargrave cherished an antipathy utterly ludicrous—Tommy, with swelled cheeks, a cold in his head, a great muffler round his throat, an expression of vacant wonderment in his round eyes, a bun in his hand, a screw of sweetmeats in his pocket—Tommy, the only son of his mother, and she a widow.

Exactly as he might have contemplated the lions in the Zoological Gardens, Tommy stood and stared at Mr. Gargrave, who said wincing,

"This is very kind of you, Mrs. Dodson; but I wish you had not come here. It can do no good. How is my sister?"

Mrs. Dodson reported that Miss Gargrave was well, though "upset," and hoped to see him next day.

"Tell her not to come," he answered. "I could not bear bear it." And yet perhaps he was disappointed when she whom he had sheltered obeyed his bidding and stayed away. All the more, perhaps, because Mrs. Dodson's visit—spite of the drawback of Tommy—had touched him.

"I have saved a good few pounds, Sir," she said, "and brought them with me. If not too great a liberty?"

He could not answer her for a minute, for she had brought him all her little hoard—all her treasure, and offered it freely.

Instead of his sister, Lucy came the next day.

"You should not have come here, dear," he said gently. "This is no place for a young girl. How is Matilda? She ought not to have allowed you to do such a thing."

"I did not tell her," Lucy answered. She had a headache."

"She had not a heartache," thought her brother, unknowing till afterwards that she undertook a journey to Brayley on his behalf, and, being received with scant courtesy, returned home more utterly prostrated than Mrs. Dodson had ever seen her.

Lucy, too, had brought her little purse—scantily filled, it is true, but offered with such tender entreaty, such sweet hesitancy, that Michael Gargrave, looking on the face he once thought plain, marvelled to find how lovely it seemed to him.

He took the purse—a shabby little affair, frayed and worn—took it, and emptied out the few sovereigns it contained.

"I have no need of these," he said; "but I want a purse. May I keep this?"

"May you? Of course, anything. I have a much better one at home, though. You must have that."

"No, this; this only," he answered. "And now go, my dear. Of course," he added, as she rose to obey, "you have seen the Suttabys."

"Oh, yes," Lucy answered; and, in trying to make the best of things, left him with such a pain as he had not known before for years.

"What an idiot I am—what a dolt," he considered, for he knew what the pain was, and that he loved the girl with all his soul.

As for Lucy, she felt glad to think he had not questioned her further, for she had seen the Suttabys but once coming out of church, when the Miss Suttabys only acknowledged her existence with a bow, and Russell, much embarrassed, shook hands in a distant and perturbed manner, saying,

"I hope, Miss Holding, you are quite well."

In order, as he expressed it, to make things clear, old Mr. Suttaby paid Miss Gargrave a visit, in the course of which he stated the match must now be considered as finally at an end.

"I make it a rule," he said, speaking in a general way, "to have nothing to do with bankrupts and insolvents any more than with forgers, swindlers, or pickpockets. They may be very worthy people—unfortunate, and so forth. I say nothing about that; only they are not my sort."

Fanning herself languidly, though her hand literally trembled with passion, Miss Gargrave said she was very glad to hear it; and so the engagement ended.

But of all this Michael Gargrave remained in ignorance, sitting in Cursitor-street counting the hours till Mr. Brockley or some one should make him bankrupt.

"I will not do it myself," he said to his solicitor; "but that is what it must come to."

"I am afraid it is," was the answer; and still the days went by.

He was getting worn out. There were times when memory seemed to be failing him—times when he mixed up his own position with that of his dead father; when debt seemed piled on debt, and he could not even read the list he had jotted down of those to whom he owed money.

He was sitting in the dusk one evening, with an aching head and tired eyes that dreaded the light, when a gentleman was announced.

"How do you do? Long time since we met. Glad to tell you this matter is settled at last. I have a cab at the door. It won't take you long to pack up, I suppose?"

Michael rose slowly, and took the hand his visitor offered.

"I do not remember you?" he said.

"No? And yet it was through me you first came to London—that unfortunate Casserow business, you recollect. What! Still in a fog? Why, my name is Herron; and I chanced to hear of this unfortunate affair from that good Mrs. Brockley. Her nephew is—well, I owe him one. Here! Hi! Somebody come quick! Water! Brandy! Anything! Everything!"

Mr. Gargrave had fainted.

Late that night they were sitting, a sad household, at Lea Bank, when a loud knock at the door caused Mrs. Dodson to exclaim, "all in a flutter," as she subsequently stated,

"Bless us and save us, what's that?"

Trembling, she came into the narrow hall at the moment Miss Gargrave emerged from the parlour.

"Who can it be?" said Miss Gargrave, trembling also; but already the question was answered, for Lucy had slipped past her elders and opened the door.

"Why, it's master," cried Mrs. Dodson. "Michael," screamed Miss Gargrave, and fell upon his neck, while Lucy, seizing his hand, kissed it over and over, not knowing what she did.

"Hey-dey," cried a cheerful voice, "and not a word for me who have brought back the prodigal. Here, young lady, take my hand for a moment by way of a change. Now, I wonder who you are; you remember me, I see, Miss Matilda. No; I have not come to tell you Owen is dead, he is as well as ever he was, and going to be married: but, if I stood in his cousin's shoes, after what I have just seen, I should not desire to change places with him; that I should not."

But although Mr. Herron did not bring the news he saw Miss Gargrave expected then, eighteen months later he came one morning to the cottage and broke the tidings of death and good fortune with a gravity befitting such announcements.

"The marriage never came off," he said, "though the settlements were drawn; and old Rokeby left your cousin every penny he possessed. Broke a blood-vessel or something. His mother kept it very quiet, and took him abroad again. Well, he is dead now, poor fellow! and you are the owner of Brayley, and the Rokeby property as well."

"Speak low! speak low! Let us get away from the house," said Michael, hurriedly.

"Anything the matter? Nothing wrong, I hope, with your charming wife. I shall, I suppose, have to try and think of her as a great lady for the future, though I did give her to you, though I did tell you that was the best way of uniting her interests with yours. Must we go out? Very well."

They walked away along the road leading by the water till they reached the bridge, but there, all of a sudden, Michael Gargrave stopped.

"I will meet you anywhere you like to name at one o'clock," he said, "but I cannot talk to you now. It has all come upon me too suddenly. I have been overworked; I must get away by myself for a little time."

Mr. Herron stared at him. "I am afraid you have been overworked," he said. "I always feared you were in too great a hurry to pay your debts. I will return at one o'clock. This road will take me to Stratford-le-Bow, I think. Fine church somewhere near Stratford—West Ham—yes, thank you, that is it, West Ham." And he walked away briskly, thinking Rokeby Gargrave would not have taken such news in so sad a fashion. "He'd have tossed his hat up, and been off for Brayley before now. Well, I can not say I like to see one man cock-a-whoop because another has got the route."

CHAPTER IX.

CONCLUSION.

He went alone, over the lonely marshes. He left the field-paths and the wider road, and walked away over the soft, springy turf, with naught save his own thoughts for company.

At that moment the instincts of a solitary life claimed supremacy. In his time of triumph, as in his hour of sorrow, the waters of his soul seemed at once to be frozen over. Speech died away inarticulate, expression could find no outlet. Thoughts too deep for utterance, too subtle for analysis were in his heart. When Mr. Herron told him his news he hurried him away, lest in that small house some word of the conversation should inform his sister of the nature of his errand; and now, though the natural course for him to pursue might have seemed to rush off at once to communicate the tidings to those who had passed through the darkness with him, he could not do it. No; he felt he must get away, quite away, and think it all out alone—alone, himself and God.

It was a magnificent morning. The dew-drops still glittered on the leaves, there was still a dreamy haze lying across the distant forest, there was a fresh, pungent fragrance in the air—a sense of distinctness in all objects within the range of vision. High up in heaven the larks were singing their delicious songs—softly the river trickled on its course—gently the long grasses trailed their fingers in the cool water as it went rippling by; and he who walked amongst what would seem this waste of beauty—only that we feel God must have made even common things lovely for His own delight—scarce knew how to reconcile the aspect of nature with the workings of his own heart.

For he was not glad. No. I could not have so written of this man had he felt it unmixed happiness to walk across a grave to prosperity. If, a twelvemonth before, his cousin had given him or lent him a couple of thousand pounds, his feelings would have been jubilant.

Oh! ye rich, who, to the thinking of some, are so much too rich, do you ever, I wonder consider what the mere trifles you lose in your vague ventures would be to a poor struggling man of business? I fancy not. The rich are indifferent, and the poor struggling man proud. He would be glad, and the rich willing—and, perhaps, as society is now constituted, it is a simple impossibility either should understand the mind of the other; but it is sad, I sometimes fancy in my poor imagining, that he who is able to give should be so far removed from the man who requires—the man who needs from the man who desires to befriend.

Ah! if to you who read God has given much, "Remember the corn in the ground." I ask of you no more: I ask of you no less. Think, for the love of the Great God, whether the seed you are planting, is likely to produce a harvest you will care to reap; whether at this Christmas tide you have considered the poor and needy—the man who required a helping hand, the woman who wanted but small assistance to be preserved from such evil as no human language can express?

It is but little, and yet it is so much that the mightiness of its glory shall stretch from the shores of Time across the ocean of Eternity.

At the time it was given—nay, in his memory now—Mrs. Brockley's mite—which was so much to her—seemed more to him than the whole of his cousin's wealth dropped reluctantly from a dead man's hand. He had surmounted the worst of his difficulties; he was married; he was happy; he was content. What did all this waste of riches, as at first it looked like to his unwonted eyes, signify to him? Could his nature, steeped in business as it had been perforce; assimilated to his occupation as that of the hand of the dyer, be changed so suddenly that in the twinkling of an eye he should feel able to take upon himself fresh duties and fresh interests.

He experienced no wild feeling of exultation when he considered the gift Fortune had thrown to him. He did not hurry to seize it. At that first moment of possession he probably regarded his new wealth more calmly and critically than at any future period of his career.

The past seemed to arise and stand before him—the past, which his father's mad extravagance and senseless thriftlessness had rendered so much like a wild debauch, succeeded by weary morrows of shame and poverty, and hard, hard work.

For years he had turned his thoughts from these subjects; but now these things all came back to memory—ghastly shapes rising from out a dishonoured grave; and for a moment the sunlight faded and the prospect grew dim, the songs of the larks sounded afar off, and the murmuring of the water seemed to threaten instead of lull.

Then there came another recollection, and this time a blessed one. He thought of the man, poor in pocket, honest of purpose, single of heart, who walked once where he was walking, thinking only of his dead, lying white and quiet in the darkened house, which for her sake should seem for ever after lonely.

And now he was sleeping, too; but he had gone to his rest content, with no words of murmuring because his day had been hard, and the heat intense, and his burden heavy; but rather with whispered sentences of gratitude and thanksgiving that God had been so good to him, so infinitely merciful, so unspeakably gracious.

He had gone without a fear for his child, at last content to leave her; and in that moment Michael Gargrave felt an almost triumphant satisfaction in the thought that from the moment she broke down the barriers of reserve which had become a very part and parcel of his life, he had given to her more than the tenderness of a father—more than the companionship of a brother.

Already the once familiar scenes were growing old; already the hopes of morning were becoming blurred and dim, like the sorrows of the long ago.

He looked across the wide expanse of marsh to the spot where he had known such happiness. Up into the still air the blue smoke was rising. He could see the red roofs of the barns; the trees shading the nest which held everything he loved on earth; the pleasant fields beyond, lying quiet under the sunlight. Not in all the years that had gone before did the charm of his home ever seem so great. Could he give it all up—the peace, the quiet, the modest desires, the unalloyed content? Could he go out and take his place in the great world, and find such happiness in the midst of his new state—as he had felt within the narrow territory so small that in the distance he seemed but a speck in the landscape?

He said to himself it would be difficult, almost impossible, to put on the thoughts, ideas, and habits of his new life as he might don a fresh garment; but he was deceived. Already the change he imagined wellnigh impossible was begun; already in feeling, as well as in reality, Michael Gargrave was the owner of Brayley rather than the proprietor of a Glass Works on the River Lea.

Where now was his satisfaction at the large order which that morning's post had brought? What had become of his project of sending in that tender on the morrow?

As his eyes wandered to the factory his thoughts followed in the same direction, and he smiled half sadly to think he need never trouble himself about such matters again; that the interests of yesterday were not the interests of to-day.

And then, his eyes reverting to the cottage, he smiled again, because of a thought that was all pleasure.

The previous evening Lucy, enlarging upon the woes of some widow, whose hard struggle for daily bread was likely to end, and shortly, with the breaking up of her home, said to her husband—

"Poor creature, it was pitiful to see her distress. I wish we could help her."

To which he answered, partly because he felt the case to be almost hopeless, partly because he had often to check Lucy's charitable impulses,

"So do I, dear; but we must be just before we are generous."

"That is true," she said; but he could see her thoughts were with the widow rather than with his just debts.

Now the memory of her disappointment recurred to him, and the first unqualified feeling of delight he experienced in consequence of his inheritance thrilled through him at the same moment.

No more lingering on the marshes; straight over the grass he strode to the nearest footpath.

He crossed the bridges, he walked fast beside the stream. The door of the dear house where he had found so much happiness was wide open, and in the porch stood his young wife watching for his coming.

She ran to the gate to meet him. "How fast you were walking, dear," she said, both hands clasped round his arm clad in hodden grey. "Mr. Herron brought no bad news, did he?"

"No, indeed, quite the contrary; what made you think he had?"

"You were talking so earnestly to him when you went out.

"Silly little Lucy," he said, fondly stroking her hair.

"Yes, I am afraid I am," she answered, seriously, "for I cannot get poor Mrs. Laydon out of my mind; and I have been thinking, Michael, that as I can manage without a new dress and mantle, might I—couldn't we?—give her what they would have cost?"

He looked at her so gravely, with an expression so strange—to her so unintelligible—that she said,

"I will not say more about it, Michael, if it vexes you."

"It does not vex me, pretty one," he replied. "Do just what your heart tells you. Now run away to your widow, and make haste home again, for I want you."

"And Toller wants you," she said, as she hurried into the house to put on her bonnet.

He could not wait for her return, he was constrained to go and meet her, to take her hand and put it within his arm and hold it there while they walked on the soft sward under the shady trees together; she in such an ecstacy of delight because of the widow's happiness, that she babbled on regardless of his silence, till, at length, something in his look caused her to cry out,

"Michael, I am sure you have had bad news. What is it?"

"I have had news, dear, but not bad," was his answer; and then he told her. "You can be generous now, Lucy, and just too," he remarked, wondering at her silence. But she shook her head in answer.

She drew her hand from out his arm, and sate down on a bank by the wayside, and began absently to pull up little tufts from out the grass, picking them over absently.

"Why, Lucy, what is the matter?" asked her husband. "Do you understand what I mean? We are now rich people. We need never be anxious nor sorry about money any more."

One by one great tears rolled slowly down her cheeks.

"Lucy—Lucy!" He sat down on the bank at her side and put his arm round her, and turned to look into her face; but she hid it on his shoulder.

"What ails you, dear? Tell me," he entreated.

"I ought never to have married you," she answered, speaking in gasps, with little sobs between. "It did not matter so much while we were poor and struggling; but I am not a fit wife for you now, and I cannot be just or generous either. I cannot make you free again, and I am sorry—sorry."

"Are you?" he said. "I am not."

"I never can be a fine lady."

"No, that you can't, thank Heaven."

"Your sister has often lamented I was so unlike"—

"My dear," he interrupted, "I cannot have you say such things; you must not think them. Humbly I am grateful for the fortune which has come to me; but I would thankfully give it up this instant if keeping it involved the loss of you."

He felt her stealing a little nearer to him; he felt her soft hand touch his, and he went on, not without an effort, for he had never found it easy to speak of himself or his own feelings.

"I go back in memory to that night when I sate alone in Queen-square. I think of the words which decided my choice, 'Remember the corn in the ground.' Ah! Lucy, I could not know what I was planting then. I could not forecast what crop should spring from the seed then sown. All I knew for a certainty was that from tares a man may not reap wheat."

"The corn I put in the ground that night was but the produce of hesitating resolutions; it was scarcely of my own free will I cast it in the furrows at all, and yet what a harvest has been given to me. Friends in the time of bitterest need, and a wife whose love has been the greatest blessing of my life, without whom Brayley would be to me valueless."

He talked a little more, but that was the gist of his argument, that she was the one thing for which he most earnestly desired to offer thanksgiving.

Then, when her eyes were dry and her heart quiet, he said, "Come dear, let us go home."

So hand in hand they wended their way adown the green lanes and across fields—where the grain was already in ear—hand in hand together—as hand in hand they have walked through life ever since, corn springing up behind them as they passed along, and ripening to a harvest they shall not fear to reap.

"PUSS IN BOOTS."

BY JOHN E. MILLAIS, R.A.

A CHAT ABOUT THIS LITTLE PUSS IN BOOTS.

BY F. C. BURNAND.

"So the Cat became a great lord, and never again ran after rats and mice but for his amusement." Here ended, for the twentieth time, my Pussy-cat's tale, I mean my tale—the tale, in fact, of the celebrated Puss in Boots, the friend of the poor Miller's son, who afterwards became the great Marquis de Carabas.

And for the twentieth time came a little girl's question,

"Well, and what did they do then?"

In desperation I retorted,

"What did who do when?"

"Why," explained another little girl—a little older girl; "why, Zita means what did they do with the Boots?"

The question then was apropos des bottes.

I referred to the old Fairy Book, the genuine old one, on which I and my fathers before me had been brought up. The real old book, I mean, with the highly daubed plates, showing impossible Princes and Princesses and a Lord Mayor's coach in the Illustration that accompanies Puss in Boots.

This old book I hold in reverence as the sole authority on all questions about our ancient and well established Fairy Tales.

How many persons possess the real original edition? It must be priceless. There was a republication some few years ago, which was soon sold out. The stories are told as quaintly as are dear old Alban Butler's "Lives of the Saints," if I may be allowed the comparison.

So to this respectable Fairy Book—I think a Fairy Godmother must have given me mine,—but, alas! where is she now? Bless her!—I turned for an answer to this question,

"What became of the boots?"

No. There was no information on the subject. Still, my audience was one that "wanted to know," and their curiosity had to be satisfied somehow. I was arranging a "continuation in our next" when little Miss Zita put another inquiry,

"Weren't there any kittens?"

Yes; certainly there were. Listen.

The Puss who had been such a friend to the Marquis of Carabas became Lord Grimalkin, of Katseye Castle, in Catalonia. Here he fell in love with the lovely Lady Tabitha Molrousia, whom he married for love, and who became Lady Grimalkin, of Katseye Castle.

Lady Grimalkin, however, though beautiful, was far from strong. She suffered from nervous headaches, and couldn't bear even the sound of a mouse scratching behind the wainscot; for you may be sure that there are not many mice who allow themselves to be seen in Catalonia. For one of their tribe to be visible in that country is punishable with instant death. Now, if my lady could not stand even such a slight noise as that of a mouse in the wainscot, much less could she put up with the sound of her husband's boots as he scampered up and down stairs, and along the passages; or, above all, when on returning from the chase—the chasse aux souris des champs—or from a day's sport among the birds, for my Lord was a preserver as well as a destroyer, and was a deadly foe to all the poachers of his own species—when, I say, on these occasions his little foot-page, Boot Jack, would be in readiness to draw off the celebrated boots, which would be then thrown down with a heavy thud on the old oak floor, on which also the little foot-page generally fell backwards in the supreme effort required for this particular work.

"You can't come in here!" she used to cry out from her boudoir, when he was heard stamping towards her door. "You can't come here in those boots!"

"Not in these boots!" exclaimed her lord, with some surprise.

He was a little annoyed at first, of course; but domestic happiness is paramount to a mere question of boots, even when they have such a history as these had; and then my lady was really in a delicate—or, as they pronounce it in Catalonia, a delicat—state of health.

All attempts to appease her were bootless until he presented himself before her in slippers.

So, off came his boots, silently.

The next day my lady called her husband and said, "My dear, I am sure you must feel uncomfortable without your boots."

"And I've caught a severe cold—in fact, a nasty cat-arrh," said Grimalkin, struggling with a sneeze.

"I see," replied his wife, purring affectionately; "and believe me, my dear Tommy"—Tommy was his petit nom, you understand—"I am sorry you should suffer on my account."

"It's of no consequence," said my lord; and then they both purred together, in the most loving manner possible.

After a while her ladyship asked him to open the drawer of her cabinet.

He did so, and there before him was a box labelled, "A Present for a Kind Husband."

"Open it," said my lady, "and see what I have made for you."

She had worked him the most perfect pair of knitted boots, warm in winter, cool in summer, and noiseless always.

He was delighted. And then there was more purring, and more fondling.

From that moment Lord Grimalkin wore nothing on his feet but these knitted boots; and the old original clump-sole pair, which were beginning to be rather past work by this time, were presented to the celebrated Museum of Catalonia, where they may perhaps be seen to this very day, in their dilapidated condition, unless they have been soled, and walked off, with in the interim.

Soon after this memorable event, there were great rejoicings in the castle, and in the neighbourhood all about, for my lady had presented her husband with as fine, handsome, and as numerous a family, as had ever been seen, or heard of, even in Catalonia.

There were great doings at the christening, I warrant you; and the castle was filled with the cats of all countries, who arrived to take part in the rejoicings.

There were French Cats, in grey coats, and of the politest possible manners; Russian Cats, in thick furs; Spanish Cats, playing on cats-stanets; Black Cats from Africa, who amused the company immensely with negro melodies, accompanying themselves on various instruments, and dividing their rhythmical dramatic entertainments into strophés and catas-trophés; White Cats from Albania; Tortoise-shell Cats from the sea-coast, led by an Admiral of Great Renown from China, who was a Mandarin with nine tails; and hundreds of others, with The Cat and the Fiddle to conduct the orchestra.

As the kittens grew up, their kind mother provided each of them with mittens. But the taste for boots ran in the family, and whenever the three little kittens had lost their mittens, off their fore paws, they were invariably found neatly tied on their hind legs.

In time, old Lord and Lady Grimalkin were gathered to their ancestors, and were buried in the family Catacombs.

Some of their numerous descendants turned out rather wild, but for the most part they were highly respected by all who knew them. It is supposed that several branches of the Grimalkin family quitted Catalonia and settled about in various parts of the world; but the remarkable trait in this particular race is their partiality for boots—but especially for knitted ones.

"Did you ever know one?" asks little Miss Zita.

"Mr. Millais knew one, evidently," I reply, pointing to his picture. "Look!"

"Why, the kitten has got on the doll's little boots!" they exclaim; and there is a general feeling of pity for the poor doll, who must be suffering from cold feet, poor thing!

Miss Polly, in the picture, cannot make out where the doll's boots have gone to. She hasn't an idea that her little kitten is one of the descendants of Lord and Lady Grimalkin. Observe the expression of her eyes. She is staring out straight before her, and wondering what on earth can have become of Dolly's knitted boots!

The last place she will look for those little boots is on Tittikin's hind legs, and Tittikins, true to her Grimalkin instinct, will not give them up without a scratch.

"But how did Tittikins put them on?" asks one of the children, who is a great deal too matter-of-fact.

"How? Why, Mr. Millais put them on for her. He knows all about the Lord and Lady Grimalkin family history, and he was determined that, at Christmas time, the kitten should not be without a present of a pair of boots.

"But why didn't he give her a pair for herself, and not take the poor doll's?" asks little Gertie, who is far more interested in the doll than in the kitten.

"Perhaps," I reply, being always ready to defend an absent friend, "perhaps he didn't know that these boots were intended for the doll. I dare say she wasn't wearing them. She was in Polly's lap, being dressed, when Mr. Millais felt something purring about his legs, and, looking down, saw the kitten with a pair of knitted boots in its mouth, looking up and imploring him to put them on for her. So, as he didn't know they belonged to the doll, he took up his boot-brush and with a few masterly touches very kindly fitted them on the kitten's hind legs—and there she is."

"And will he give the doll a pair of boots too?" asks Miss Zita.

"Well," I can only say. "Perhaps he will next Christmas." But, in the mean time, little Polly may be, as the Miller's Son was, in great trouble, and then her Puss in Boots will advise her and help her. And, perhaps, one day Polly will say,

Pussy Cat, Pussy C— where have you been?

And Pussy will answer,

I've been to London, to see the Queen.

Just as her ancestor, the old original Puss in Boots, went to see the King, and so made his master's fortune. And perhaps Polly will become—who knows?—a great Princess, or, at least, a Marchioness, just as the Miller's Son became the Marquis of Carabas, all through having such a friend at Court as this little Puss in Boots."

"And what will she do with the doll?" inquires Gertie, who certainly thinks Dolly has been treated very unfairly.

"Dolly! Oh she will give her a beautiful Doll's House to live in."

"But she can't come out, because she has no boots."

"Then she must stay at home."

"And what will they do then?" they all want to know, one after the other.

"Well, you must ask Mr. Millais; for it's his little girl, not mine; and it's his little kitten, not mine. And as for what I've told you, it is only an idle chatter to amuse you; it is merely apropos des bottes."

"But will Mr. Millais tell us something more about the Boots?" asks the eldest.

"I do not know, my dears," I answer, as I make my escape from their importunities. "For, perhaps, he has quite another explanation of the picture, and, you see, his account of the Boots may be quite another pair of shoes altogether. Go and ask him; then come and tell me. Good-bye!"

OUR NOBLE ANCESTOR.

Not empty to them is the battered casque
They fondly circle with laurel and bay—
That iron bonnet ne'er served to mask
Brow more daring, the chronicles say.

And still is his memory sweet, I ween,
As the flower that beaconed his fighting life;
His deeds of valour are ever green
As the grace of his gentle Saxon wife.

Never unready the sturdy hand,
The voice for a catch or a battle-cry;
Ready, in sooth, with beaker and brand—
Ready with wine-cup, ready to die!

A Knight in his mantlet and helm and cuisse,—
A Knight in his doublet and silken hose,—
He'd a foot for a measure in time of peace,
A grip for an axe when they wanted blows.

Cherished yet in the hearts of those
Three fair maidens who kinship claim
With rough Sir Hugh, is the red red Rose,
That fragrance lends to his splendid name.

They are odorous yet, those dead leaves, though
Many a summer hath spent its breath
Since, one to many a furious foe,
He passed to God through a joyful death.

Odorous yet! and the centuries bring
Voices like answers to souls that pray—
Voices that thrill with a searching ring
The maiden crowning that helm to-day.

To-night they'll think of the grand old soul—
The heart of purpose straight and true!
And, dipping deep in the steaming bowl,
Will drink thy memory, brave Sir Hugh!

A FATAL NIGHT.

TWO SONNETS.

I.—AN EVIL OMEN.

There is a lurid glimmering in the sky,
Ghost of the blood-red sunset; wing and hoof
Of the strange beasts that guard yon gabled roof
Lose in the growing night their purple dye.
One latticed window gleams more ruddily
Out of the dark; there now is put to proof
A soul that from all kinship dwells aloof,
Prey to wild thoughts and evil memory.
Cursed love, dishonoured name, and wasted wealth
Make void the world to him. Revenge alone
Is left to live for: shall he snatch by stealth
This worthless treasure? Doubting while he stays
Hell's messenger the accurst Night-Raven's tone
Croaks forth its summons foul—and he obeys.

II.—WHERE THE DEED WAS DONE.

Here was it done: here the foul blow was given.
The murderer 'scaped, and wanders far away
Never by earthly justice brought to bay.
His brow bears not the stamp of that dark even,
Nor doth he flee as one by demons driven.
Only he carries with him, night and day,
This picture:—'Neath a clouded sky of grey
A withered tree, all gaunt and tempest-riven:
A trembling hound, by a bleak pool that stands:
The white moon, shining on a whiter face:
And One who smites his brow with bloody hands
And shrieks to the dead silence of that place.
And this One is Himself: nor furthest lands,
Nor Time, of this dread foe can win him grace.

EDWARD ROSE.

THE FAIRIES' FAVOURITE.

What! Not believe in fairies! Let me tell
What once I saw with these two eyes quite well;
And "seeing is believing," I believe.
For such poor sceptics one can only grieve,
As for those doubters in the torrid zone
When told that water sometimes turns to stone.
'Tis no use arguing with such as these,
So I'll just tell my story, if you please.

Once journeying with some friends, it so befell
That we alighted on the loveliest dell,
Where fairies, one said, if such beings were,
Would rendezvous, we might most safely swear.
The day's toil o'er, we lit cigars and smoked,
Of our adventures talked, and laughed and joked,
Till silence on us gradually fell,
As twilight's veil dropped softly o'er that dell.
With sharp, quick turnings bats around us flew,
And owls on winnowing wings—tu-whit, tu-whoo!
Some dozed, and some, I know, somorous slept;
Mine eyes the while wide-open vigil kept.
And as I puffed and silent mused, behold!
Most lovely creatures, clad in green and gold,
Upon a shimmering moonbeam gaily riding,
Came swarming—tripping, twirling, twinkling, gliding—
Till all the space was filled to overflowing
With airy sprites for ever coming, going.
Words at the best are feeble to describe
The pretty tricks of this most tricksy tribe.
Some slid on acorns, some heels over head
(Not head o'er heels, be it in brackets said)
Came tumbling, with vagaries ever new.
They crawled and crept, they danced and leapt; then flew
In many a mazy circle round and round;
Now pirouetting singly on the ground;
And now coquetting, with small mincing paces,
Like fine Court ladies with their airs and graces.
There came a squirrel, that, to my surprise,
Stared at them calmly, with his large round eyes,
And not at all afraid, but quite sedate,
An acorn from their dainty fingers ate;
Nor did they fear that he might scratch or bite—
'Twas plain he was the Fairies' Favourite.

The moonbeam faded—straightway with the same
Fled all the fairies, sudden as they came.
There was the squirrel, but the fairy host
Had vanished in a twinkling, like a ghost.

When this I told my friends, some laughed outright,
Said no such vision fair had blessed their sight—
(How could they see when they were fast asleep?)
One hinted they the whisky jar must keep
In their own charge; another, jeering, said
The moon must have affected my poor head.
But "seeing is believing"—thus I hold
A sterling truth of eighteen-carat gold.
Lucky for me, a comrade who could draw
Saw the same sight, and sketched what we both saw—
Not now by any to be contradicted,
For here it is in black and white depicted:
The counterpart of that which blessed my vision—
Identically the same scene elysian;
But what I've striven by pen to show in vain,
His vivid pencil brings to life again.—J. L.

YOUNG FACES AND OLD FASHIONS.

A show of fashions of the long dead years—
Ruffle, smock, tabby, cap, and red-heeled shoe;
Old robes familiar with smiles and tears;
Masks of black satin, flowery gowns once blue.

Quaint modes, which wake such laughter in girls' eyes,
As will be waked in other eyes by ours:
Poor relics of the past; faint memories
Cling to them still of all their busy hours.

Beneath this paduasoy Belinda's heart
Beat, maybe; in that lustring Siddons played;
Bold Lady Mary edged her beauty's dart,
For Pope, too bright before, with this brocade.

That dusty mask the lustre of Lepel
With sable shadow might have helped to mar;
Brave in this flowery silk, far down the Mell
Did gracious Bellenden beam like a star?

It may be. They have set, long past away.
No prayer can bring them back, nor bended knees.
But boots it aught to dim our heaven to-day
By thinking our suns, too, must set like these?

No. Let us rather boast, though all unbid
Such sad thought come, that never so divine
A form as Julie's by this robe was hid,
Nor, Nellie, by that mask a smile like thine!

THANKFULLY RECEIVED.

This is a mere customary phrase to acknowledge gifts which one may or may not have wanted, but which one feels it would be inexpedient to decline. In the present instance, however, there is a matter of personal feeling between the giver and receiver, which does credit to both of them. In the rural parish of Mudgebury, fourteen miles from the nearest market town, which is Hogford St. Mary, and just in the loamiest level district of East Beanshire, stood the mansion of a worthy Anglican presbyter, the younger son of an Earl. The Honourable and Reverend Horatio Benedictus Vipont, Master of Arts, and sometime Fellow of Boanerges College, in the University of Camford, held the Rectory of Mudgebury-cum-Pebbleton, worth eight hundred a year, since the accession of Queen Victoria. He had further inherited a family bequest to the annual value of six hundred, which raised his life-income to an equality with some of the untitled landowning gentry of the neighbourhood; but after the death of his father, the late Earl of Brock, circumstances had deprived Mr. Vipont of the opportunity, for which he cared but little, of frequenting the aristocratic society open to a man of birth. His elder brother Francis, while only yet styled Lord Winstleton, had fallen in the Crimean battles, leaving the young future Earl, an ungracious spoiled boy at Harrow, to the charge of a silly mother. Her Ladyship soon quarrelled with Mr. Vipont, declined to hear his advice, or even to receive him at Brockwood Hall, and the uncle had to suffer the grief of hearing, for the next ten years, worse and worse accounts of his noble nephew's profligate behaviour.

But in his own comfortable household at the Mudgebury parsonage, so long as the beloved wife of his youth was permitted to share that dwelling, Mr. Vipont enjoyed an amount of domestic felicity for which, as a sound Protestant clergyman, he was sincerely grateful, comparing his blameless matrimonial bliss with the celibacy of Romish priesthood. During thirty years of tranquil residence and easy clerical duty, his life was cheered by the constant affection of his amiable lady, the daughter of Archdeacon Palk; and their elder children, one by one, departed from beneath the parental roof, Horace to enter the Army, Julia to marry a rising clerk in the Red Tape Office, Antony, the bookish brother, to win a tutorship at St. Boanerges. Then came a sudden stroke of irreparable loss and all but inconsolable bereavement, accompanying the birth of the youngest child, little Ethel Vipont, who is now a sweet girl of ten motherless years. The widower, bearing his great sorrow with Christian fortitude, thenceforth bestowed more diligence than before on the pastoral visitation of his flock, homely and humble folk as they were; his public ministry also displayed greater zeal for souls, a more earnest and thorough discourse in the pulpit, and he was ever assiduous in the direction of the parish schools. But, if there was any poor husband in the village who chanced to lose that crown more priceless than rubies, a good and faithful wife—to him, with a heartfelt sympathy, and with a manly tenderness that was irresistible, would the Rector most eagerly proffer all he could of divine and humane consolation.

Such a case was that of Farmer Briggs, the tenant of Pebbleton Grange, when poor Mrs. Briggs, after long suffering from cancer, died three winters ago. Mr. Vipont then earned the lasting gratitude of her spouse by his frank and brotherly response to a natural sorrow, which his own former experience had made him capable of understanding. Peter Briggs was a sort of man who had few words at command at any time; but who, under the influence of strong emotion, would become utterly speechless, while the eloquence that his tongue could not utter poured forth in his eyes, not merely with looks of passionate feeling, but with a copious flow of tears down his rugged and sun-burnt cheeks. The same kind of expression we have often seen displayed with intense vehemence in the face of a dumb animal, a distressed horse, cow, deer, or dog; and this silent gaze of wistful fondness with which the sensitive creature, your spaniel or retriever, will plead against your harsh rebuke or mere neglect, has been felt to be really affecting. Now, Peter Briggs was one of that good, honest, true-hearted, simple-minded, artless kind of men who greatly resemble big, good-tempered dogs. It is not worth while to report a word of what he said to the Rector. The reader may fancy how he looked, or may turn the page to an Engraving called "Thankfully received," drawn by Mr. C. Gregory for this Christmas publication. There stands the Hon. and Rev. H. B. Vipont, with his dear little Ethel beside him, the only remaining members of the family now in the rather stately Rectory-house. The dignified air of high-bred urbanity and mental culture, with the strictly clerical attire, somewhat old-fashioned in point of watch seals and gaiters, must be recognised as quite in character. He is a good specimen of the regular country clergyman, well connected, well educated, well beneficed, and well behaved; in doctrine a model of Via Media correctness, in parish work fairly up to his Church's standard, but with the peculiarities of the last generation. The Church of England alone can exhibit this peculiar type, which may or may not correspond with some notions of the Apostolic, the Evangelical or the Sacerdotal, but which has a certain social value in common English life. Farmer Briggs, as we perceive, has driven his pony-cart over from Pebbleton, on the day before Christmas, bringing his yearly token of grateful remembrance to the kind and discreet pastor who once showed him, by the light of the Gospel, how to frame his mind to serene and hopeful faith in the hour of his bitter affliction. And the Rector, being a perfect gentleman, cheerfully accepts the simple gift of a contribution to his larder, though he is already overstocked. The fine plump bird is "thankfully received," because it is a pledge of neighbourly kindness. The Rector of this parish is a tolerably rich man, but not half so rich as the Squire, and the Rector gives twice as much in charities to the poor. O. P. Q.

LUCKY DOG.

My lady smiles on him
To me no favours fall.
His form is fair and slim
I am not fair at all;
My face is somewhat grim,
His head's symmetrical
Although his brains are small.

Yet I can love as well
As twenty dogs like that.
My eyes my passion tell
Albeit my nose is flat.
I'd fight for Lady Bell—
He'd tremble at a rat
And fly before a cat.

I gaze upon his bliss
With short despairing sneezes.
Sometimes I think it is
From love my lady teazes
Her faithful pug like this—
Ah then, cease doleful wheezes
Do she whate'er she pleases!

Still sad I sit and blink
Her memory to jog.
I shiver, quiver, shrink;
E'en were it raised to flog
I'd kiss her hand—and think,
With such an epilogue,
Myself a lucky dog!—E. R.

THE VICAR'S DAUGHTER.

Somewhere down in Devonshire, on the margin of a miniature river that in summer gleams in the almost Italian sunlight like polished emerald and chrysoprase, reflecting a thousand lovely hues of dewy herbage and fern, and dripping moss and lichen, I know a small church and vicarage, wellnigh lost to view amidst the tall ancestral trees of a neighbouring manor—like the memorials of departed worth overgrown by lush flowery verdure in the adjacent churchyard. The inmates of that secluded cottage—for it is no more—seemed (when I saw them), by their pious, primitive life, to straight recall the story of Wakefield's Vicar and his beautiful daughters, with all the idyllic simplicity of that pathetic tale. The illusion was heightened by the dress of the girls, the elder one in particular, who, "careless of beauty, for she was Beauty's self," was attired in all the heedless grace of mob-cap and fichu, and flowered chintz gown, as though the fashion of a hundred years ago still lingered in that remote nook. The fashion harmonised perfectly with her frank, handsome face, and, at the same time, served as a foil to her luxuriant black hair and her lustrously-rich yet softly-shaded black eyes. A truer gentlewoman never lived, though I know not if she had "blue blood" in her veins; more probably she was of pure Celtic descent from the Ancient Britons of the West. And for such an embodiment of purest maidenhood the noblest Knight of Arthur's Table Round might well nerve himself for loftiest emprise, with a devotion equal to that of Sir Galahad in quest of the Holy Grail. I could wish to find an artist with taste quite congenial to the theme, who would help me to realise that Vicar's daughter to my readers. I think he would evoke a sense—that would steal over us sweet as the fragrance of the damask-rose that nestled in that gentle bosom—of the nameless charm of that eighteenth-century English compound of homely negligence with demure primness; a charm more delicious than that of Greuze, with none of his immodesty. This might be the first impression from the painter's art. But his realisation would suggest this and much more to my readers. Men with the chastened reverence of age for beauty and love might bend grave moist eyes on the sweet face and dream of a daughter or other loved and lost one of long, long ago. Young men might think with hope and pride, or with tremor and sigh, of one such dearer than life itself; and maidens might find a likeness to an absent yet not the less cherished friend. Children might picture to themselves a dear sister and second mother. To some poor afflicted soul she might recall a very angel of patience and compassion; whilst the rich and prosperous could find in her the type of the best and purest medium for administering that merciful charity which at this season is twice—nay, thrice blessed. THOS. J. GULLICK.

THE MISTLETOE BOUGH.

The Grandsire's head is like a hill
White in its wintry cap of snow;
The old man's heart is glowing still
As warm as sixty years ago.

When Grandmother, a brisk young maid,
Returned with joy his manly love,
Beneath the Mistletoe she strayed
Its virtues with a kiss to prove.

But see! her grandchild now, and his,
Long after she has gone to Heaven,
Receives her ancient sweetheart's kiss,
With blessings to this Baby given.

MR. QUIVERFULL'S CHRISTMAS BOX.

"Believe me, I loved you at first sight! A life's devotion is yours—coupled with the emoluments derived by me (no small income, including commission) as commercial traveller for the City firm of Sniptick and Co. Will you"——

The rest of this amorous speech was lost to me. Quite unintentionally, the first part of it was overheard by me as I leant over the railing of the captain's bridge and sent a blue cloud rolling from my trusty brier, wondering the while how much longer my friend Quiverfull would be away on his mission to the cabin.

Jim Quiverfull, I knew, would have been a far less calm listener to this avowal than I was. Jim could never resist a pretty face. And there was no denying that our fair fellow-passenger was pretty and winsome to the tips of her fingers. A wealth of flossy hair crowned a witching face, with cheeks rosy with the healthy red of a quarantine apple; and the sauciest blue eyes, shaded with dark lashes, shot out the most coquettish glances, as if by instinct, whenever any one of the rougher sex was nigh the seductive little damsel in a neat black merino dress and the most piquante hat one ever set eyes on. She couldn't help being fascinating. It came quite natural to her—that was plain, but the only thing plain about the gay-hearted creature. Jim struck his colours directly he saw her. In fact, nearly all the men on board did, from the Captain downwards. It was our bronzed and gallant Captain who escorted the little lady up to the bridge, and had a camp-stool placed for her behind the smug storm-screen, the seclusion of which had tempted the bagman to steal a march on Jim, and to make a proposal (just as he might have cajoled a mercer into buying a bale of silk) whilst Jim had gone down to borrow a rug for the fair charmer, with whom, it should in justice be mentioned, he was the first to make the running.

Presently I ventured to look round, and noted that one of our beauty's dainty boots was impatiently beating time to the throbbing engine, whilst the dapper bagman was pulling his drab whiskers morosely as he slunk down the ladder, and Captain Hanson seemed to be nervously pacing to and fro close to the storm-screen. What could Jim be doing all this while?

"I've a snugger berth as skipper of the Cupid than you might think, Missie. More than that—[wish it, Missie, I'm no hand at this kind of navigation, but if I"——

Hang me if the Captain hadn't followed the bagman's example! However, I was determined to be an unwitting hearer of this sort of thing no longer. So I quietly made the best of my way down to the deck. Here was Jim at last! Not only laden with a cosy Paisley shawl, but having in his hands a tray freighted with a toothsome luncheon. The epicurean rogue! Jim was clearly bearing his offering to the shrine.

"Oh, thanks, very much! you're too good!" came lisping from the red lips of the incorrigible flirt, as she sent a violet shaft straight into Jim's grey eyes. From that moment Jim was irrevocably done for. The offing was clear. Poor Captain Hanson's fate was obvious from the rigidity of his attitude and the jerky abruptness of his manual signs to the steersman. As for the cosy luncheon, let me not dwell upon our fairy's crowning victory, nor upon the forging, link by link, of the chain that was destined to bind poor Jim Quiverfull to Araminta Sleckington very soon after their return from the Paris Exhibition of 1867.

* * * * *

Eleven years have flown past like the wind since the fair Araminta, the admired of many, honoured Jim with her hand. Whether their union has been happy may be gathered from the characteristic epistle Jim has just written to me:—

My dear Phil,—Congratulate me. Jim Quiverfull's quiver is full, with a vengeance. I should be happy. I was playing with the youngsters this morning in Little Babel—or Nursery, if you like—when the door was thrown open, and, fancy! the old nurse came smiling in with a babe on each arm, and this message on her lips, "Missus's Christmas Box, Sir! She's sent it early this year; and a finer pair, boy and girl, I've never seen!" Now, don't laugh till you're out of the wood! You promised, Phil, to be godfather to my next. So you must be godfather to both, old fellow! But what shall we call them? It is imperative that they form another chapter of our "History for the Hearth" (copyright reserved). What names have we used up! Our firstborn came about a year after that memorable visit with dear Araminta to the '67 Paris Exhibition. What more apt, then, than the name of Eugénie for our first girl? By 1869, Gladstone was at the height of his popularity; and so we dubbed our first boy William. In '70 fell the French Empire; and hence Lulu's name. In '71, Germany completed her conquest of France; and Fritz was christened after the Crown Prince. How could we more fitly celebrate the Queen's victory over King Koffee in '73 than by calling our next little girl Victoria? In '75 our most mischievous brat made his appearance, and "Young Turk" naturally became his nickname, though I well remember coming home, Phil, with a breathless fear during that critical time last year, when the poor little fellow lay was so feeble in his cradle, and every night we feared lest the wee one should vanish into the silent land. But, thanks be to loving nurses and our devoted doctor, "Young Turk's" himself again. Ah! you little know how these tiny ones cling like tendrils round the heart until you've won the experience for yourself, Phil. And somehow it comes true that the fuller one's quiver gets, the abler one is to meet "the enemy at the gate;" for when things look darkest something always turns up to provide the wherewithal for butcher and baker, milkman and tailor. But what shall we name the twins? I have it. War is over. We all long for a New Year of Peace and Friendship with every Power. Let's christen them Alfred and Marie in token that as two Imperial Families are, or should be, bound together by a Marie and an Alfred, so should the two Empires be pacifically united.

Yours, happily, JIM QUIVERFULL.

P.S.—It never rains but it pours. Two more Christmas Boxes just to hand. But this time they take the form of a couple of hampers sent every year to Araminta (doing very well, thank you!), and she shrewdly suspects they come from the two rivals I cut out on board the Cupid!

FLORILINE.

For the TEETH and BREATH.

A few drops of the FRAGRANT FLORILINE on a wet tooth-brush produce a delightful foam, which cleanses the Teeth from all impurities, strengthens and hardens the gums, prevents tartar and arrests the progress of decay. It gives to the Teeth a peculiar and beautiful whiteness, and imparts a delightful fragrance to the breath. It removes all unpleasant odour arising from decayed teeth, a disordered stomach, or tobacco smoke. The FRAGRANT FLORILINE is purely vegetable, and equally adapted to old and young.

The FRAGRANT FLORILINE should be used in all cases of bad breath, and particularly by gentlemen after smoking. The Florilline combines, in a concentrated form, the most desirable, cleansing, and astringent properties. At the same time, it contains nothing which can possibly injure the most sensitive and delicate organisation.

It beautifies the teeth and gums.
It arrests the decay of the teeth.
It acts as a detergent after smoking.
It renders the gums hard and healthy.
It neutralises the offensive secretions of the mouth.
It imparts to the breath a fragrance purely aromatic and pleasant.

Put up in large bottles (only one size) and in elegant toilet cases, complete, at 2s. 6d. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers. Prepared only by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-st., London.

FLORILINE.

For the TEETH and BREATH.

Sweet as the ambrosial air,
With its perfume rich and rare;
Sweet as violets at the morn,
Which the emerald mooks adorn;
Sweet as rosebuds bursting forth,
From the richly-laden earth,
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

The teeth it makes a pearly white,
So pure and lovely to the sight;
The gums assume a rosy hue,
The breath is sweet as violets blue;
While scented as the flowers of May
Which cast their sweetness from each spray,
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

Sure, some fairy with its hand
Cast around its mystic wand,
And produced from fairy's bower
Scented perfumes from each flower;
For in this liquid gem we trace—
All that can beauty add and grace—
Such is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

FLORILINE.

For the TEETH and BREATH.

Is the best liquid dentifrice in the world, it thoroughly cleanses partially decayed teeth from all parasites or living animalculæ, leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The full fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The Fragrant Florilline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco-smoke.

For children and adults whose teeth show marks of decay its advantages are paramount. The "Florilline" should be thoroughly brushed into all the cavities; no one needs fear using it too often or too much at a time. Among the ingredients being soda, honey, spirits of wine, borax, and extracts from sweet herbs and plants, it forms not only the very best dentifrice for cleansing ever discovered, but one that is perfectly delicious to the taste and as harmless as sherry. The taste is so pleasing that, instead of taking up the toothbrush with dislike, as is often the case, children will on no account omit to use the "Florilline" regularly each morning if only left to their own choice. Children cannot be taught the use of the toothbrush too young; early neglect invariably produces premature decay of the teeth. "Florilline" is prepared only by HENRY C. GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London; and sold by all Chemists and Perfumers throughout the world, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.

FLORILINE.

For the TEETH and BREATH.

If teeth are white and beautiful,
It keeps them so intact,
If they're discoloured in the least,
It brings their whiteness back;
And by its use what good effects
Are daily to be seen;
Thus hence it is that general praise
Greets "FRAGRANT FLORILINE!"

One trial proves conclusive quite,
That by its constant use
The very best effects arise
That science can produce
It is the talk of every one,
An all-absorbing theme;
Whilst general now becomes the use,
Of "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

It makes the breath as sweet as flowers,
The teeth a pearly white,
The gums it hardens, and it gives
Sensations of delight.
All vile secretions it removes,
However long they've been;
The enamel, too, it will preserve,
The "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

FLORILINE.

For the TEETH and BREATH.

It may or may not be generally known that microscopical examinations have proved that animal or vegetable parasites gather, unobserved by the naked eye, upon the teeth and gums of at least nine persons in every ten; any individual may easily satisfy himself in this matter by placing a powerful microscope over a partially-decayed tooth, when the living animalculæ will be found to resemble a partially-decayed cheese more than anything else we can compare it to. We may also state that the FRAGRANT FLORILINE is the only remedy yet discovered able perfectly to free the teeth and gums from these pests and without the slightest injury to the teeth or the most tender gums.

Read this.—From the "Weekly Times," March 26, 1871.—"There are so many toilet articles which obtain all their celebrity from being constantly and extensively advertised that it makes it necessary when anything new and good is introduced to the public that special attention should be called to it. The most delightful and effective toilet article for cleansing and beautifying the teeth that we in our experience have ever used is the new Fragrant Florilline. It is quite a pleasure to use it, and its properties of imparting a fragrance to the breath and giving a pearly whiteness to the teeth make it still more valuable. Of all the numerous nostrums for cleaning the teeth which from time to time have been fashionable and popular, nothing to be compared with the Florilline has hitherto been produced, whether considered as a beautifier or a valuable cleanser and preserver of the teeth and gums."

From the "Young Ladies' Journal":—"An agreeable dentifrice is always a luxury. As one of the most agreeable may be reckoned Florilline. It cleanses the teeth and imparts a pearl colour to the breath. It has been analysed by several eminent professors of chemistry, and they concur in their testimony to its usefulness. We are frequently asked to recommend a dentifrice to our readers, therefore we cannot do better than advise them to try the Fragrant Florilline."

Prepared by HENRY C GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London.

FLORILINE.

For the TEETH and BREATH.

I have heard a strange statement, dear Fanny, to-day,
That the reason that teeth do decay
Is traced to some objects that form in the gums,
And eat them in time quite away.
Animalcules, they say, are engendered—that is,
If the mouth is not wholesome and clean;
And I also have heard to preserve them the best
Is the fragrant, the sweet "FLORILINE!"

Oh, yes! it is true that secretions will cause
Living objects to form on your teeth,
And certainly and steadily do they gnaw on
In cavities made underneath;
But a certain preservative Gallup has found,
To keep your mouth wholesome and clean;
And you're perfectly right, for your teeth to preserve,
There's nothing like sweet "FLORILINE!"

'Tis nice and refreshing, and pleasant to use,
And no danger its use can attend;
For clever physicians and dentists as well
Their uniform praises now blend.
They say it's the best preparation that's known,
And evident proofs have they seen,
That nothing can equal the virtues that dwell
In the fragrant, the sweet "FLORILINE!"

FLORILINE.

For the TEETH and BREATH.

The "Christian World" of March 17, 1871, says, with respect to Florilline:—"Florilline bids fair to become a household word in England, and one of peculiarly pleasant meaning. It would be difficult to conceive a more efficacious and agreeable preparation for the teeth. Those who once begin to use it will certainly never willingly give it up."

Mr. G. H. Jones, the eminent Dentist, of 57, Great Russell-street, in his valuable little book on Dentistry, says:—"The use of a good dentifrice is also indispensable, and one of the best preparation for cleansing the teeth and removing the impure secretions of the mouth is the liquid dentifrice called 'Fragrant Florilline,' which is sold by all respectable chemists."

The words "Fragrant Florilline" are a Trade-Mark.

Prepared by HENRY GALLUP, 493, Oxford-street, London, and sold Everywhere throughout Great Britain and the United States.

INQUIRE WITHIN.
The Mouth is like a house to let. However pretty it may be externally, it is impossible to judge of its merits until you have seen the inside. If beyond the ruby doors there are plenty of pearl-white fixtures, you will exclaim at once "How beautiful!" To impart the utmost possible brilliancy to such dental furniture—to keep it always sound and perfect—there is nothing like fragrant SOZODONT.

DO JUSTICE TO NATURE.
It is ingratitude to nature not to preserve and keep in splendid order a good set of Teeth. Nothing can be easier. All that is needed is to brush them briskly night and morning with purifying SOZODONT. It will make the mouth a perfumed palace.

LOOK AT THE RUINS!
Aye, look at the ruins of what were once magnificent sets of teeth to be seen everywhere in society. Look at them, and ask yourself if it is not marvellous that such destruction is permitted, when, by simply using SOZODONT, any teeth, however fragile, may be preserved from decay or blemish as long as life lasts?

THE PEARLY GATES.
Pure white teeth and a sweet breath, issuing like perfume from the rose, through a pair of lovely lips, are, as Shakespeare says, "an excellent thing in woman." To keep the "pearly gates" of the mouth always spotless, and the breath always fragrant, it is only necessary to use the SOZODONT daily.

GLITTERING TEETH.
Not only does SOZODONT impart the whiteness of the purest porcelain to the teeth, but its polish too. They glisten, after being brushed with it, like the inner surface of an ocean-shell, and the effect of this peerless dentifrice is to render the enamel as hard and indestructible as adamant.

THE FRAGRANT SOZODONT is put up in large Bottles, fitted with patent Sprinklers for applying the liquid to the tooth-brush. Each bottle is inclosed in a handsome toilet-box, on which are labels and directions in the English, French, Spanish and German languages. Price 3s. 6d. One bottle will last six months.

DUC DE MONTABOR WRITES:
"Château de Montabor, Aveyron.
"Sir,—Having suffered for some time from an obstinate cough, accompanied with fever, continuous headaches, and sleepless night, I resolved, after having vainly tried several other medicines, to have recourse to your BALSAM OF ANISEED. I cannot resist, Sir, the desire of making you acquainted with the really marvellous results which I derived from it. From the first dose I felt great relief, the bad symptoms grew feebler, the irritation of the throat was calming down, and I recovered the sleep which had nearly left me. The third dose delivered me completely, and I am now completely restored to health.
"Receive, Sir, with the expression of my gratitude, the assurance of my distinguished sentiments.
"DUC DE MONTABOR."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS.
"The improvements made in English pianos have caused this trade rapidly to increase, until one pianoforte manufactory after another has been built to supply the growing demand. One of the largest of these, lately erected by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore-street, covers nearly an acre of ground in the Grafton-road, Kentish Town, and is intended to accommodate 300 workmen. These works alone can supply 3000 pianos annually. The French papers have been unanimous in their expressions of admiration of these splendid instruments. The two Grands especially have enchanted the Parisian professors and amateurs of music by their noble sonorousness, their enormous power, and the sympathetically voicelike quality of tone. The touch, also, is beautifully light, elastic, and certain, so that many pianists of every nation, from the Abbe Liszt downwards, who have tried these instruments, have highly complimented the enterprising manufacturers on their success. The improvements are too numerous to describe in detail, but it has been necessary to embody them in several patents recognised throughout Europe and America. Vigorous attempts have been made to perfect every portion of these instruments, and the whole has been constructed on entirely new principles throughout. The 'perfect check repeater action' renders the mechanism durable and perfect; the new complete metal framing ensures the durability and strength of the case, in spite of a great increase in the length of the string; the new sostenente roundings heard produces a lovely 'singing' and grandly powerful quality of tone; while the sympathetic bridge of reverberation assists in the sustaining power; and the sustaining pedal enables the performer to produce beautifully-sustained effects, without the confused roar that has hitherto been attendant on the employment of the forte pedal."—Illustrated London News.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS'
GOLD MEDAL PIANOS,
with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.
"A metal bridge of a peculiar form is used to produce the treble, and a much finer tone is elicited than if a wooden bridge were used."—Morning Post.
"Beautifully light and elastic touch, and an instant repetition."—Globe.
"This invention is simplicity itself."—The Queen.
"Receive the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—The Standard.

CRAMER and CO. cannot too frequently repeat that their THREE-YEARS' SYSTEM of HIRING PIANOFORTES is not confined to those of their own manufacture—although they are as good as any, and better than most—but includes instruments by all the eminent manufacturers—Broadwood, Collard, and Erard—of whose Pianofortes Cramer and Co. have always in stock a very extensive and complete selection, ready to be sent out at any time. Illustrated Lists, with prices, terms, and other information, on application to either of Cramer and Co.'s Ware-Rooms, in Regent-street, or Moorgate-street. City.

DANCING WAS DANCING IN THOSE DAYS.

"Hoity-toity! young madam, when I was a dancer,
And your grandmother (God bless her!) we both of us danced;
At the County Assemblies, child—I'm no romancer—
When we took the floor every soul was entranced.
Now-a-days there 's no dancing; it 's nothing but gliding
And walking and bowing, by parcels of fools!
We never were given to sinking and sliding—
It was toe-ing and heel-ing we learnt in the schools."

"Confess, you sly puss, what that ghost of a groan meant.
How dare you? Our dancing a series of jumps!
Before the night ends you shall make me atonement:
You never will stand in your grandmother's pumps!
Look at her portrait, there, painted by Lawrence,
And marvel no longer that reason nor rhyme
I find in your fashions, 'tis simply abhorrence
That I entertain for the ways of the time."

"Our fashions. What ailed them? At least they were urban,
And they lasted much longer than fashions last now.
When your grandmother wore her best feathers and turban,
She looked like an empress 'with pride on her brow.'
And I—ah! That costume, why, why did they shelve it?
(We wore it when England did nothing by halves)
That coat with gilt buttons and collar of velvet—
That garment which clothed, without hiding one's calves!"

"A Buck was a Buck (galligaskins and gaiters!)
When a neat ball-room costume embellished his form;
But the Bucks of to-day might be so many waiters,
Were it not for the gibus each wears to keep warm.
And as for department, I 'm doubtful, Miss, whether
It did not decline when some rickety knave
Introduced a reform in the garments called nether,
And made every one to his habits a slave."

"Alas! for the days of the gorgeous Prince Regent!
And Brummel, who helped him the fashions to forge!
When one or the other great creature was the gent-Leman all of us copied, by George!
I once was made happy by dancing before him,
With your grandmother (drest in white satin and pearls),
When he said, 'Egad, famous!' I bowed, to adore him;
When he smiled, she blushed coyly, the proudest of girls!"

"Yes, dancing was dancing when I was a youth, dear,
As Drury's Professor, de Cormack, knows well;
Ah! he could convince you there 's nothing but truth, dear,
In the fragments of tales you 've provoked me to tell.
But for gout and rheumatics, I 'd wager a thimble
Of gold I could show you young capers yet
The right way to foot it—but no! I am nimble
No longer. Good-night! So, kiss me, my pet!"

MY LADY'S CARRIAGE STOPS THE WAY.

In this blessed holiday, or holy, time, which brings "good-will" to all, we naturally turn with fresh affection to our children and child-friends; for "charity" should "begin at home;" and we have our children, like the poor, "always with us"—we can always procure the well-being and promote the happiness of those dear little retainers. And so we have come to give children's Christmas parties—the pleasantest invention and prettiest sight of our recent social life. One such party has a little lady-heiress within our cognizance graced with the beauty of her fair face, fresh as the bud of a blush-rose, and the radiance of her golden, flowing hair, fashionably festooned with flowers and braided with ribbons; and with all the bravery of Chinese-blue satin sash, and duchesse point flounce, clocked-silk stockings and high-heeled shoes, and gorgeous bouquet of hot-house exotics. But the time must arrive, sooner or later, to quit the ball-room—her ladyship, perhaps, begins to feel tired and sleepy, and the little head begins to ache. So the kind bonne in attendance takes her fan, and, to protect her against the cold, snowy night, enfolds her in warm fleecy scarf, and ermine and quilted cloak. And there I see her standing at the foot of the grand staircase, among the flowering plants brought for the occasion from the conservatory, till her carriage shall draw up. As she stands there so demurely buttoning her gloves, I wonder whether she vaguely realises that she has been the belle of the evening on this the first, it may well be, of a long series of similar galeties—the prelude of a later presentation fraught with far more import.

And when to-morrow comes how pleasant it will be to hear her prattle to Mamma, on her visit to the nursery, about the gay doings over night. I think I hear her babbling in words like these:—"The place and the people were all so strange to me, dear Mamma, I felt like Alice in Wonderland; only it was all quite real, you know. Such dazzling lights, such lovely dresses, such beautiful music, such delightful dances, you would not believe. I danced nearly every dance—twice with Sir Reginald. He has large black eyes, you know; not blue, like mine. He wrote his name so nicely on my list of engagements: I brought the pretty programme-book away with me, and am going to keep it for his sake—may I not, Mamma? In the cotillon, too, I did not wipe the mirror when he came behind me, but took him for a partner. But when he was going to kneel to me I drew the cushion away for fun—I fear it was naughty, dear Mamma—he was so angry, and called me 'coquette.' Afterwards we made it up and he took me to supper—oh, such a splendid supper! What do you think he drew from a 'cosaque,'—I think they call it?—a foolscap! I made him wear it, and he looked so very funny in it I clapped my hands and laughed very much. He was angry again, but we made it up once more over a lovely bonbon with such pretty lines. I was so sorry when the time came to go; and I was almost afraid when the butler, or porter, called out so grandly, 'My lady's carriage stops the way,' and the tall footmen stood waiting for little me, as though it were you, Mamma. But oh, what dreadful faces were those out in the dark cold night! I thought one woman might be a wicked fairy watching to make me a changeling for the pale, hungry-looking child at her side. But my bonne was there, and James, and the policeman, so I felt safe. Oh! but what do you think I dreamt last night? I dreamt all that you told me of the Child Jesus, and the star of Bethlehem, and the wise men's offerings—I wonder if they made Jesus as rich as I am?—and of the flight into Egypt, and the wide desert—its burning sun by day, its brilliant stars by night—and the roaring of the lions. Then I dreamt of that cruel, cruel Herod, and woke crying, and fancied I heard creaking footsteps creeping towards me; but it was only the hissing of the snowflakes as they fell into the fire. Then I heard soft music in the air, like the angels' music that the shepherds heard; and, listening, I fell asleep again—oh, so sweetly!—and did not wake till broad daylight this Christmas morning." Sweet be thy slumbers ever, fair child, with the blessing on thy head of Him who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me," without distinction of fair or deformed, rich or poor.

T. J. G.

THE CHRISTMAS BOARS'S-HEAD;

ITS LEGENDS AND TRADITIONS.

Presented to the reader's notice on another page, is the portrait (surely, it must be a portrait! it is so lifelike) of a mediæval man of mark—I might say a man of Marks; for he has been limned by the faithful pencil of the popular painter Henry Stacey Marks, A.R.A., who, from the days when he produced his Gargoyle carver, or his "Toothache in the Middle Ages," has annually set before us so many subjects for our admiration and delight. He has here given us a middle-age scene, with work for the teeth, though, we may hope, not to be followed by the toothache; but the tusks of that boar's head—the Cook's masterpiece, to which he has just put the finishing touch—are suggestive of teeth and their work. Those "cruel tusks," as Spenser calls them, must have been whetted "with foaming wrath;" and now the entire head is ready to be served up, to whet the appetite of the Christmas guest, at the table of some baronial mansion or College hall.

Duly dressed and garnished, and with the lemon in its open jaws, the Cook regards his completed work with the eye of an artist who is satisfied with the perfected result. It is now ready to be borne with triumphal procession into the Banqueting-hall, there to inaugurate the Christmas dinner; while the Cook, professionally attired, and as jolly as the season, looks lovingly upon his triumph of culinary art, as it lies in the silver dish on the massive oak table. It may be in some huge kitchen, like to that in Durham Castle, where the Prince-Bishops kept good Christmas cheer; or in that of "Burghley House, by Stamford town," which was a portion of the old monastic buildings of the Abbots of Peterborough; and, from its dimensions, and the great height of its vaulted roof, is one of the finest kitchens in England. In it hangs a large and remarkable picture of a huge ox, laid open and ready for the Christmas cooking; it is painted in the artist's best style, and that artist was none other than Sir Peter Paul Rubens, who was so fond of a boar-hunt for the subject of his brush. Or that dish with the Boar's head may be on the table of a kitchen in some College, like to that at Queen's College, Oxford, where, from time immemorial, it has been the custom to bring in the Boar's-head with great ceremony for the Christmas-Day dinner. A full-page drawing of this scene was given many years ago in this Journal by Mr. T. L. Williams. It showed the procession passing up the Hall between a crowd of spectators, ladies also being in the end gallery; the dish was borne high overhead by two bearers, while the choristers, both men and boys, in their surplices, preceded and followed the dish of ceremony, singing the carol commencing with the Latin couplet, "Caput Apri defero, Reddens laudes Domino." This Carol was printed by Wynkyn de Worde, in 1521, and has been regularly sung down to the present day, though the words of the Carol have been occasionally varied. Slightly differing versions are to be found in Warton, in a manuscript in the Bodleian, in Dibdin, in Ritson, and in Hearne; but the variations in the three verses are not very important.

The Rev. John Pointer, in his Oxoniensis Academia (1749), after speaking of the curious New-Year's custom at Queen's College, when the Bursar presented to each member a needle and thread, with the words, "Take this and be thrifty"—the aiguille et fils being a rebus on the name of the founder, Robert de Eglesfield, Chaplain to Queen Philippa—goes on to mention the Christmas-Day custom of the Boar's-head, "or the Figure of one in Wood, ushered in very solemnly with an old Song, in Memory of a noble Exploit (as Tradition goes) by a Scholar (a Tabardar) of this College, in killing a Wild Boar in Shotover Wood." The legend of this modern Meleager and academical Diarmid is to the effect that, when he encountered the boar, he was studying his Aristotle, and had come to the concluding words of the fifth stanza of "Græcum est;" when, calling out those words as the boar rushed upon him, he thrust the book into its open jaws, whereupon it logically followed that the animal fell dead, and was carried in triumph to the College.

In serving up the Boar's-head, 'the brawn of the tusked swine," as Chaucer says, it was customary to deck it, so that it "frowned on high, crested with bays and rosemary," in the way described in Sir Walter Scott's oft-quoted lines from "Marmion." Within the opened jaws was a pippin, orange, or lemon, according to the taste of the cook, and, for sauce, "like himself, offensive to its foes, the roguish mustard," as was mentioned by William King, in his poem, "The Art of Cookery." This mustard was much insisted on in all the earliest Carols that were sung at the bringing-in of the Boar's-head, including that beginning with the lines, "Hey! hey! hey! hey! the Boar's-head with mustard armed so gay," which dates to a manuscript of the fifteenth century. In the "Caput Apri defero" carol "the Boar's-head with mustard" is mentioned as cheering the guests. In the carol "The Boar is dead," that was sung at St. John's College, Oxford, at the Christmas banquet given to Prince Henry in 1607, is the couplet, "Let this Boar's-head and mustard, Stand for pig, goose, and custard;" which is the only rhyme for mustard that I have met with in the ancient carols; for "mustard," in another carol, can hardly be accepted as a rhyme to "steward." In one carol the guest is instructed that "in the mustard ye shall whet," when eating the Boar's-head; and in another old carol bread is added to the mustard, "Eat, and much good do it you; Take your bread and mustard thereto."

The Boar's-head, on Christmas Day, was served up on a dish, usually of silver, and sometimes of gold, and was borne from the kitchen to the hall, with great pomp and rejoicing, with the sound of music from the minstrels, the blowing of trumpets by the heralds, and the jingling of the jester's bells. The person who had the honour to bear the dish was called the Sewer, and was sometimes the Cook: though, occasionally, the noblest in the land did not think it derogatory to their dignity to carry the Boar's-head into the banqueting-hall, as the signal that the feasting and merriment of Christmas had begun. It is even said, by Holinshed, that this office was once performed by a Monarch—King Henry II., at the coronation of his eldest son, Henry, when, according to the custom of that period, the heir to the throne was frequently crowned during his father's lifetime. The young Prince's bride, Marguerite of France, was present on that occasion, which would date to somewhere about the year 1177; and the historian records that this bringing in of the Boar's-head on Christmas Day was, even then, an old custom, though when it arose we have no precise information.

Of the "jovial hunter" of the old ballad, Sir Ryalas, the Lord of Chetwode, we are told that he encountered a wild boar that was devastating the district, And that he "drawed his broad-sword with might, and he fairly cut the Boar's head off quite;" for which deed the Saxon king conferred upon him those lands in Buckinghamshire that have been held by his descendants ever since. A Boar's head, garnished with bay-leaves and mounted upon a pole decorated with ribbons, is supplied by the lessee of the tithes of Hornchurch, to be annually wrestled for at Christmas, in a field adjoining the church. The tithes of the parish belong to New College, Oxford.

In heraldry, the Boar's-head was the crest of the Warwicks and Nevilles, and was borne by Richard the Third, for which he was called, by Richmond, the "wretched, bloody, and usurping Boar;" and many similar epithets occur in Shakspeare's play, of which the crook-backed tyrant is the hero. As a tavern sign, the Boar's-head was often seen; that in Eastcheap, London, being of special fame. Prince Hal really frequented the house, and held high revels there; so that our great dramatist had historical foundation for making it the scene of the meetings between the Prince and Falstaff. It is also to be noted that Shakspeare took the burly knight's name from that Sir John Fastolf, of Caistor Castle, Norfolk, who died in 1460, and who made a bequest to Magdalen College, Oxford, of that portion of his London property known as the Boar's Head Inn, Southwark. Dr. Bliss, in his edition of the Reliquiæ Hearnianæ, says that this property, in 1721, brought in a yearly sum of £150 to the college, and it is not a little curious that it produced exactly the same rent in the year 1830, when it was sub-let to the family of the late Mr. John Timbs, F.S.A. The Boar's Head Tavern, of Falstaff and Prince Hal, is known to have existed in the reign of Richard the Second, and was not destroyed till the year 1831, when it had to be removed, in order to make room for the approaches to London Bridge. Its sign of the Boar's Head was carved, in high relief, in stone, with the initials "I.T." and the date "1668," in the right-hand upper corner; and it is preserved in the City of London Library, Guildhall.

In Thomas Tusser's poem, setting before us the Christmas dinner of a yeoman of the Elizabethan period, a portion of the good cheer that had to be provided was "Brawn pudding and souse, and good mustard withal." But at the tables of the nobility, in the days of good Queen Bess, although "brawn with mustard, and malmsey," was served at breakfast, the dinner was graced with "a fair and large boar's head, upon a silver platter," borne in with the usual pageantry. The custom was maintained through the two succeeding reigns; but in 1678 it would appear to have been in its decadence, for Aubrey writes—"Before the last civil wars, in gentlemen's houses at Christmas, the first diet that was brought to table was a boar's head with a lemon in his mouth." In that ballad of a general grumble about existing things—"When this old cap was new," the writer says that, in those halcyon days, "we wanted no brawn or souse." From that period the Boar's head would seem to have played out its leading part at the Christmas dinner, and to have yielded its place to the Baron or Sirloin of Beef; and, although it still makes its appearance on certain tables and on special occasions, such as Mayoral banquets and bridal breakfasts, yet, as the chief dish of the Christmas Day feast, it may be said to have had its day.

But, in connection with the subject, it would be well to bear in mind that Sir Roger de Coverley had a laudable custom at Christmas that might be imitated at the present day. "He had killed," says his historian, "eight fat hogs for that season, had dealt about his chines very liberally amongst his neighbours, and, in particular, he had sent a string of hogs' puddings, with a pack of cards, to every poor family in the parish." Probably, our instructors of youth and members of school boards would banish the pack of cards and draw the line at the hog's puddings. Taking the Boar's-head as a synonym for Christmas cheer and Christmas hospitality, we might do well, at this season, to bear in mind the words of quaint old Fuller, "Hospitality is threefold. For one's family: this is of necessity. For Strangers: this is of courtesie. For the poor: this is charity."

FOLLOW THE DRUM!

A LEAF FROM BURNS'S NOTE-BOOK.

[During one of the many alarms of a French invasion about the close of the last century, a young Scotch lady, whose father was recently dead, donned his coat and hat, and, to the beat of the drum, summoned his clan.—Dryasdust's Legendary Chronicles.]

O gin ye will follow the drum
Ise lead ye all forward to battle.
Wha'll wait when a lassie cries "Come"?
Wha'll shrink from the musketry's rattle?
There's the foe, there's the foe at our gate,
And I bid ye make ready to meet him.
He'll start, from a warnin' o' Fate,
Wi' my thunderin' drum as I greet him!

This coat was my father's, ye ken;
This hat, with its flutterin' feather,
Aye waved in the front of his men
As they fought and they conquered together!
Ye are sons of the Scotchmen who bled
For their land wi' the Chieftain that 's gone.
'Tis his child that now calls you instead:
Can ye fear—when a lass leads you on?—E. R.

ENIGMA.

I am short, and I am long;
Light as thistledown, yet strong,
Binding hearts in bands of steel
With my necromantic seal.
Full of joy, of bitterness;
Solace oft in dire distress;
False and fickle, yet most true:
Old as Adam, though bran new.
Born to die, yet I in truth
Flourish in perpetual youth;
Dying at my birth, I live
With the vital spark I give;
Evermore myself renewing
In the bliss of my undoing.
Frosty-cold as Charity
Is by zanies said to be,
I 'm as warm of heart as she
Is in sweet reality.
Silent, or I should be so,
As the gently-falling snow,
Yet far more than words can tell
I divulge, by magic spell.
Oft at death-beds I am found,
And where Christmas games abound.
Tenderest pity breathes in me,
And for lovers ecstasy;
Yes, to them I am, no doubt,
"Linked sweetness long drawn out."—J. L.

REBUS.

My whole is often taken
When friendly hands are shaken,
'Tis found in every dwelling,
Too often storms foretelling,
All colours and all sizes,
For use and beauty made,
And far and near surprises
Await its friendly aid.

Subtract the foremost letter,
Nought lovelier or better,
Exists than what remains
A balm for direst pains;
When good, best gift below
Kind Nature can bestow;
Dear both to soul and sense,
Of twofold excellence.

Yet vanity 's a feature
Of this chameleon creature:
Into my whole 'twill look
As in some much-loved book,
And find great delectation
In its sweet revelation.

One letter less, you 'll see
Type of stupidity,
With which he should be reckoned
Who dotes not on my second;
And if he should neglect her
We 'll send for a detector;
And let him, on attainder,
Be dogged by my remainder,
Loud hissing its derision
For his accurst misprision.—J. L.

Answers to the Pictorial Charades, Enigmas, and Rebuses in this Number will be given in the issue for Dec. 28.

THE COCOA-TREE:

THE MANUFACTURE OF COCOA AND CHOCOLATE.

Linnæus was so fond of chocolate that he called it food for the gods in the distinguishing name he gave to the tree that produced it—Theobroma Cacao.

The tree is a native of tropical America, but is now largely cultivated in other parts of the world. It is an evergreen, and grows to the height of from 14 ft. to 18 ft. It bears flowers and fruit at all seasons of the year; these grow out of the trunk and thickest part of the boughs. The little yellow flowers are in clusters, and the fruit when ripe is of a beautiful orange colour. As the plant cannot bear the intense heat of a tropical sun, it is shaded by rows of loftier trees, as bananas, or more frequently the erythrina or corallina, called by the Spaniards madre de cacao, a tree with superb red blossoms.

The nuts are taken from the pod as soon as collected, and covered with a layer of sand. This causes a fermentation which develops the aroma and takes off the natural bitterness of the nut. They are then spread out to dry in the drying or curing house. This house consists of a strongly built span roof fixed with wheels, running on iron rails laid along a stout framework, which supports a platform, underneath and upon which the cacao beans are dried.

Prior to 1831 the quantity of cocoa annually consumed in England had not reached half a million pounds, whereas it now amounts to over nine millions. Some idea of its preparation will be given by a short account of a visit to Messrs. Cadbury's works, which of late have become widely extended.

Fifteen years ago only about thirty hands were employed. The number now is from three to four hundred. During this time also so many improvements have been made in the arrangements and machinery, that each of the hands employed now turns out on an average double what they did then. This will give some idea of the largely increased consumption of cocoa. The greatest attention is paid in the factory to cleanliness; and in passing through the rooms we noticed that the young women employed were all clad in a kind of uniform of clean brown holland, covering the whole dress. From 9.5 to 9.15 every morning an interesting sight may be witnessed in the factory. The workpeople—men and women—assemble for a short and simple religious service. This daily gathering helps to form a bond of union between the workpeople themselves, as well as between the employers and the employed. Some of the latter, as a choir, conduct the singing; and snatches of the tunes often heard over the work during the day indicate the interest felt in the morning service.

But we must hasten on to describe the interesting process of manufacture. The bags of cocoa, as they arrive from the docks, are stacked up in large piles. They come from different parts of the world—from Trinidad, Grenada, Caraccas, Carupano, Surinam, and even from Africa, and there are a few other choice and special varieties.

These cocoa nuts or beans are carefully sorted, and the unsound ones rejected; they are then placed in rotating cylinders, and subjected to a gentle heat over coke fires, until the full aroma is properly developed. When cooled they are passed to another room, in which machines are arranged for breaking the now crisp, roasted nut into the irregular segments into which the kernel is naturally divided. The next process is to remove the outer husks by means of a powerful blast. The rich glossy kernel that remains is known in the market under the name of Cocoa Nibs. The husk or shell is sent off to Ireland, where it is used as a light, but by no means unpalatable, table decoction, under the designation of "miserables."

The visitor is next conducted into a large room where a long line of stones are working, one over the other, much in the same way as in ordinary flour-mills. Between these the nibs are passed; and, as the stones are heated, the nibs are reduced to a creamy fluid, which flows into pans placed to receive it. When quite cold this will turn out a perfectly firm, hard cake.

Up to this point we have the cocoa in its native condition, with the exception of the acids, &c., thrown off in roasting, and the shell removed by the fan. We now diverge into three distinct branches of manufacture; and as the Cocoa Essence is the product of the firm best known to the public, we shall give it precedence.

There is no sophistication in this article; it is the same cocoa we have seen running from the stones in a creamy fluid, with the excess of cocoa butter removed. The best cocoa contains about fifty per cent of natural cocoa oil or butter, and this has been found to be far too large a proportion for ordinary digestions. Dr. Muter says: — "The only objection which can and does exist to its use in a state of purity is the excessive proportion of fat, which renders it too rich for most digestions, and gives, unfortunately, a colourable excuse for its adulteration." —[ADVT.]

Messrs. Cadbury Brothers have therefore paid great attention to the production of a pure article free from this objection. The removal of two thirds of the butter is accomplished by means of very powerful and complicated machinery, the result being an impalpable powder, soluble in boiling water and possessing the nutritious gluten and stimulating theobromine in an increased ratio; so that Cocoa Essence, perhaps, stands highest among dietetics as a flesh-former and nutritious beverage.

Still there is a demand for cocoa that thickens in the cup; and this comprises the second branch of manufacture to be examined. A given portion of the liquid cocoa is poured into a large steam-heated pan, and weighed with the sugar, arrowroot, &c., which of course differ in kind and quantity, according to the value of the chocolate powder required. Strong iron arms are then set in motion, which so completely levigate the mass that in a few moments it is reduced to a powder. These chocolate powders are sold under the names of Homœopathic, Iceland Moss, Breakfast, &c.

It is a relief, after witnessing these manufacturing processes, to mount into the Packing Department above; for, however interesting the results witnessed below, one grows tired of the incessant noise and clatter of the machinery. In the Packing-Room all is light, cheerful, and orderly. We watch row after row of girls busily engaged. One is weighing, a second is packing and enveloping in cases of bright tinfoil, a third is fastening on the outside labels of the Cocoa Essence and other preparations now so well known all over the world.

The third branch of manufacture yet to be noticed is that of sweet Chocolate for eating and drinking; and here again we have numerous varieties. In the first place, the pure cocoa is incorporated with white sugar in what is called a "melangeur." This is a round stone basin in which the cocoa and sugar are placed, and which revolves at a great speed, while two heavy stationary rollers bruise the mass until it becomes of about the consistency of dough. From these melangeurs the mixed substance is at once passed through machines with three granite cylinders which crush it still finer, and in this state it is ready for moulding into the various shapes and sizes for sale.

The best Chocolate is flavoured with vanilla, which is the fruit or seed-pod of one of those beautiful species of the family Orchidaceæ that flourish in tropical America. The stems climb to the height of twenty or thirty feet, twining round the trunks of trees, and throwing out a profuson of aërial roots, some of which eventually reach the ground. It seems specially adapted for flavouring Chocolate, and is used principally for that purpose.

Cocoa carefully selected and prepared in this way certainly forms the most delicious of all beverages or confections. The firm make a special article of this kind, packed in blue wrappers, which may fairly be compared to the famous Chocolate that Prescott describes as forming a part of Montezuma's repast: Chocolate "in golden goblets flavoured with vanilla, and so prepared as to be reduced to a froth of the consistency of honey, which gradually dissolved in the mouth."

We must not pass from this branch of our subject without a glance at the manufacture of the Chocolate Crèmes. It would take someone more practical than a philosopher to describe the minutiæ of this delicious bonne bouche. When finished they are transferred to an endless lift, which carries them down into a cellar to cool, and then again they are carried by the same means to the top of the building, where busy hands are placing them in boxes of all sizes.

There is also another extensive manufacture carried on by the firm. As everyone knows, the eye as well as the taste must be gratified in these luxurious times, and therefore success in the sale partly depends upon the beauty and finish of the packages. Many hundreds of thousands of beautiful picture-boxes of all sizes and varied shapes are annually manufactured here. We follow our guide to the top of a large building where the process is going on, and find a number of girls at work. Some are cutting out and stamping the cardboard, and others fitting the boxes together on blocks, wrapping the edges with gold or gelatine paper, and fixing on the top those little gems of art which attract so much attention in our shop windows. Some of this work is carried on at the workpeople's homes; and we are told that it is a most interesting sight to find a large family busily engaged at it from morning to night.

Anything more "tasty" than the artistic designs of these Chocolate boxes, if we except the "tasty" contents, could not well be produced. At Christmas-tide both boxes and crèmes are in universal request; and, unlike "sweets" in general, they are not only harmless but healthful confections.

But we must stay our descriptive pen. We hope enough has been said to throw a little light on what is fast becoming a very important branch of industry in this country.

[ADVT.] HAND AND HEART.

SUGGESTIONS ON THE FEEDING OF INFANTS.

BY WILLIAM FAUSSETT, M.D., F.R.C.S.I.

READ BEFORE THE SURGICAL SOCIETY OF IRELAND.

Without presuming to pass any judgment on the many artificial substitutes which, on alleged chemical and scientific principles, have from time to time been pressed forward under the notice of the profession and the public to take the place of mother's milk, I beg to call attention to a very cheap and simple article which is always easily procurable—viz., cocoa—and which, when pure and deprived of excess of fatty matter, may safely be relied on as an admirable basis of infant food. Before entering into certain considerations which the subject demands, I shall simply relate how this substitute for, or at least valuable addition to, milk, when employed as food for infants, first suggested itself to my mind.

About five years ago a very wretched-looking infant, just six weeks old, was brought under my notice in apparently the last stage of extreme exhaustion, its pale and wrinkled features, with somewhat the expression of old age, its shrivelled limbs, its large beseeching eyes and piteous moans telling at once the whole history of its sufferings and wrongs.

Calling to mind just at the moment the fact that young calves and lambs were frequently fed upon cocoa, with very small additions of milk, and reasoning on certain analogies in reference thereto, it occurred to me that it would be a far more feasible and rational experiment to try this plan with the child, than to continue the use of bread and "kettle tea," or to adopt the "arrowroot," or "rusk-biscuit," and "barley-water" method, so much in use in the nurseries of even the more favoured classes. I recommended the use of cocoa, therefore, with as much milk added as could be spared from the small family allowance, which for all purposes amounted to about a pint a day.

To my great gratification the child, who took greedily to this kind of nourishment, supplied from a feeding-bottle, soon improved in health, gradually put up flesh, and became a fine thriving infant. The cocoa was continued through the whole period of infancy, and he is now, at the age of five years, as fine and healthy a child as can be seen.

Shortly after my experience of this case I happened to be consulted about the health of twins (the children of respectable parents), both of whom, but one in particular, were in a declining state of health, evidently, as it appeared to me, from an insufficient supply of proper nourishment. Calling to mind the result of cocoa feeding in the above case, I strongly recommended a trial of it here likewise. At first there appeared to be some distrust and indisposition on the part of the mother to adopt this meagre and unsophisticated sort of diet. As I did not hesitate, however, to urge with confidence its use, it at length got a fair trial, and the result justified my expectations. The twins were after a little time fed almost exclusively upon cocoa, with milk added, and now, at the age of five years, there are not, perhaps, two finer or healthier children in the neighbourhood. In several other instances I have recommended the same mode of feeding, more especially where milk was not to be had in abundance, and uniformly with the same result.

* * * * *

Cocoa in the natural state abounds in a number of valuable nutritious principles; in fact, in every material necessary for the growth, the development, and sustenance of the body. That this useful article has not hitherto been adopted for infant feeding is, perhaps, owing to its not being so palatable to the adult taste as tea, coffee, and other beverages, as well as to the fact that while the unsophisticated shell or husk, which is but the refuse of the bean, is poor in nutritious properties, there happen to be so many adulterated preparations in the market, palmed on the public as genuine cocoa, under different pretentious titles.

A most useful and able exposé of these appeared some time ago in the Medical Press and Circular; but there are honourable exceptions; and though, of course, it would seem invidious to name any of these to the exclusion of the rest, I may be permitted to mention that Cadbury's Cocoa Essence, which is elaborated on the principle of excluding and detaching the superabundance of concrete oil or fatty matter with which cocoa abounds, is a useful preparation; and there are, no doubt, others equally deserving of confidence.

Besides a volatile aromatic oil, a bitter principle and a peculiar element called theo-bromine, which resembles the theine of tea and the caffeine of coffee, but more nitrogenous in its composition than either, cocoa contains gluten, gum, starch, and other ingredients, as well as the large amount of fat alluded to, and which constitutes rather more than half its weight. This last item being far in excess of what is either palatable or easily digestible, it becomes an object with the chemist, while retaining the other valuable flesh-forming materials, to diminish in part the superabundant fat. Under this excuse, however, the most shameless adulterations have been practised. Sugar, starch, and other inferior substances, and even animal fat, have been introduced into some of the patented compounds—articles which, however useful in their own place, are very poor substitutes for what, at least, the infant stomach more imperiously demands.

The great advantages to be derived from the employment of cocoa in the feeding of infants, especially of the poor, are obvious, for, besides its heat-producing, flesh-forming ingredients, it is cheap, simple, and readily available. A teaspoonful, more or less, of a sound preparation of cocoa to half a pint of fluid, partly water and partly milk, even skimmed milk, when boiled for a minute or two, affords a wholesome meal to a hungry infant, and will, cæteris paribus, be thoroughly digested.

* * * * *

I beg, therefore, respectfully to commend cocoa as an article of infants' food to the notice of my professional brethren, especially those who, holding office under the Poor Laws, have such large and extensive opportunities of testing its value.

With the present pampered and artificial tastes of the better classes, it is to be feared that so simple and unsophisticated an article of diet as cocoa would be received by them with small favour for their infants; but, as its nutritious properties are unquestionable, it will, I submit, be an experiment devoid of all risk, in the case of children that are not thriving under more ordinary methods of feeding, to give it a fair trial, premising that some gentle aperient will in such cases be often found a necessary preliminary to clear out the prima viæ of half-digested food previously given. — Medical Press and Circular. —[ADVT.]

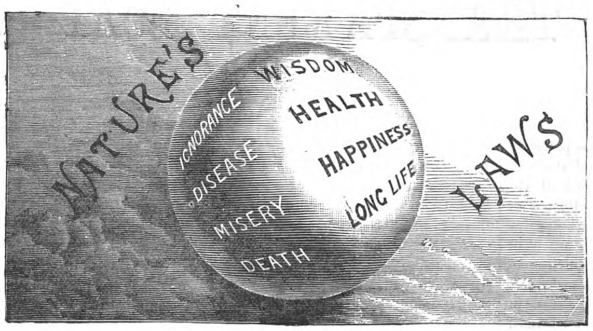
HUMAN LIFE, IGNORANCE, & WISDOM.

ENO IN EUROPE.

ENO IN ASIA.



ENO IN AFRICA.

ENO IN AMERICA.

ENO EVERYWHERE.

ENO AT SINGAPORE.—"I find the 'ENO' a great comfort, and have already finished a large bottle of it. It is well known out here, and highly appreciated—much more so than any other form of Saline. I used it frequently on the voyage."—Extract from a Letter from my Son, July 22, 1878, from Singapore.—R. KILPATRIC, 43, Somerset-street, Portman-square, London.

THE RENEWAL OF LIFE.—A Gentleman writes:—"I tried your FRUIT SALT some time back, and up to this I have taken it for every illness, and must say truly to take it is the renewal of life. The effect is really marvellous."

ENO versus SEA SICKNESS.

IMPORTANT TO ALL,

ESPECIALLY TO TRAVELLERS,

SHIP CAPTAINS, EMIGRANTS, and

EUROPEANS GENERALLY, who are compelled to make SEA VOYAGES.

HOT COUNTRIES.—ACIDITY OF STOMACH, BILIOUSNESS, FEVERS.

"Though unasked by Mr. Eno, or anyone interested in the manufacture of FRUIT SALT, or rather Crystallised Salts of various fruits, I nevertheless take great pleasure in saying that I have personally used this remedy, and know it, not alone to be excellent, but really invaluable. Especially must this be the case in the hot countries of the East, where Acidity of the Stomach, Biliousness, and Fevers are so common.

"J. M. PEEBLES, M.D.,
"Author of 'Around the World,' 'Travels in Polynesia, China, India, Arabia, Egypt, &c.'"

PREVENTIBLE DEATH.—THE SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS.

Dr. Child, of Oxford, says, "There are certain Diseases which it is a disgrace to the country to allow to exist, such as TYPHUS, TYPHOID, DIPHTHERIA, and SMALLPOX, and these might be eradicated with ordinary sanitary precaution." All should read a large illustrated sheet, given with each bottle of ENO'S FRUIT SALT. The information is invaluable. ENO'S FRUIT SALT keeps the blood pure and prevents disease and premature death.

IMPORTANT TO ALL!

Especially to CONSULS, SHIP CAPTAINS, EMIGRANTS, and EUROPEANS generally, who are VISITING OR RESIDING IN HOT OR FOREIGN CLIMATES.

or in the United Kingdom. As a natural product of Nature, use ENO'S FRUIT SALT, prepared from Sound Ripe Fruit. You cannot overstate its great value in keeping the BLOOD PURE. Without such a simple precaution the jeopardy of life is immensely increased. As a means of keeping the system clear, and thus taking away the groundwork of Malarious Diseases, and all Liver Complaints, or as a Health-giving, Refreshing, Cooling, and Invigorating Beverage, or as a Gentle Laxative and Tonic in the various forms of Indigestion,

ENO'S FRUIT SALT

is particularly valuable. No Traveller should leave home without a supply, for by its use the most dangerous forms of Fevers, Blood Poisons, &c., are prevented and cured. It is, in truth, a Family Medicine Chest in the simplest yet most potent form. Instead of being lowering to the system, this preparation is, in the highest degree, invigorating. Its effect in relieving thirst, giving tone to the system, and aiding digestion, is most striking.

HOW TO CHECK DISEASE AT THE ONSET.

USE

ENO'S FRUIT SALT.

After suffering from FEVER FOUR TIMES, in each attack with great severity—in fact, three of them could not have been more dangerous or critical—from a very extensive and careful observation, extending over a period of forty years, I am perfectly satisfied the "true cause" of fever is disordered condition of the liver. The office of the liver is to cleanse the blood as a scavenger might sweep the streets. When the liver is not working properly a quantity of effete matter is left floating in the blood. Under these circumstances, should the poison-germ of fever be absorbed, then the disease results; on the contrary, anyone whose liver and other organs are in a normal condition may be subjected to precisely the same conditions as to the contagious influences, and yet escape the fever. This, I consider, explains satisfactorily the seeming mystery that some persons who are placed in circumstances peculiarly favourable for the development of fever, who, in fact, are living in the very midst of it, escape unscathed. This being the case, the importance of KEEPING THE LIVER IN ORDER CANNOT BE OVER-ESTIMATED; and I have pleasure in directing attention to my FRUIT SALT, which, in the form of a pleasant beverage, will correct the action of the liver, and thus prevent the many DISASTROUS CONSEQUENCES: not only as an efficient means of WARDING OFF FEVERS and MALARIOUS DISEASES, but as a REMEDY FOR and PREVENTIVE OF BILIOUS or SICK HEADACHES, CONSTIPATION, VOMITING, THIRST, ERRORS of EATING and DRINKING, SKIN ERUPTIONS, GIDDINESS, HEARTBURN, &c. If its great value in keeping the body in health was UNIVERSALLY KNOWN, NO FAMILY WOULD BE WITHOUT A SUPPLY. ENO'S FRUIT SALT ACTS as a SPECIFIC. No one can have a simpler or more efficient remedy; by its use the POISON IS THROWN OFF, and the BLOOD RESTORED TO ITS HEALTHY CONDITION. I used my FRUIT SALT freely in my last attack of fever, and I have every reason to say it saved my life.—J. C. ENO, Hatcham Fruit Salt Works, S.E.

ENO versus SEA SICKNESS.

I HAVE recently returned from a trip to Malta in one of the P. and O. Company's ships, and consider it a duty incumbent upon me to make known to you that, during a nautical career extending over a period of thirty years, I have been invariably a sufferer from SEA SICKNESS, more or less, according to the weather; but on the last occasion, I am happy to say (although we experienced strong head winds and heavy sea crossing the Bay), I entirely escaped, and this I attribute to my having provided myself with your invaluable "FRUIT SALT," which I can most conscientiously recommend to all who may be similarly afflicted, whose business or pleasure may cause them to "go down to the sea in ships." You can make whatever use you please of this, trusting that I may be the means of extending the benefits of your panacea.—Yours faithfully, D. S. LEESE, late Purser, P. and O. Steam Navigation Company.—Southampton, Oct. 19, 1878.

ENO'S FRUIT SALT IN ENGLAND.

"I have used your FRUIT SALT for many years, and have verified the statement that it is not only refreshing and invigorating, but also invaluable, as giving speedy relief in cases of heartburn, sourness of the stomach, and constipation and its great evils. The thanks of the public are due to you for your unceasing efforts to relieve suffering humanity. Long may you live to be a blessing to the world."—B. HURST, Ph.D., Vicar of Collerly, St. Thomas Vicarage, Annfield Plain, Lintz Green, Co. Durham, March, 1878.

ENO'S FRUIT SALT IN AMERICA,

INDIA, EGYPT, and the CONTINENT.—IMPORTANT TO ALL TRAVELLERS.—"Please send me half a dozen bottles of ENO'S FRUIT SALT. I have tried ENO'S FRUIT SALT in America India, Egypt, and on the Continent for almost every complaint, fever included, with the most satisfactory results. I can strongly recommend it to all travellers; in fact, I am never without it.—YOURS, faithfully, AN ANGLO-INDIAN OFFICIAL, June 26, 1878."

ERRORS OF EATING OR DRINKING; or, How to Enjoy or Cause Good Food to Agree that would otherwise Disorder the Digestive Organs, and cause Biliousness or Sick Headache, Giddiness, Depression of Spirits, Sourness of the Stomach, Heartburn, Constipation and its great evils, Impure Blood, Blood Poisons, Fevers, and Skin Eruptions, and many other disastrous diseases.—Use ENO'S FRUIT SALT.

HEALTH AND LONGEVITY.—USE ENO'S FRUIT SALT.

THE SPRING OF HEALTH.

ENO versus STIMULANTS.—HOW TO AVOID THE INJURIOUS EFFECTS OF STIMULANTS.—The present system of living—partaking of too rich foods, as pastry, saccharine, and fatty substances, alcoholic drinks, and an insufficient amount of exercise, frequently deranges the liver. I would advise all bilious people, unless they are careful to keep the liver acting freely, to exercise great care in the use of alcoholic drinks, avoid sugar, and always dilute largely with water. Experience shows that porter, mild ales, port wine, dark sherries, sweet champagne, liqueurs, and brandies are all very apt to disagree; while light white wines, and gin or whisky largely diluted with soda-water, will be found the least objectionable. ENO'S FRUIT SALT is peculiarly adapted for any constitutional weakness of the liver; it possesses the powers of reparation when digestion has been disturbed or lost, and places the invalid on the right track to health. A world of woe is avoided by those who keep and use ENO'S FRUIT SALT, therefore no family should ever be without it.

THE ART OF CONQUEST IS LOST without the Art of Eating. Use ENO'S FRUIT SALT. SIMPLE AND POTENT.

PRESERVING AND RESTORING HEALTH.—ENO'S FRUIT SALT acts as simply, yet just as powerfully, on the animal system as sunshine does on the vegetable world; it has a natural action on the organs of digestion, absorption, circulation, respiration, secretion and excretion, and removes all impurities, thus preserving and restoring health.

ENO A BLESSING IN EVERY HOUSE.—ENO'S FRUIT SALT.—A Lady writes:—"Everything, medicine or food, ceased to act properly for at least three months before I commenced taking it: the little food I could take generally pumsned me or returned. My life was one of great suffering, so that I must have succumbed before long. To me and our family it has been a great earthly blessing."

ENO'S FRUIT SALT as an Invigorating Beverage (prepared from sound ripe Fruit). It is the best preventive and cure for Biliousness, Sick Headache, Skin Eruptions, Impure Blood, Pimples on the Face, Giddiness, Fevers, Feverishness, Mental Depression, Want of Appetite, Sourness of the Stomach, Constipation, Vomiting, Thirst, &c., and to remove the Effects of Errors of Eating and Drinking.

TO PARENTS.—This preparation is invaluable in the nursery as a gentle laxative; it is pleasant to the taste, and much superior to senna or other nauseous drugs; it corrects the ill-effects of over-eating or exhaustion, and is extremely beneficial in any feverishness or heat of the skin. The bowels ought to be kept free by the FRUIT SALT for a month or six weeks after eruptive diseases, as measles, scarlet fever, chicken-pox, smallpox, and all fevers or infectious diseases, &c.; for its use frees the system of the "dregs." Many disastrous results would be avoided by attending to this.

CAUTION.—Examine each bottle, and see the capsule is marked "ENO'S FRUIT SALT," without which you have been imposed on by a worthless imitation. Sold by all Chemists. Price 2s. 9d. and 4s. 6d.

OUR "ILLUSTRATED" VISIT TO

PEARS' TRANSPARENT SOAP WORKS.

THE interest displayed nowadays by the public in Sanitation in every form, and the special attention lately given by the press to the subject of the injurious composition of many of the varied kinds of toilet soaps, induces one to think that some description of the manufacture of so important an article of daily consumption would not be without interest to the public. The artist who undertook to make this Illustration applied to Messrs. A. and F. Pears, in London, as at once, perhaps, the oldest established and most eminent makers (they have been manufacturers since 1789) for permission to view their works. He received from them a very courteous introduction to their partner at Isleworth, where in a couple of days he derived much valuable information; but the very varied and extensive character of the processes of manufacture and its accompanying details will admit only of a very short summary at the present moment owing to the limitation of space. On commencing his inspection of Messrs. Pears' large and interesting factories, he was shown vast stores of crude material—fresh, sweet tallows of English gathering only; the brightest and purest oils from Florence and Gallipoli; palm oil of violet odour, grown under "Afric's burning sun;" amber resins from America and France; large casks and iron drums of various chemicals in beautiful crystals, from the leading scientific laboratories of the North of England and from Germany; rare and musk in foreign-looking packages from the East, from India, China, and Ceylon; delicate essences of the sweetest flowers from the Italian Alps, and the precious attar of roses from the Balkan mountains and from Persia; and sandal-wood from Bombay and West Australia. Indeed, not only have contributions been levied from every land, but the sea itself has been brought under contribution to this manufacture in its salts as well as in ambergris from the sperm whale.

The fats and oils having been selected in certain proportions are first intimately mixed by machinery driven by an enormous steam-engine; the requisite chemical ingredients then being added from time to time, the whole is subjected to several days' boiling and stirring in pans each holding many tons, and supplied with steam by three immense boilers. This raw soap is transferred into smaller pans, where it is clarified and all impurities precipitated by a series of chemical processes, the inventions and patents of Messrs. Pears. The previously distilled and mixed perfumes are now added, and, whilst in a molten state, the product is poured into large frames and permitted to cool. It is then cut up and moulded into different shapes and sizes convenient for washing and shaving purposes, the soap balls being turned in a lathe as with billiard balls; the name of the firm is then stamped on by hand machines. These pieces of soap are afterwards matured by being placed in heated chambers and turned daily for several months, when it is handed over to the cardboard box making and filling shops, in which female labour is largely employed, and thence to the warehouse and packing shops, whence it is distributed to Railways and Docks for carriage to every part of the civilised world. The importance of the Toilet Soap manufacture of Great Britain may be estimated from the fact that representatives of Messrs. Pears personally visit not only the chief towns of Great Britain, but those of almost every quarter of the globe—in Europe, from Seville in the west, through France, Belgium, and Holland, to St. Petersburg in the east; in Canada, from Quebec to Hamilton; in the United States, from New York to San Francisco; in South America, the chief cities on the eastern and western coasts; in India, from Bombay, across country and round the coast to Calcutta; in Australia, from Swan River, through Adelaide, Melbourne, and Sydney, to Brisbane; in New Zealand, from Wellington to Dunedin; and in China, to Shanghae and Hong-Kong. In most other parts special agencies only are organised; for Messrs. Pears declare, as the result of practical experience, that the Latin races generally use but little soap. The reputation of Messrs. Pears is well known to the public. Their pure and excellently prepared manufactures are exhibited with great taste in the windows of most of our leading chemists, in beautifully-cut glass dishes and vases, and hence of the merits of their manufacture we need say but little. Probably the greatest compliment ever paid to a soap manufacturer they received from no less eminent an authority than Mr. ERASMUS WILSON, F.R.S., who has specially written, in one of his works on the skin, "Pears, a name engraven on the memory of the oldest inhabitant, and Pears's transparent soap, one of the most refreshing and agreeable of balms to the skin." A valuable recommendation indeed for Messrs. Pears, but not less valuable to the public, for nothing is more important amongst our daily wants than a properly manufactured toilet soap; for whilst from the use of a good one our skin and complexion admittedly derive and maintain health and beauty and every possible advantage, nothing is more harmful than the common strongly alkaline and coloured preparations frequently met with under the name of toilet soap, as is testified by the experience of our dermatologists at the leading institutions for the skin, at one of which, it is affirmed by the senior surgeon, they have had about four hundred cases of skin trouble owing their origin to improper toilet soaps alone, an experience about to be recorded in the public service. It is amongst infant children, ladies, and those generally with a fine, sensitive skin, that the most injurious results are observed, and the causes appear to be in the cheap rancid fats used in the composition of the soap, or in the introduction of noxious chemicals for colouring or increasing detergent properties, and very frequently from the ignorant introduction of so-called "remedial agents."

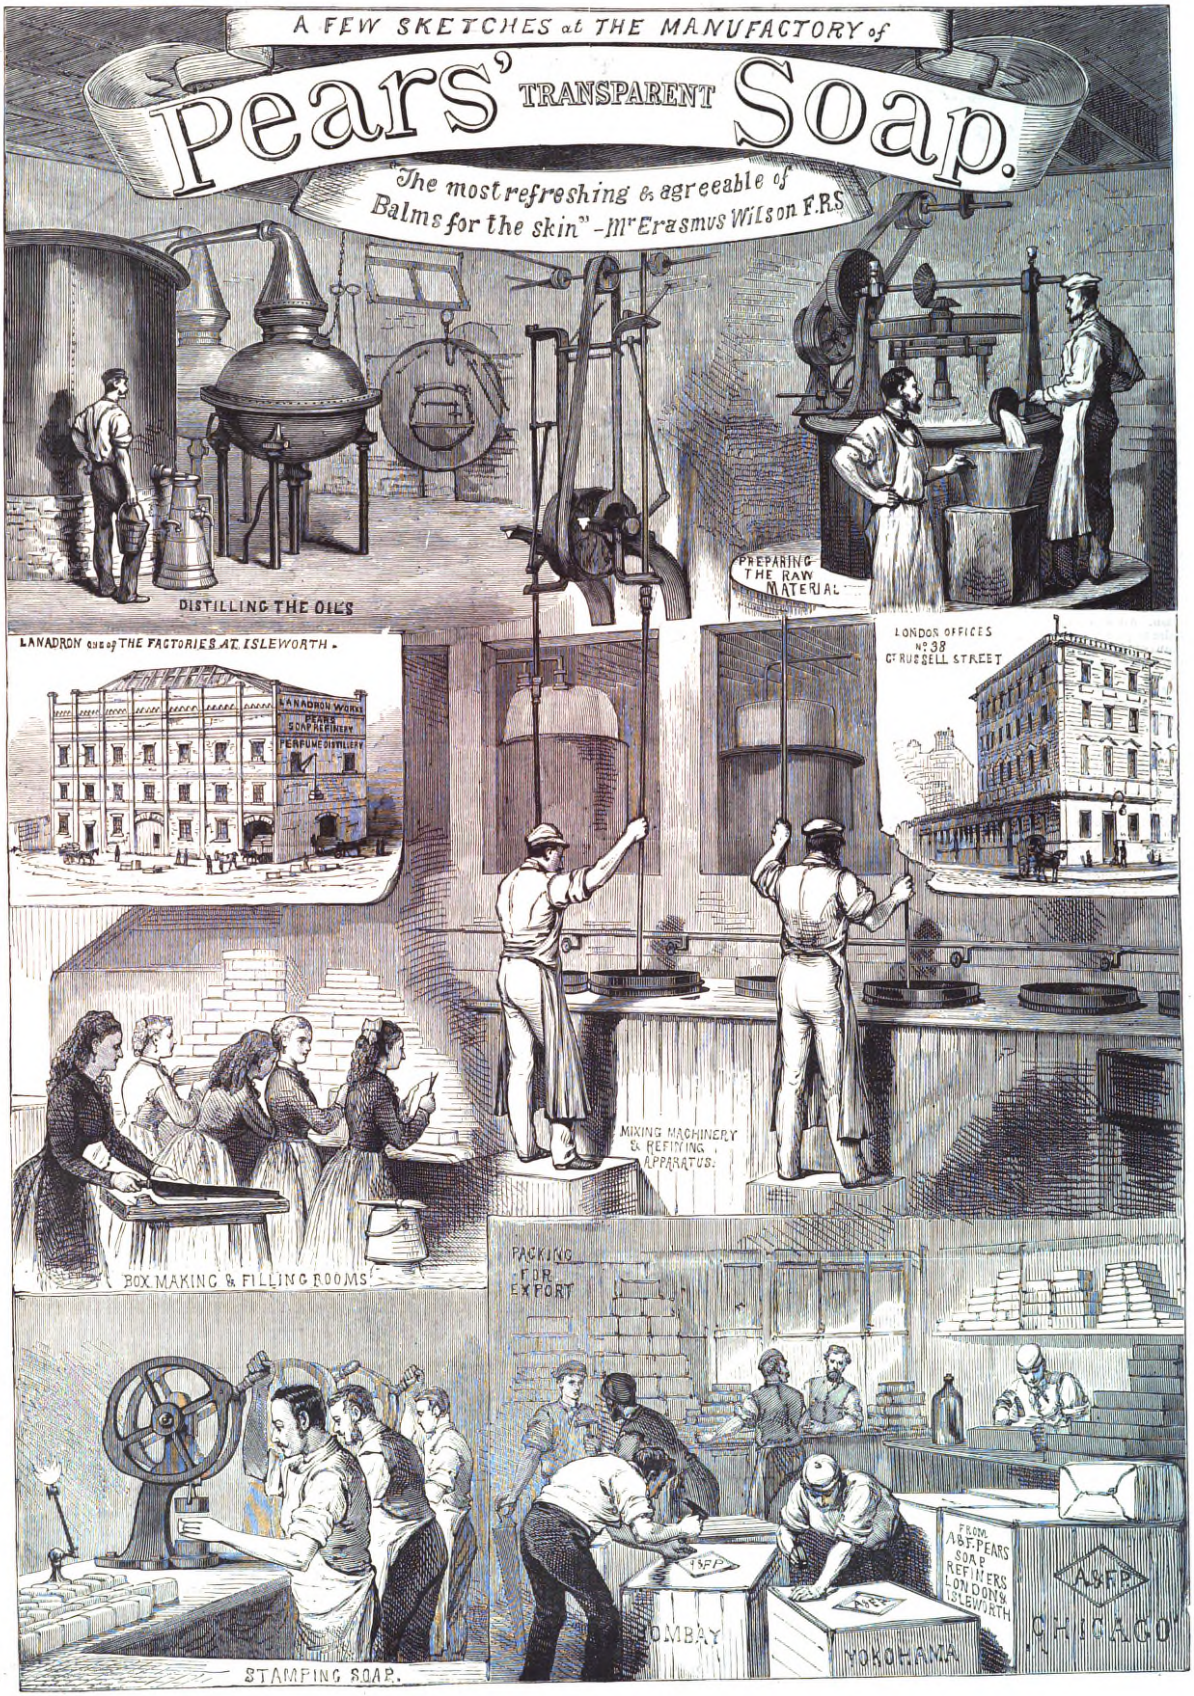
As regards Messrs. Pears's Soap, there is no doubt of the purity of the fats used, for the tallow and oils appear to be good enough to eat; and, indeed, the manager gave evidence of this by tasting samples of the bulk in use. The care displayed in their subsequent manufacture must be seen to be appreciated; and certain it is and manifest to all that the completed article, so well known as Pears's Transparent Soap, is in appearance almost as tempting as candy or chocolate, and the makers may well claim for it, as they do, excellence for its purity, its fragrance, and its durability.



Messrs. Pears appear to be endowed with considerable originality, which is evinced as much in the tasteful printing accompanying their goods and in their advertisements as in their manufactures. The humorous placard so well known in London of the little "nigger" whose complexion has derived so much benefit from a trial of their famous soap is without doubt the best essay of the kind, no fewer than ten different lithographic stones being employed in its production. Again, the well-known statuette in plaster of "You dirty boy!" at the Paris Exhibition is a commission in the marble from Messrs. A. and F. Pears to the eminent sculptor Signor Focardi, at a cost of £500, simply as an attraction for their retail dépôt in London, next to the British Museum, and not for their trade-mark, as has been erroneously stated by the press, Messrs. Pears indignantly and emphatically repudiating the idea of their elegant specialité being for boys of that stamp.

It may be observed that during the three generations—ninety years—that their Manufactory has been established they have received the highest and most distinctive patronage for their specialité from most of the Royal Families in Europe; and on the occasion of the visit to India of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales they received instructions from the Lords of the Admiralty to furnish H.M.S. Serapis with their Transparent Soap for the use of H.R.H. and suite, it being particularly adapted to hot climates. At Exhibitions they have been ever in the foremost rank, from and inclusive of the first, in 1851, down to the present in Paris.

For the writer to add any commendation to that of Mr. Erasmus Wilson would be "to gild refined gold." It is to be regretted that the limited space here will not admit, either in description or illustration, of that amplification which is merited by so important and extensive a manufacture. The few accompanying sketches may, it is thought, prove instructive and interesting.

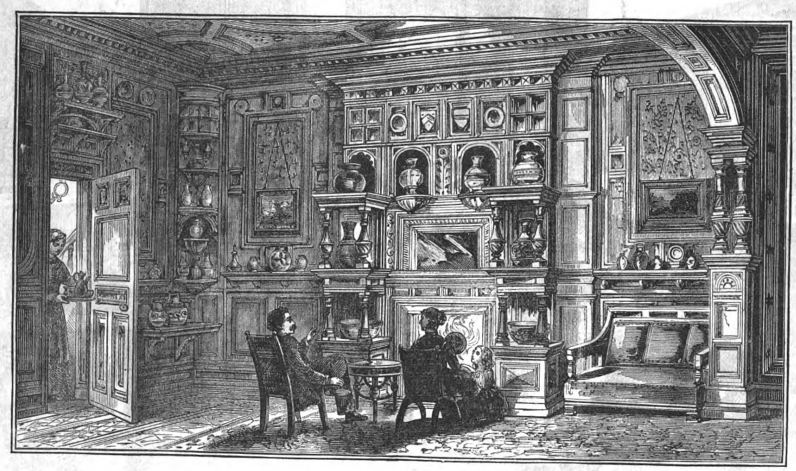
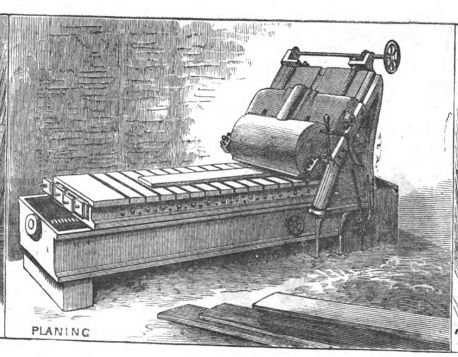
MESSRS. HOWARD AND SONS' FURNITURE.



Among the many firms who have done good service in promoting art at home none stands out more pre-eminently than the well-known house of Howard and Sons, of Berners-street, whose exquisitely appointed chimney fittings and dining-room furniture were one of the chief attractions of the Paris Exhibition. All who have the slightest pretensions to good taste desire to possess artistic furniture; and yet it is not within the means of many people who would gladly see their surroundings thus improved if it were possible. The furniture, however, of Messrs. Howard and Sons possesses an especial claim upon attention, seeing that it is all made by machinery; thus the cost of production is considerably lessened, and it can therefore be offered at prices which are certainly surprising when we consider the sound and careful workmanship of the various articles. It must be understood, also, that this is not accomplished with any loss of the artistic merits of the furniture. Here we have, as the reader will see from the illustrations, admirable designs in antique and modern styles, carried out to perfection; and, indeed, this method of manufacture lends itself to the production of an infinite variety of conceptions, and gives full play to the genius of the artist.

As may readily be imagined, the machinery employed to bring about such results is alike curious and interesting, and we have here depicted, therefore, the moulding, planing, and tenon-cutting machines of the firm, as seen in the workshops.

The reader will be able to judge of the kind of work produced by these ingenious machines by looking at the engravings of three rooms fitted up by Messrs. Howard and Sons. There he will see first the beautiful parqueterie flooring, which is one of the specialties of this firm. Above it rise the wood-panelled walls, with finely carved dados, and carved cornices, while, over all, curiously inlaid ceilings of wood complete the artistic tout ensemble. Chairs of various patterns are scattered about; and here it should be noted that these may be had in any style, whether it be desired to have reproduced the delicate designs of Chippendale or his successor, Sheraton, whose drawings for "sophas, buroes, cloaths-chests, and china-cases," show that his ideas of art were admirable. In fact, the method of manufacture used by Messrs. Howard lends itself readily to the reproduction of all that is best in the furniture of the Jacobean and Stuart times; while the soberer Gothic models may also be followed, or the fancy can revel in copies of the more florid work of Dutch and French artists, and marquetry after the fashion of that produced by the great ébéniste Riesener and others of his school. At their galleries may be seen specimens of ceilings, panels, doors veneered and solid, dados, floors, chimneypieces, book-cases, and, in fact, all possible varieties of artistic and ornamental woodwork. Here, too, are arm-chairs, sofas, settees, dining-room, drawing-room, and library chairs, lounges, hall chairs, dining-tables, sideboards, occasional tables, book-cases, and cabinets of every conceivable form and admirable design; in fact, in such an embarras de richesses the only difficulty is how to make a selection from so many beautiful pieces of furniture. Here also are mirrors framed in different kinds of wood, chandeliers, fire-baskets with ornamental braziers and andirons of antique pattern; tiles, which may be had of various designs or in plain colours; and ironwork, after the fashion of those days when every turn and scroll had some artistic meaning in it. Here, again, are carpets from the looms of Persia and of Turkey, as well as from the best houses in England and France; and we may note that the "brave Turkey carpet," of which Pepys speaks so enthusiastically, still holds its own against many rivals. Rugs and portières, curtains and brocades, velvet, damask, and beautifully designed wall papers confront us everywhere, set off by exquisitely decorated walls, stained-glass windows, and specimens of the ceramic art of China and Japan, as well as of our own country.



It cannot be wondered at, then, if Messrs. Howard and Sons have been extensively patronised. Their list of customers is headed by Royalty itself. Among the principal patrons of Messrs. Howard and Sons is his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. There is, for instance, a beautiful design for a morning-room executed at Marlborough House, with the special arrangement of shelf above alluded to, and a picture inserted as a panel, which has an admirable effect. A quaintly panelled study, designed for his Royal Highness, was also carried out, much to his satisfaction, together with other works.

It may be noted, further, that Messrs. Howard and Sons mounted and arranged the various pieces of plate, &c., presented to his Royal Highness at Sandringham House, and the work is the theme of universal admiration. The firm have also done work for his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, panelling and fitting up more than one room at Clarence House in most artistic style, and mounting for the Duke the many trophies of arms, &c., he brought with him from India and other places. There is also shown a beautiful carton pierre ceiling in the Adams style, executed for Earl Cowper at Panshanger Park; a Watteau room, designed for Lady Charles Beresford; some beautiful wainscoting and other work made of old oak, put together and arranged for Lord Francis Cecil; and a beautifully appointed library, arranged and carried out for the Right Hon. the Earl of Carysfort. The object this firm has always in view is to produce goods of real merit suitable for the occupants of a small country residence or a palace.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1878.

The Parliamentary Debates on the policy and proceedings of her Majesty's Government which have launched the country into a war with the Ameer of Afghanistan overshadow this week all other topics of political interest. Both in the House of Lords and in the House of Commons they have been sufficiently full and searching to supply to the British people whatever materials may be requisite for a discriminating and accurate judgment of the matter in hand. Whether the policy which has matured into a hostile aggression upon the Ameer's territory be, or be not, a departure from that consistently acted upon by the Indian Governments of Lords Canning, Lawrence, Mayo, and Northbrook—whether, if it be, it was justified by a change of circumstances altogether unprecedented—whether the manner in which that change was met, under instructions from home, by Lord Lytton in the wisest and most statesman-like manner—whether the present war in Afghanistan was necessary, and whether it can be vindicated on principles of international justice, are questions upon which much light has been thrown by the discussions in both Houses, and as to which, after due study of them, tolerably well-formed opinions may be adopted by reasonable men. It must be conceded, however, that the needed investigation will still to a large extent tax both the industry and the intellect of the reading public. Party influences on both sides have tended to colour both the rhetoric and the logic, which ought to have been pure and simple as the light of day. There has been much passion, but not more than the collision of thought on the subject was likely to evolve. In some cases, dry technicalities have been substituted for living spirit. In some, motives have been assumed and dwelt upon in place of facts. Some have argued the question upon lower, some upon higher, grounds; but, on the whole, the debates have fairly sustained the reputation of the British Legislature for political ability, earnestness, patriotism, and good faith, and are unquestionably capable of being read with some certainty of drawing from them a definite conclusion.

It is no business of ours to indicate what that conclusion should be. The numerical vote shows rather the strength or weakness of Parliamentary parties than the true merits of the case. We are bound to take into account, in order to determine its intrinsic value, the circumstances under which each vote has been given. The remark is applicable to both sides. It is a trying thing to show the strength of one's convictions by the severance of party ties. That is a display of individuality not ordinarily expected, and, perhaps, seldom excused. It is therefore to be looked upon as one of the drawbacks inevitable in the system of government by party. Members vote gregariously, and, primarily at least, aggregate voting must be taken as representative of the mind of the country. In critical times, however, we look rather to the articulate expression of opinion and feeling by speech and argument, than to the more mechanical exhibitions of them by vote. The country practically acquiesces, for the time being, in the latter, and it is right that it should do so. But it draws from the former its most trustworthy inferences, and it is from this teaching that it is ordinarily guided in pronouncing its ultimate decision. We may be assured that the debates of the week will go far to enlighten the judgment of the constituencies in the now not distant general election. They will become the source of accurate information to such as are eager for it, and by means of these they will be rendered broadly familiar to those whose occupations preclude deep and accurate political study. Accident may, possibly, intervene to diminish or even to destroy such a result; but it will, nevertheless, be true that the Parliamentary discussions of the week (quite irrespectively of the votes that have been given) will do not a little to shape the national decision when it may be called for.

How far the tenour of the week's Parliamentary discussions may modify the original intentions and plans of her Majesty's Government in regard to Afghanistan it is difficult to foresee. It seems probable, however, that they will do so to some extent. The rapid progress of our military forces beyond the North-Western Frontier of India will, peradventure, reach a stage of present success which the Cabinet may hold themselves justified in accepting as final. The severity of the climate in the hill country and neighbourhood of Cabul will presently, almost of necessity, suspend field operations for three months to come. During that period the Ameer may deem it the better part of wisdom to succumb to the irresistible pressure brought to bear upon him. That the displeasure visited upon him will be immoderate, there are many reasons, we hope, for not anticipating. The determination of the Government to rely, in the first instance at any rate, upon the Indian Revenue for the means required by the war, indicates, we think, their expectation that it will not be of long continuance. Doubtless, in the end, Imperial resources will be applied in some proportion, greater or less, towards repayment of the expenditure incurred. But this is an after consideration. Possibly it may be bequeathed for settlement to the successors of the present Administration, in which case it will prove to be an unmerited legacy of embarrassment. But we should conjecture from the tone of the debates that a long campaign—much less a succession of campaigns—is not contemplated by the Indian authorities. True, the beginning of strife is the letting out of waters. No one can predict the amount of evil to which it will extend, nor the seeds of mischief which it will scatter upon the surface of Asia. But, looking to the origin of the war, to its progress, to its possible entanglements, and to the effect which it may have upon the reputation of British statesmanship, one cannot but desire that it may be as brief and cursory as possible, and towards this consummation the ample discussion which these matters have now received in both Houses of Parliament will, it is reasonable to hope, have materially tended. We cannot go back, indeed, to where we stood before the proclamation of the war—we cannot altogether resume a policy of masterly inactivity—but we can pause within comparatively measurable limits; and, if error has been committed, it may, perhaps, be corrected before all its evil results will have been developed. This is the chief benefit we look for from the Debates. Others may incidentally accrue; but every well-wisher of the country will earnestly desire that, in as far as we may have been blindly led into war, the ill effects of it may be curtailed at the earliest possible moment, and that whatever of injustice it involves may be speedily and amply repaired.

Their Royal Highnesses afterwards visited the Provost of Eton and Mrs. Goodford. The Countess of Stair and the Right Hon. R. A. Cross dined with the Queen.

Her Majesty, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold attended Divine service on Sunday in the private chapel of the castle. The Rev. Henry White, M.A., Chaplain of the Chapel Royal, Savoy, officiated. Princess Christian visited her Majesty and remained to luncheon.

Earl Beauchamp, Lord Steward, had an audience of the Queen on Monday to present an address to her Majesty from the House of Lords. Prince Leopold came to London, and was present at the debate in the House of Lords. His Royal Highness afterwards returned to Windsor. The Queen's dinner party included the Dean of Windsor and the Hon. Mrs. Wellesley, Major C. E. Phipps, and Captain T. J. Edwards, R.E.

Princess Christian and the Hon. Mrs. H. Ponsonby dined with her Majesty on Tuesday.

The Queen and the members of the Royal family have been suffering great distress in consequence of the Grand Duchess of Hesse having been attacked with diphtheria. The bulletin on Wednesday night gave the gratifying intelligence that the fever was diminishing and the Grand Duchess progressing favourably.

The Queen in Council on the 27th ult. declared her consent to the marriage of the Duke of Cumberland and Princess Thyra of Denmark.

The Duchess Dowager of Athole has succeeded Lady Southampton as Lady in Waiting; and the Hon. Caroline Cavendish and the Hon. Evelyn Paget have succeeded the Hon. Mary Pitt and the Hon. Amy Lambart as Maids of Honour in Waiting.

Her Majesty has presented one hundred pounds of linen to the Charing-Cross Hospital.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince of Wales inspected the Smithfield Club Cattle Show at the Agricultural Hall on Monday. His Royal Highness visited the Duchess of Edinburgh at Clarence House and remained to luncheon. In the evening the Prince attended the debate in the House of Lords. The Princess of Wales arrived at Marlborough House from Sandringham. The Duchess of Edinburgh visited their Royal Highnesses on Tuesday and lunched with them. The Prince attended the debate in the House of Lords. The Duchess, with her children, drove to Clarence House.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

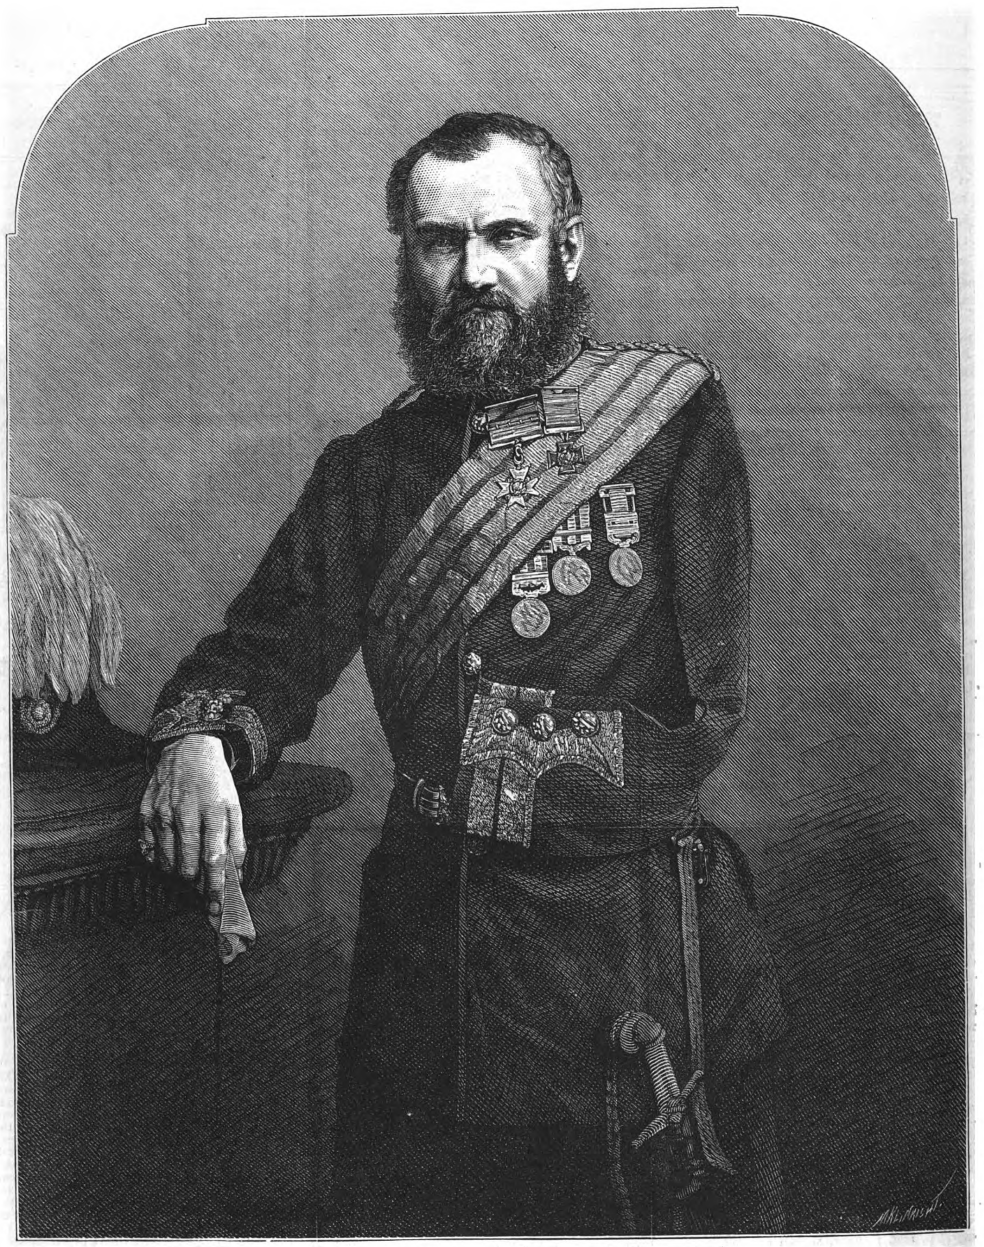
The ratepayers of Whitechapel have defeated by 496 to 261 a proposal to adopt the Public Libraries Act.

The Lord Mayor presided on Wednesday at the annual meeting of the Hospital Sunday Fund held at the Mansion House. June 15 was fixed for the day of collection next year.

After hearing evidence on Tuesday, the grand jury, at the Central Criminal Court, made the following presentment:—"No true bill against Annie Louisa Gooch and Anne Walker for misdemeanour."

Mr. Gladstone has written to the Southwark Two Hundred, in reply to their proposal that he should be a candidate for that borough, regretting that there are insurmountable barriers in the way of his accepting the invitation. He repeats his determination to make no arrangement at present for the next Parliament.

The weekly return of metropolitan pauperism shows that the total number of paupers at the end of the first week in December was 82,176, of whom 42,351 were in workhouses and 39,825 received outdoor relief. The number of vagrants relieved on the last day of the week was 796, of whom 571 were men, 163 women, and 35 children under sixteen.



Sir R. Phillimore, assisted by the Trinity Masters, gave judgment on Wednesday in the Admiralty Court in the action brought by the London Steam-Boat Company, the owners of the Princess Alice, for £20,000, for damages sustained in the collision with the Bywell Castle. There was also a cross action for £2000 brought by the owners of the Bywell Castle. The Court was of opinion that the Princess Alice was negligently navigated, and was therefore to blame for the collision. The Bywell Castle also made a wrong manœuvre after seeing the green light of the Princess Alice. Both vessels were consequently to blame for the collision. Notice of appeal was given.

The annual central conference of Representatives of Poor-Law Guardians was held on Wednesday in the rooms of the Social Science Association, Adelphi, and was numerously attended by representatives of guardians from all parts of the country. Lord Hampton occupied the chair at the morning sitting and Mr. Edwin Chadwick in the afternoon. Mr. T. Hare, Assistant Charity Commissioner, gave an address on the use of charitable endowments for the diminution of poverty; and Mr. Llewellin, High Sheriff of Glamorganshire, read a paper on Poor-Law Administration in Times of General Depression of Trade or during Strikes or Lock-Outs. Both subjects were discussed, and a resolution having a bearing upon them was passed.

There were 2576 births and 2016 deaths registered in London last week. The deaths included 389, which resulted from the sinking of the Princess Alice in the Thames on Sept. 3 last. Allowing for increase of population, the births exceeded by 162, while the deaths, exclusive of the 389 deaths referred to, were 138 below the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The deaths included 4 from smallpox, 28 from measles, 9 from diphtheria, 42 from whooping-cough, and 9 from diarrhœa. The fatal cases of scarlet fever, which had been 54 and 70 in the two preceding weeks, were 62 last week, and were 22 below the corrected weekly average. The fatal cases of fever, which had been 24 and 52 in the two previous weeks, declined again last week to 29, and were 13 below the average: 2 were certified as typhus, and 22 as enteric or typhoid. The deaths referred to diseases of the respiratory organs, which had been 428 and 441 in the two previous weeks, further rose to 460 last week, but were somewhat below the average: 299 resulted from bronchitis and 101 from pneumonia. In Greater London 3181 births and 2351 deaths were registered. The mean temperature was 36·3 deg., being 5·4 deg. below the average in the corresponding week of sixty years. The duration of registered bright sunshine in the week was 3·4 hours, the sun being above the horizon during 56·1 hours.

GENERAL SIR SAMUEL BROWNE.

Lieutenant-General Sir Samuel J. Browne, V.C., C.B., K.C.S.I., is in command of the British and Indian forces which have proceeded through the Khyber Pass to Dakka and Jellalabad. We give a portrait of this very distinguished officer. He first held a commission in the 46th Bengal Native Infantry, and served with it throughout the Punjaub campaign, being present at the passage of the Chenab, the affairs of Ramnuggur and Sadoolapore, and the battles of Chilianwallah and Goojerat. On the organisation of the Punjaub Irregular force he was offered an appointment in the 2nd Punjaub Cavalry. With this regiment, in December, 1852, Captain Browne served in the operations against the Oomuzzae Wuzerees on the Bunnoo frontier, when he was mentioned in the despatche of Major John Nicholson; in the Border Expedition, under Sir Neville Chamberlain, Captain Browne was again mentioned. At the outbreak of the Mutiny, a squadron of his regiment, under Lieutenant Dighton Probyn, was detached to Hindostan, and in the siege of Delhi and subsequent affairs between that city and Lucknow earned for its commander a Brevet Majority and Victoria Cross. But the services of Captain Browne were too valuable to be wasted in guarding the Trans-Sutlej, and early in 1858 he received orders to march down to join Sir Colin Campbell's army. At the siege and capture of Lucknow, the affairs at Koorsee, Roowiah, Allygunge, and battle of Bareilly, he commanded his regiment, and then, being detached in charge of a small field force, consisting of the present 24th Punjaub Infantry and a couple of companies of Rifles, planned and executed a brilliant attack on the rebels strongly posted at Sirpoorah on Aug. 31, 1858. The enemy were defeated with great slaughter, their camp and guns falling into our hands. For this action Major Browne was rewarded with the Victoria Cross, the Companionship of the Bath, and a Brevet Lieutenant-Colonelcy. Until 1864 Colonel Browne retained command of his original regiment, when he was promoted to the Corps of Guides; and in 1869, on the Peshawur Brigade falling vacant, he succeeded General Donald Stewart in that post, relinquishing it on promotion to Major-General two years afterwards. In 1875 General Browne was selected to accompany his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to India, and for his services in connection with the Royal visit obtained the knighthood of the Star of India. Sir Samuel Browne has lost his left arm in the field of battle.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR S. BROWNE, COMMANDING THE FORCES IN THE KHYBER PASS.

THE OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

The scene in the House of Lords on Thursday week at five o'clock in the afternoon, when their Lordships reassembled to consider their Address in reply to the Queen's Speech, which had been read to both Houses at an earlier hour of the day, is the subject of an Illustration. The Address was moved by the Earl of Ravensworth and seconded by Lord Inchiquin. There was a very full attendance of Peers, amongst whom their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge sat on the first of the cross benches, where the Earl of Derby also took his seat. The Lord Chancellor, Earl Cairns, was seated on the woolsack, having the Bishops on the upper side benches at his right hand, and the Peers who are Cabinet Ministers—namely, the Earl of Beaconsfield, the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, the Marquis of Salisbury, Viscount Cranbrook, and others. On the opposite benches were Earl Granville, the Duke of Argyll, and others belonging to the Liberal party. The steps of the Throne, and the lobbies and boxes on each side further back, were crowded with members of the House of Commons and of the different foreign Embassies. In the side galleries above, to the left of the Throne, were their Royal Highnesses Prince Leopold, Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, and the Duke and Duchess of Teck; also many peeresses and other ladies of rank.

PRINCESS LOUISE AND LORD LORNE IN CANADA.

Our Special Artist, Mr. Melton Prior, who was sent to Canada on purpose to furnish sketches of the reception of the Marquis of Lorne and Princess Louise, contributes three Sketches to this Number of our Journal. They represent the scene at the landing of his Excellency and her Royal Highness in the port of Halifax, Nova Scotia, on Monday, the 25th ult., with the incident of a young lady presenting a bouquet to the Princess on that occasion; and the ceremony of the new Governor-General of Canada taking the oaths of his office, in the Province Building. The landing took place at two o'clock in the afternoon. The steam-ship Sarmatian, which had conveyed the Marquis and the Princess-Marchioness across the Atlantic, arrived in harbour on the Sunday night, after a stormy ocean passage. In the forenoon of the next day, the Sarmatian left her moorings, hoisted the Royal standard, and steamed up the harbour to the landing-place, Royal salutes being meanwhile fired from the forts, ships, and citadel, the men-of-war also manning their yards, and each giving three lusty cheers as the vessel passed. A band on board H.M.S. Black Prince played the National Anthem and "The Campbells are Coming;" and so did a band in the Bellerophon. The harbour presented a bright and joyous appearance. Our Illustration shows the manner in which the landing was effected, the Vice-Admirals first disembarking, next the Viceregal party, then others. The Princess, notwithstanding the rough voyage, looked well, as did also the Marquis of Lorne. The scene in the dockyard was very imposing, and the festive display made by the city exceeded all expectation. The procession of the Vice-regal party through the city was a perfect triumph with enthusiastic cheering along the whole line, gracefully acknowledged by his Excellency. Arches were raised and bunting waved along the course. The Marquis was sworn in as Governor-General at the Province Building by Judge Ritchie, of the Supreme Court of Canada—General Sir Patrick MacDougall presiding as Administrator. The Princess was on her husband's right, the Duke of Edinburgh on his left. After reading the Royal Commission and administering the oaths of office, the Administrator vacated the chair for the Governor-General, to whom all paid their respects. An address of the city of Halifax was presented by the Mayor, to which his Excellency replied. The Imperial troops and the Canadian Militia lined the streets. At the Admiralty House, where the Viceregal party stayed, the scene was magnificent. They dined with the Lieutenant-Governor, and her Royal Highness next day held a drawing-room at the Government House. The Marquis and his Royal consort, as we have stated, after three days' rest at Halifax, went on by the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, where they stayed from the Friday to the Monday, and thence proceeded to Ottawa, the political capital of the Canadian Dominion. We shall publish a few more of our Special Artist's Sketches; and we have to acknowledge the courtesy of the directors of the Allan line of mail-steamers, and of the commander of their fine vessel the Peruvian, in granting Mr. Prior the best accommodation on board for his voyage to Canada.

THE WAR IN AFGHANISTAN.

Our well-known Special Artist Mr. William Simpson, who was sent out from England for the purpose of furnishing our Illustrations of the war in Afghanistan, arrived at Peshawur two or three days before the actual commencement of hostilities. He has been permitted to join the army division commanded by Lieutenant-General Sir Samuel Browne, in the Khyber Pass, for the advance upon Jellalabad; and we expect next week to present some of his sketches of the capture of Fort Ali Musjid, which should reach us in time for the Engravings to be prepared. The Commander-in-Chief of the Indian Army, General Sir Frederick Paul Haines, travelled on the 11th ult. from Umballa to Lahore, with General Lumsden, the Adjutant-General, Colonel C. C. Johnson, Quartermaster-General, and other members of his Staff, in three special carriages attached to the same train in which our Special Artist was a passenger; and so we have received from Mr. Simpson a sketch of the scene at starting from the Umballa station, which appears in the Supplement to this Number. He remarks upon this incident, in a note accompanying the Sketch:—"The departure from Umballa was at half-past two in the afternoon. The Commander-in-Chief, with General Lumsden and Colonel Johnson, came down there from Simla the evening before. A military commander starting for the front when a war is impending is always an important event; and in this case, although there was an entire absence of display or ceremony, the moment ought to be recorded. The Commander-in-Chief and his Staff would have looked better in a picture if they had had cocked hats and feathers waving, but in this instance they were in the plainest of mufti, not a single vestige of uniform being visible. Sir F. P. Haines wore an ordinary grey wideawake and a white puggaree. He stood chatting at the door of the carriage for a few minutes with some friends, while around on the platform were groups of natives who were scrambling among the heterogenous mass of articles which formed their travelling impedimenta, and who seemed to be totally unconscious of the rank of those so near to them. There was only the raising of a few hats as Sir Frederick entered his carriage and the train moved slowly away to Lahore. Such was the start of the Chief of the greatest military force now in the eastern part of the world. At Philloor, on the north bank of the Sutlej, there was dinner, after which everyone turned in to sleep. The train reached Lahore at 3.15 next morning. The Commander-in-Chief's three carriages were detached and shunted at the station, where those within all remained sleeping till the morning, and then turned out to the quarters which had been prepared for them."

We present also, in this Number of our Journal, the portraits of Lieutenant-General Sir Samuel Browne and of Major-General Frederick Roberts, commanding respectively in the Khyber Pass and in the Khoorum Valley. That of Sir S. Browne is from a photograph by Messrs. Maull and Co. A sketch of the camp of the 19th Regiment at Mooltan, the rendezvous of the Quetta Field Force, is given among our Illustrations for this week.

At the time of our latest writing, on Thursday afternoon, for this week's publication, there is an entire cessation of news of the campaign, from the three separate columns advancing by different lines into Afghanistan. Sir Samuel Browne has not yet moved onward to Jellalabad, and is probably awaiting his supplies from Peshawur, as the enemy, who are believed to have abandoned Jellalabad, will scarcely have left their stores of provisions and ammunition there to fall into his hands. As for General Roberts, who is much farther removed from his base of operations at Kohat, he has, since his victory of Monday week at the Peiwar Pass, occupied Ali Khel and Haza Darakht, and pushed a cavalry reconnaissance as far as Rokian, without again meeting the enemy; but he is probably not furnished with the means of transport for his guns and baggage up the tremendous mountain path to the summit of the Shaturgardan Pass, and he seems to intend making winter quarters for his troops in the Khoorum Valley. The southern field of operations, from Quetta to Candahar, under the command of Sir Donald Stewart, appears to be free from active opposition, so far as it has yet been explored. Major Sandeman has made a reconnaissance up the Khojuk Pass, which was found quite clear, and General Biddulph is expected to lead the advanced corps along that road, while Sir Donald Stewart has assumed the chief command at Quetta.

A letter from Shere Ali to Lord Lytton, dated Nov. 19, in reply to the Viceroy's ultimatum, was received at Lahore on the 8th inst., eighteen days after the commencement of hostilities; it expresses distrust of the English professions of goodwill, complains of the interference of a former Viceroy on behalf of the Ameer's undutiful son, Yakoob Khan, but offers to receive "a purely friendly and temporary mission, with a small escort, not exceeding twenty or thirty members, similar to the late Russian mission to Cabul." It is stated that the Ameer has sent his family and household, over the Bamian Pass, to Balkh, and thence to Russian Turkestan.

The native tribes in the Khyber have given no further trouble, and the British troops are healthy; but the Indian sepoys feel the increasing wintry cold in that mountain country.

The distress at Sheffield continues to increase. Mr. Mundella, M.P., has sent £50 and a supply of blankets, and Mrs. Mundella has sent £50 worth of warm clothing. The distress, more particularly in the ironworking districts of the town, is exceedingly great, and there are distributions of soup and bread almost daily. Children's dinners are also given in various parishes, and a committee of ladies, over which the Mayoress presides, are making an organised effort to supply sempstresses and the wives of unemployed men with sewing, on the understanding that when the clothing is completed it shall be lent to the poor.—There is great distress also in Manchester and Salford, and committees have been formed with the object of giving relief.

The House was crowded in every part, and all present immediately rose to their feet with a burst of acclamation from every side such as has not resounded through the hall since Garibaldi took his seat in 1875. The Right, the Left, and the Centre all joined in the applause. Last Monday Signor Cairoli laid on the table the Treaty of Berlin, and presented a bill for the reorganisation of the Central Administration. The Minister of Finance also brought in a bill sanctioning the monetary convention recently concluded at Paris. The debate on the interpellations directed against the Government was then resumed, Baron Nicotera being one of the speakers against the Ministry. The proposed vote of confidence in the Italian Ministry has, as was expected, been defeated in the Chamber. The long debate ended on Wednesday, and, in a House numbering 457 deputies, 189 voted for the motion and 263 against it, making a majority of 74 against the Government. As recorded in our last issue, the German Emperor and Empress made a solemn entry into Berlin on Thursday, the 5th inst., and were received with great enthusiasm. The streets were handsomely decorated, and at night the illuminations were general. In the evening the Gazette promulgated three Imperial decrees, announcing the Emperor's resumption of his functions, and thanking the Crown Prince for his efficient assistance during his illness. The Emperor William paid a visit to the Opera-House at Berlin on Friday night, and was greeted with loud cheers by the audience. All present rose and joined in singing the National Anthem, and on its conclusion the cheering was renewed. The Emperor subsequently visited the Royal Theatre, where he had a similar reception. On Saturday his Majesty received several congratulatory addresses. In reply to one from the Berlin magistrates and town council, he spoke of education, especially religious education, as the best means of counteracting the sentiments which had led to the recent attacks in several countries upon the head of the State. Lord Odo Russell was received in a special audience by the Emperor, when he presented the Queen's congratulations at his Majesty's happy recovery and entry into the capital. Thanksgiving services were held on Sunday in all the Berlin churches to celebrate the return of the Emperor. A Te Deum was sung in the Roman Catholic church of St. Hedwig. In the result, the House rejected the motion.

Before the vote all the three Ministers who are common to the two countries defended the Eastern policy of the Government against the attacks of the Opposition, and justified the occupation as a measure indispensable for the defence of the Monarchy. Count Andrassy protested against the charge that he had deceived Parliament as to the intentions of the Government. In the sitting of the Joint Committee of the Hungarian Delegation on Tuesday a similar motion was agreed to on condition of a statement being furnished of the purposes to which it was applied.

The reconstruction of the new Hungarian Ministry is completed, and the Ministers took their seats in the House last Saturday. Count Szapary and Baron Kemeny are the only new members—the former for Finance and the latter for Commerce. Several speakers, amongst them Count Apponyi, supported the motion; but Herr Tisza, the Minister-President, having declared that a vote of the Legislature as to the validity or the acceptance or non-acceptance of international treaties was inadmissible, the motion was rejected by 151 votes to 96.

In the Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath on Tuesday, after a short debate, a motion was adopted appointing a Committee of eighteen to consider the Treaty of Berlin. The Regimental Challenge Cup and Gold Medal were won by Sergeant-Instructor Andrews; the Turner Challenge Plate was won by Private W. C. Williams; and the Ladies' Challenge Plate by Private H. Snowdon. The best shot of the battalion is Private Pickwick.

The fifth competition for the Regimental Challenge Cup and Badges of the 26th Kent was held at the Inner Range, Plumstead, last Saturday. Corporal Frost was the winner of the Challenge Cup. The winners of the Badges were—Major J. D. C. Farrell, Captam J. Foggie, and Private Evans.

The annual general meeting of the South London Rifle Club was held last week at the club-house, Nunhead, under the presidency of Major Young, 39th Middlesex Rifles. The statement of accounts showed a small balance in favour of the club. The club jewels won during the past season were presented to the successful competitors, and arrangements were made for the ensuing season, the subscriptions being fixed at £1 1s., with an entrance fee of 5s. to new members.

On Monday evening there was a brilliant attendance of ladies and gentlemen in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, on the occasion of the annual presentation of prizes to the members of the 5th Lancashire (the Liverpool Rifle Brigade), the leading corps of the town. Lieutenant-Colonel R. J. Tinley, the commanding officer, was supported by the principal inhabitants of the district and many volunteer officers of other battalions. The prizes were delivered by Major-General Robertson, C.B. Lieutenant-Colonel Tinley spoke of the continued increase, both in numbers and efficiency, of the regiment, which was now 983 strong. Sir Thomas Edwards-Moss, Bart., also briefly addressed the regiment.

The annual presentation of prizes to the 3rd London by the Lord Mayor will take place in the Guildhall, and that of the West London (4th Middlesex) in St. George's Hall, Langham-place, this (Saturday) evening.

Lord Ruthven, late Captain, Rifle Brigade, has been appointed Major of the London Scottish, in the room of Sir Henry Pelly, M.P., deceased, and the London Gazette notifies the succession as Lieutenant-Colonel Commandant of Major Henry Lumsden, of Pitcaple Castle, vice Lord Elcho, appointed honorary Colonel.

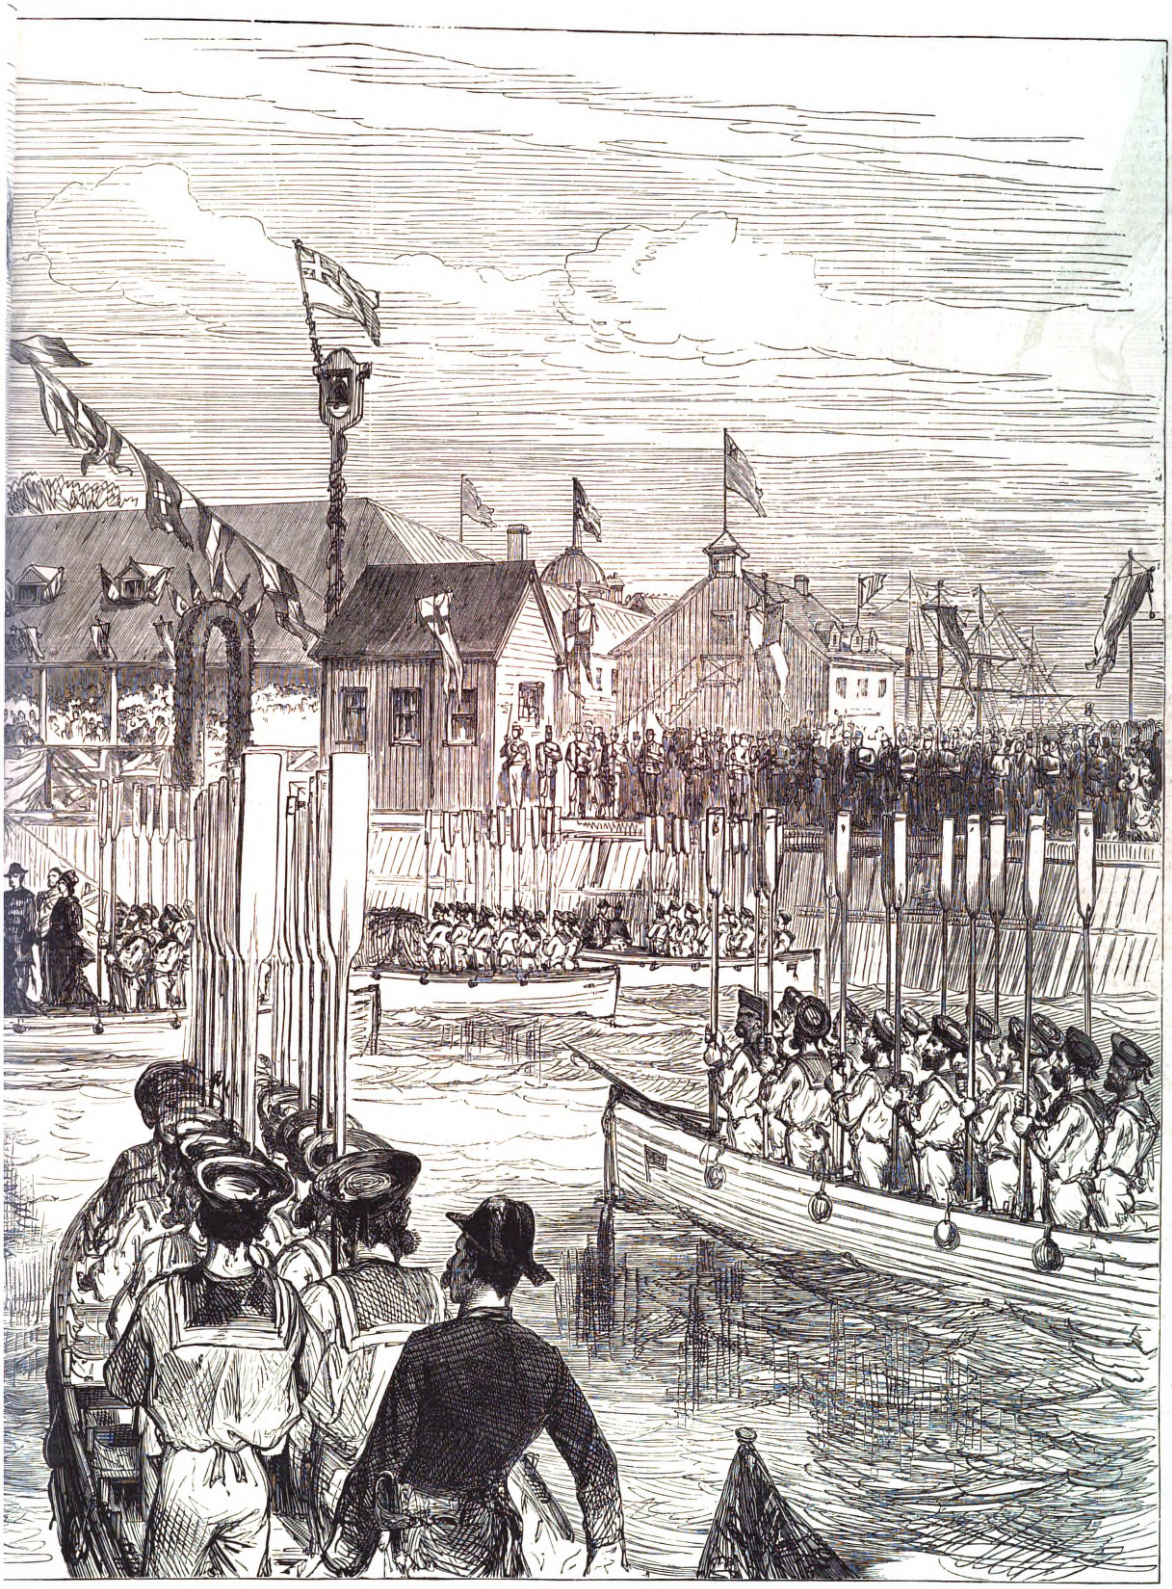
CATTLE SHOWS.

The Smithfield Club Cattle Show, which opened on Monday, has been one of the most successful in the history of that organisation. Her Majesty, the Prince of Wales, the Dukes of Sutherland, Richmond and Gordon, Manchester, Roxburghe, and Marlborough, the Marquis of Exeter, the Marchioness of Camden, Lords Powis, Jersey, Braybrooke, Walsingham, and Darnley were amongst the exhibitors. The Prince of Wales visited the hall on Monday. In the last ten years the Champion Plate of £100 for the best beast has been won eight times by shorthorns, once by a Devon, and once by a polled Aberdeen. This year it is a shorthorn heifer which carries off the great prize. Icicle, the roan heifer of Mr. Richard Stratton, of the Duffryn, Newport, Monmouthshire, which at Oakham last year won the chief honour and at Birmingham carried off the Elkington Challenge Cup, takes the first prize of £25 in her class, the £40 silver cup as best shorthorn, the £50 silver cup as best cow or heifer in the hall, and the Champion Plate as best beast in the hall. The Queen and the Prince of Wales have fourteen entries in the cattle classes, but only three of them take prizes. Mr. J. S. Bult, of Taunton, exhibited the best ox in the show.—The annual general meeting of the Smithfield Club took place on Tuesday, the Duke of Bedford in the chair. On the motion of the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, seconded by Lord Walsingham, Colonel Kingscote, M.P., was elected president for 1879, and Lord Tredegar was chosen president for 1880. Sir Brandreth Gibbs was unanimously elected one of the vice-presidents.

The annual winter show of fat cattle, sheep, &c., in connection with the Royal Dublin Society was opened on Tuesday in the society's premises, Kildare-street. The display of fat cattle was unusually good, the numbers being largely in excess of last year's numbers, and the condition excellent. There was also a good display of sheep and a splendid show of poultry, the entries in the latter section being 444.

The winter cattle show at Leeds, which lasted three days, was opened on Tuesday by the Mayor. The total entries numbered 1036, of which eighty were for cattle, thirty-four for sheep, sixty-four for pigs, and the remainder for poultry, rabbits, and roots.

The Birmingham Cattle Show closed on the 5th inst. During the five days it was open 65,830 persons were admitted. Last year the number was 53,501. The receipts amounted to £2010, as against £1673 last year.—The Dog Show at Birmingham, which closed on the 6th inst., was a great success, 19,500 persons being admitted, and the receipts being £820.



The annual sale of the Queen's fat cattle was held at the Prince Consort Farm, Frogmore, on Wednesday. Good prices were obtained in most instances, the sale including thirty-six prime shorthorn bullocks, which fetched from £27 10s. to £45; 200 Down sheep, 76s. to 100s. each; and 120 bacon hogs and porkers, 85s. to £9 10s. each.

Since our last issue we have received the Christmas Number of Tinsley's Magazine, written by B. L. Farjeon, and entitled "The Mystery of Roaring Meg," a tale of the Australian gold-diggings, with a thread of fairy lore running through it; that of Once a Week, named "A Gilded Pill," a domestic story of deep interest, by G. Manville Fenn; and that of the Monthly Packet, edited by the author of "The Heir of Redclyffe," consisting of several tales. The first two publications are illustrated.—Amongst the many humorous publications intended to make us merry at the Christmas fire-side is one issued from the Fun office, entitled "The British Working Man, by one who does not believe in him." The illustrations are by Mr. J. F. Sullivan.

PARLIAMENT.

DEBATES ON THE AFGHAN WAR.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

With customary dispatch the House came to a decision on the important question which had called Parliament together after three nights' discussion. On Thursday week Lord Beaconsfield virtually closed the debate on the Address in a vigorous speech, remarkably terse and pugnacious, challenging Earl Granville to divide the House as he entertained such antagonistic views against the Government as those he had given expression to. Earl Granville clung to his Fabian tactics, however, and prevailed on Earl Grey to withdraw his amendment; and so the Address in reply to the Queen's Speech came to be agreed to. But on Friday week (after the Lord Chancellor had been sworn in as Earl Cairns on his elevation a step in the peerage) the Earl of Cork gave notice of a fresh amendment on behalf of Lord Halifax.

The battle proper began in the Upper Chamber on Monday after Earl Beauchamp, the Lord Steward, had brought forward the following answer from her Majesty to the Address of their Lordships:—

My Lords,—I thank you sincerely for your loyal and dutiful Address, and assure you that you may rely on my heartfelt desire to co-operate with you in promoting the happiness and welfare of all parts of my Empire.

Lord Cranbrook forthwith rose, and, on behalf of the Government, delivered an impetuous attack, marked by his usual loud and rapid (far too rapid for the comfort of the reporters) mode of utterance. The gist of the Secretary for India's rushing oration was that his Government had inherited from Mr. Gladstone's Ministry the sulky enmity of the Ameer Shere Ali; that, to place our relations with Afghanistan on a better footing, the Marquis of Salisbury had instructed Lord Lytton to negotiate for the placing of British officers on the Afghan frontier; that, whilst the Ameer had declined to receive these British Envoys, a Russian Mission had been ostentatiously welcomed at Cabul; that, thereupon, Major Cavagnari asked permission of the Commandant at Ali Musjid to allow General Sir Neville Chamberlain's Mission to proceed to Cabul, but that not only was permission refused but no answer was sent within the given time by the Ameer to Lord Lytton's Ultimatum; and that war was, thereupon, declared against Shere Ali. Lord Cranbrook remarked that the estimate for the Afghan War during the present financial year would not exceed £1,100,000 or £1,200,000. The surplus on the Indian Budget would not be less than £2,136,000; so that, taking the cost of the war to be a million and a quarter, there would be a surplus of about £500,000. Such were, in brief, the arguments adduced by Lord Cranbrook in support of the resolution which he moved, viz.:—

That, her Majesty having directed a military expedition of her forces charged upon Indian revenues to be dispatched against the Ameer of Afghanistan, this House consents that the revenues of India shall be applied to defray the expenses of the military operations which may be carried on beyond the external frontiers of her Majesty's Indian possessions.

Lord Halifax, having been many years Secretary for India as Sir Charles Wood (during Lord Palmerston's last term of office), cannot fairly be accused of any lack of patriotism. Yet it was this venerable statesman (his Lordship is seventy-eight) who with admirable precision and method, albeit he shared the general inaudibility of the front Opposition Bench, marshalled a host of facts to show that the conciliatory policy maintained towards Shere Ali up to and during the Viceroyalty of Lord Northbrook was the most just and prudent course to follow. Being of this opinion, Lord Halifax moved this amendment:—

To leave out from the word "House," to the end of the motion, for the purpose of inserting, "while ready to consent to providing the means necessary for bringing the war in which we are unhappily engaged to a safe and honourable conclusion, regrets the conduct pursued by the Government which has unnecessarily engaged this country in the contest."

Lord Lawrence gave the weight of his great experience as Governor-General of India in support of the amendment. In doing so, the noble Lord at the outset declared he viewed with as much concern as anyone the approach of Russian to Afghanistan; but he also held it would be unwise of us to go beyond our north-west frontier to anticipate the attacks of Russia; and he maintained that the war was unjust and impolitic. The Earl of Derby, while he could not join in a censure of the policy pursued up to 1876, believed the Viceroy and his advisers had precipitated a war that might have been avoided with a little patience; and a war that, being unnecessary, could not be just. The Duke of Somerset followed in support of the Government; but the Earl of Carnarvon, in a brief and earnest speech, could see nothing in the correspondence to justify the war. Lord Napier and Ettrick spoke for, and the Earl of Aberdeen and the Earl of Airlie against, the resolution.

Earl Grey was first to open fire on the Government on Tuesday, and he brought an able speech to a close by protesting against the cost of this "unrighteous war" being thrown on India. The Lord Chancellor smartly replied. He called their Lordships to imagine the northern part of Scotland in the hands of a warlike, independent nation, with a vast and ambitious Empire to the north again but "tending to more southwards." Given, in addition, a range of high mountains between England and Scotland, and the analogy would be complete, he thought. But, if such were the case, would the House trouble itself about "diplomatic etiquette?" "Would not, rather, both sides of the House be urging the Government of the country to take those steps which were absolutely necessary to make secure the position of this country in regard to this northern neighbour." Having taken the bull by the horns thus at the beginning, Earl Cairns entered into a series of quotations from despatches to show that the Government were justified in the course they had adopted. From the same source, however, Lord Selborne culled a number of passages to prove that the war ought to have been avoided. Lord Houghton, the Marquis of Bath, the Earl of Jersey, the Marquis of Ripon, and Lord Middleton having spoken, Lord Northbrook again showed what energy he could display when put upon his mettle. The ex-Viceroy argued that the new policy had alienated the Ameer, and that no advantage could be derived from the war. The Marquis of Salisbury applied his vocabulary of sarcasm to Lord Lawrence and other opponents of the Ministry, and vigorously defended the action of the Government in bringing Shere Ali to reason. Lord Cardwell briefly replied; and Lord Beaconsfield closed the debate in the small hours. The Prime Minister was exceedingly lively, boldly justified a rectification of our north-west frontier, and appealed to the House not to be influenced by the Peace-at-any-Price party. On the division, there were 201 Contents, 65 Non-Contents—a majority of 136 for the Government. The engagement over, the House adjourned to Tuesday next.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The affability with which Sir Stafford Northcote received the mild opposition offered to the Government on the opening night of the Session led to the expectation that the Address would be agreed to as a matter of form, and that the real fight would take place on one or the other of the independent resolutions of which notice was given. But the second sitting told a different tale. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would grant no facilities to the bold spirits who would dare to question the policy of the Government. So, after much discussion and recrimination, it was decided that Mr. Whitbread should move his amendment on the report of the Address.

No Liberal could have been chosen outside the front Opposition bench fitter than Mr. Whitbread for the important task of opening the debate on Monday. The hon. member for Bedford is possessed of a very evenly balanced mind, and is so deeply imbued with the judicial faculty that he would have made an excellent Judge. These qualities, combined with thorough-going earnestness, were conspicuous in the admirable speech in which he advanced a mass of evidence from the Parliamentary papers on Afghanistan to show cause why the Commons should sanction his amendment:—

That this House disapproves the conduct of her Majesty's Government which has resulted in the war with Afghanistan.

With more than the ordinary self-sufficiency and confidence of youth did Mr. Stanhope at one and the same time give an exhibition of his elocutionary powers, and glibly make answer unto Mr. Whitbread in accordance with the text of Lord Cranbrook's Party despatch to Lord Lytton. In lieu of the weighing and consideration of arguments pro and con., there was an obstinate citation of every paper that strengthened the case of the Government, and a blind avoidance of passages which told against them. The Ministerial mot d'ordre was, doubtless, followed in this respect by Mr. Stanhope, for the same partial tone was observable in every one of the defenders of the Government in both Houses of Parliament. Among the succeeding speakers Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Chamberlain, and Mr. W. E. Forster earnestly condemned the new Afghan policy, which was, on the other hand, defended in an able maiden speech by Mr. Ridley.

There was an element of humour in the opening phases of the debate on Tuesday. Lord John Manners, a jerky and jaunty replica of the Prime Minister in action and in mode of speech, loftily declared that it would be unnecessary for him even to remove the elastic band from the Blue Book to refute the arguments that had been marshalled against the Government. But his Lordship had speedily to repent him of this bit of "masterly inactivity." Mr. Gladstone so effectively analysed the discrepancies, inaccuracies, and misrepresentations which he had found in Parliamentary papers that presently the noble Lord involuntarily removed the elastic band from his Blue Book and checked the passages in question as the right hon. gentleman read them out. The speech of Mr. Gladstone lasted two hours, and was marvellously effective, point following point in such rapid succession that Ministers had good cause to shuffle uneasily in their seats. Thus, in answer to paragraph nine in Lord Cranbrook's oft-referred-to despatch, Mr. Gladstone pointed out among other things that Sir Lewis Pelly's report showed that the Ameer's special Envoy acknowledged that the usual friendship between the two countries existed up to the departure of Lord Northbrook, who had thoroughly reassured the Ameer. Coming to the vital point of Shere Ali's acceptance of the Russian Mission at Cabul, he dwelt on the fact that the Marquis of Salisbury had tacitly admitted the reasonableness of Russia's explanations, and yet the Government had declared war against the Ameer, and, as recompense, proposed to appropriate the territory of the neutral tribes! An ex-comedian of the House, presumably of opinion that "Life's a joke, and all things show it," has this week ventured to carp at the "excitability" of Mr. Gladstone. On jokers of his type the lofty flight of eloquence with which Mr. Gladstone concluded his fine speech would, perhaps, be thrown away. But the House generally cheered long and warmly the noble peroration with which the right hon. gentleman, in deep and solemn tones, concluded the assertion that "those members of this House who oppose your course will believe that they have performed a duty incumbent upon men who believe that truth and justice are the only sure foundations of international relations, and that there is no possession so precious, either for peoples or for men, as a just and honourable name." Of sound and fury, signifying nothing, did Sir Robert Peel's pretentious reply consist. Mr. Leatham was followed by Mr. Forsyth. Sir Charles Dilke rather disturbed the deportment of Sir Robert Peel. Government had seemingly no one of greater weight than the complacent young Lord George Hamilton to put up afterwards; and Mr. Grant Duff moved the adjournment of the debate to Thursday. On Wednesday, it may be mentioned, in passing, the House did a little practical business by advancing a few bills a stage.

On Thursday the adjourned debate upon the proposed vote of censure of the Government was prefaced by a very brief but pungent statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which was received with vociferous cheers from the Ministerial side of the House. In reply to a notice of a question by Sir W. Harcourt, intended to be put to the leader of the House on Friday, the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed his desire to answer it on the instant, and then went on to say that when he stated the other night that the Russian Envoy had left Cabul he was speaking according to the information he had then received. Her Majesty's Government had understood, from what had passed between our representative and the Russian Government, that the departure of the Envoy was equivalent to the recall of the Russian Mission. But since he had made that statement her Majesty's Government received information which leads them to form a contrary opinion. The House, however, may rest assured that her Majesty's Government do not intend to acquiesce in the exercise of Russian influence in Afghanistan in this or any other form. In reply to Sir C. Dilke, Mr. Bourke said it was true that in October last Mr. Di Cesnola, an American subject, was tried before the District Court of Larnaca, in Cyprus, for excavating objects of antiquarian interest without a firman, and sentenced to a fine (which was remitted by Sir G. Wolseley) and the confiscation of the objects found. Every precaution would, however, be taken to secure a fair trial to all persons who were charged with any offences. Mr. Courtauld having taken the oath and his seat for Maldon, the adjourned debate on the proposed vote of censure was commenced by Mr. Grant Duff, who charged the Government with a policy directed to the annexation of Afghanistan, and defended the conduct of the Gladstone Cabinet as regarded its relations with the Ameer. Mr. Bourke, in a speech of considerable length, replied on behalf of the Government. The debate flagged much in interest as it became known that it would be carried over to another night, and that the greater guns would reserve their fire until the final stage. About midnight a further adjournment took place.

Early on Wednesday morning, during a thick fog, the mail-steamer Breeze, bound from Dover to Calais, ran ashore about 500 yards from the West Pier at the latter port. All the passengers and crew were landed, as well as the mails.

The working men of Ottawa, according a Reuter's telegram, have presented an address to Sir John Macdonald, the Dominion Premier, and Mr. Tupper, the Minister of Public Works.

The Extra Supplement.

"TELL ME!"

The tender confidences of girlish friendship are not lightly to be made the subject of a stranger's curious speculations; but we cannot look at the attitude of these two maidens, seated on a bench at the seaside, the one forgetful of her pitcher, the other of her knitting, both intent upon that engrossing theme, a half-confessed love affair, without trying to guess the purport of their conversation. That one of them is deeply in love with somebody, or imagines herself to be in love with him, may be read in the soft but steadfast gaze directed nowhere, the air of fondly rapt distraction, the folded hands and passive expectancy with which she meditates upon the absent idol of her affections. The other girl has not yet been told who he is, and she is neither more nor less inquisitive upon such matters than the generality of her sex. "Tell me!" or rather, at least, "only tell me! you know I never will tell anybody else;" this is the burden of her persuasive entreaty, which is pretty sure to earn its desired boon of a communication of her friend's secret. Let us hope that it will be received with generous sympathy; and that, if the object of this impassioned fancy be one whom it is well to love and trust, there will be a happy future in store for a couple of true lovers, while the confidante may, in due time, be called upon to officiate as a bridesmaid at the village church.

HALF-HOURS OF A BLIND MAN'S HOLIDAY.

Two volumes published by Messrs. Sampson Low and Co., filled with half a hundred short tales and essays by Mr. W. W. Fenn, bear the title Half-Hours of a Blind Man's Holiday, which is explained by what the author tells us of himself in "My Own Story." He was a landscape artist of considerable talent, who fourteen years ago endured the loss of sight from a disease of the eyes, and has since been writing, with merited public favour, in the popular magazines and papers. Now and then, as we hope our readers will remember, Mr. Fenn has contributed to this Journal. "The Bell Buoy" and "The Message of the Hour," and "Christmas Eve at Lonethorpe Manor" appeared in our Christmas Supplements, to the gratification of many of our friends. We observe that Mr. Fenn also calls this collection of his writings "Summer and Winter Sketches in Black and White." They are not deficient in the bright and vivid colouring of nature at every season; but he means, of course, that he now paints only with ink, and that with a pen held by his wife's hand. We can testify that the pen is used to good purpose in delineating, with unaffected gracefulness and impressiveness, the ideas of a powerful imagination and prolific fancy. These are inspired by an active sympathy with human feeling, perhaps the more intense for that deprivation of an outward sense which has led him to brood over the store of past experiences, refining, expanding, and deepening their moral import. Yet we are glad to learn, from the account of his own present habits, that he is still able to enjoy both rural nature and the cheerful bustle of town, as well as the society of his friends; and that this exercise of literature serves him as a sufficient vehicle of mental expression. The most appropriate commendation that we can bestow upon these tales, is to say that Mr. Fenn continues to practise very acceptably as an artist, but in a different medium, now using a good English vocabulary and style of description or narrative, instead of a brush with oil or water-colours. A remarkable effect of instant reality and pressing urgency is felt in most of these stories, which are usually supposed to be told by an eye-witness, or by some person connected with those engaged in the action. This method is probably more suitable to such brief narrative compositions, which are for the reading of an hour or half an hour, than to lengthened works of fiction, like "The Woman in White" of Mr. Wilkie Collins. It is the faculty of inventing and working out an original plot, in which many aspiring novelists and lighter story-tellers of our day are apt to fail; but Mr. Fenn possesses this faculty in no small degree. "The Romance of a Rescue," "In the Family," "The Drawing-Master's Story," "A Game of Thimblerig," and "A Private Inquiry" are tales of complex incident which afford that pleasing excitement of curiosity desired by the majority of readers. Some part, however, of this miscellany of papers has little or no fictitious ingredient, but consists of simple descriptive sketches or essays—for instance, those called "Leafless Trees," "London Landscaps," "Summer in the Suburbs," and "The Roar of London." This last essay, together with the author's statements of his own hearing sensations, under the peculiar mental condition of blindness, may have a certain interest as exemplifying the mode in which the mind is affected by a derangement of the ordinary balance of the different sources of external impressions. "Feeling the Way," "Fingers versus Eyes," and "Leaves by a Listener" contain important testimony and suggestions upon the same theme of psychology; but we expect that most readers will prefer the tales of imaginary adventure, which bear such promising titles as "The Secret of the Stair," "A Mystery of the Cliffs," "Deed for Deed," and even "My Murder." The essays upon social manners, fashions, and customs are the fruit of shrewd observation and reflection, tempered with a quiet humour which makes them agreeable to the most indifferent mind. They are frequently occupied with the life and work of artists, whether in "A Studio Party," or sketching at Bettws-y-Coed, or submitting their productions to criticism and to "Collectors' Tastes." The two volumes are filled with so great a variety of entertaining matter, that almost every person, in every mood, will be sure to find what is likely to suit his disposition for the vacant hour.

The usual challenge for the University Boat-Race has been sent by the Cambridge Boat Club to that of Oxford.

We are desired to state that the late Francis Crawshay, whose death was recently noticed in this paper, married Laura, daughter of R. Crawshay, Esq., of Ottershaw Park, Surrey.

The stoppage of the Caledonian Bank led to a run on Friday and Saturday on the local Savings Bank. The other Scotch Banks have arranged to take over the branches of the Caledonian throughout the kingdom. In the Court of Session, on Saturday, consent was given to an agreement between the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank and the Caledonian Banking Company, by which the former secure enough to furnish payment of a call to the extent of £37,500 per share on the shares held by the Caledonian.—The West of England and South Wales District Bank, which has its head-quarters at Bristol with forty-two branches, has suspended payment. Its liabilities are estimated at three and a half millions, with locked-up assets to the like amount. In compliance with an application made to him on Monday, Vice-Chancellor Malins appointed Mr. Turquand and Mr. E. G. Clarke the provisional liquidators of this bank.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

I am no very assiduous autograph-hunter; still, I like to possess, and I have a few big books at home full of specimens of the handwriting of distinguished persons—specimens which I have neither bought nor begged. I was looking through my letters from novelists recently. I found Victor Hugo, Dickens, Thackeray, Charles Reade, Jerrold, Edmond About, M. E. Braddon, Mrs. Gore, Mrs. Lynn Linton, Wilkie Collins, Edmund Yates, Harrison Ainsworth, Charles Lever, Shirley Brooks, Anthony Trollope, Albert Smith, Mark Lemon, Angus Reach, Florence Maryatt, Hawley Smart, and "Leo." "Leo" (who wrote a capital military-sporting novel) was, I take it, poor "Kit" Pemberton, of the Guards, who was killed while witnessing, en amateur, a battle during the Franco-German War in 1870. It struck me as I closed the volume that I had had epistles from two more writers of military romance and adventure—the author of "The Highlanders in Spain," "The Yellow Frigate," and "The Phantom Regiment;" and especially the writer of those capital tales "Digby Grand," "General Bounce," and "Kate Coventry." But then I remembered that I had no kind of acquaintance with Grant or with Whyte-Melville.

Oddly enough, there came to me in the first days of December a very kind and courteous letter in which the writer, apologising for communicating with me without prior introduction, asked me for some information concerning a reduced gentleman (the son of a once noted journalist) who had applied to him for assistance, and who, in his application, had made use of my name. My correspondent went on to say that if the case was a bonâ fide one he would willingly do what he could to relieve the poor gentleman. The letter was signed J. G. Whyte-Melville. I had got one of the autographs for which I had been longing. I wrote him back, stating that which I knew and thought of the case; and just four days afterwards I read with sincere grief in the newspapers that poor Whyte-Melville, while out hunting with the Vale of White Horse fox-hounds, had been thrown from his horse and killed on the spot.

Mem: Letters have appeared in the press discussing the question whether the Major was a "hard" rider or a "straight" rider, whether he went "lashing" away or "took his fences gently," and what not. I do not understand the technology of the hunting-field. It is enough for me to know that the author of "Digby Grand" was a dashing, brilliant, and graphic writer, and to be sure (from that letter) that he was a thoroughly kind-hearted and loveable man.

My "Echoes" (suspended last week owing to an attack of a malady which may be qualified as "Return to England-Home-and-Beauty-fog-influenza bronchitis) must needs this week be necrological. Alfred Wigan has died, and been laid to rest at Kensal Green since I last wrote. It must be more than forty years since that I saw him make his appearance, under the name of Sidney, at the St. James's Theatre (John Bisham, proprietor and manager) in the character either of "Noodle," or "Doodle," in Fielding's burlesque of "Tom Thumb," in which John Pitt Harley played "Lord Grizzle," and my Mother the Princess Huncamunca. Some four years afterwards, when young Mr. Sidney had become Mr. Alfred Wigan again, and was rapidly making his way on the stage (at Covent Garden, I think; but I am not a collector of playbills, and cannot be certain on that head), I, being a precocious young nuisance of twelve, submitted to the rising actor a fearsome five-act tragedy called "Frédégonde," which I had written in French. Alfred Wigan was, next to the living Charles Lamb Kenney, the very best French-speaking Englishman that I ever came in contact with. I have an idea that Mr. Wigan did not think my five-act tragedy quite up to the Racine and Corneille standard; but he laughingly reminded me of "Frédégonde" ever so many years afterwards, when he was lessee and manager of the St. James's, and I wrote to ask him for a private box.

"Et pourtant il y avait quelque chose là," as André Chénier thoughtfully remarked, tapping his forehead, just as they were going to guillotine him. "Frédégonde," under more auspicious circumstances, ought to have made its way. There was a murder in almost every scene. Somebody was poisoned, or burnt, or put to the torture coram publico at the end of every act; and I think that, as a dénouement, the wicked French Queen was to be torn to pieces by wild horses (from Mr. Ducrow's stud at Astley's), or devoured by the wild dogs of Messrs. Coney and Blanchard. I forget which of the catastrophes was to happen; but I incline to the belief that it was the latter, because those were the days of that grand canine melodrama "The Murder of the Forest of Bondy; or, The Dog of Montargis."

Alfred Wigan retired from the stage (with that admirable actress, his wife) in the very fulness of his faculties, but his wretched health necessitated his withdrawal. I scarcely think that complete justice has yet been done by the press to his merits as an actor. A second place in his profession has been assigned to him by the Times. I would place him in the front rank as a genteel comedian, wellnigh unsurpassed in artistic finish and general accomplishments. Did you ever see him in "Still Waters Run Deep;" in the "Lady of St. Tropez;" in the "First Night" (an adaptation of the French "Père de la Débutante;" and especially in the part of the French usher, in Tom Taylor's "To Parents and Guardians." In the pathetic vaudeville of "Monsieur Jaques" Alfred Wigan had a formidable precursor in the late Morris Barnett; and there were playgoers who professed to prefer Mr. Barnett's broken English to Mr. Wigan's. Yet, strange to relate, while Alfred Wigan was a perfect French scholar, Morris Barnett was a very imperfect one. It was the old story of the critics of the pig that squealed when his tail was pinched, and the merry-andrew who imitated the ululation of a pig under similarly irritating circumstances. The verdict of the majority was in favour of the apocryphal pig.

And why should there not be two camps in criticism, so long as we can carry on our critical polemics without becoming personally offensive to one another, and calling each other abusive names? I see by the public prints that, under the auspices of the Fine-Art Society in New Bond-street, a subscription is being got up to defray the amount of Mr. Ruskin's costs in the late action of Whistler v. Ruskin. From another source I am enabled to state that an influential committee is being organised to gather funds for the payment of Mr. Whistler's costs. Both plaintiff and defendant in this unhappy suit stand mulct at present in a sum of some six hundred pounds. Each has been presented with a very pretty oystershell, containing an "arrangement in mother of pearl." The fine fat oyster within falls to the share of the gentlemen of the long robe and the other legal benefactors concerned in the case.

And yet (when the costs have been paid) I can't help thinking that Mr. Whistler may deem himself very well off with his "arrangement in monotone"—the farthing which I am told he wears at his watch-chain. There is, believe me, a direr anguish than that of losing a law suit. It is that of gaining it. I got some damages once—five hundred pounds—in an action for libel; and I do most sincerely hope that I shall never again undergo such ceaseless misery and wretchedness as I endured until the very last farthing of that ill-omened booty was spent. The great tribe of begging letter-writers came down upon me even as the waters come down at Lodore; and legions of friends of my youth who had been worsted in the Battle of Life issued forth from all kinds of hiding-places, "exceeding fierce," and demanding instant succour. All the Asylums, Hospitals, Refuges, and Homes sent me circulars. I think that the milkman "attached" the damages even before they were paid. I know that somebody else put a "distringas" upon them which it cost me more than a hundred pounds to remove. Fancy being tortured with a "distringas." Fancy being overwhelmed by passionate appeals from unknown people importuning you to become a director of the Patagonian Boot, Shoe, and Golosh Company (Limited); to advance two hundred and fifty pounds for the purpose of patenting a new atmospheric cow-milker; to purchase an undoubted Stradivarius fiddle; and to subscribe towards the purchase of an annuity for the three great-great-grandaughters of Dr. Titus Oates. I moodily took the last fifty pounds of these maleficent damages to Hombourg; staked the sum on the couleur at trente et quarante; and experienced a sensation of infinite relief when the croupier swept up the obnoxious gold. A clean sponge had been passed over a slate written all over with a history of unhappiness.

Dr. Millingen, one of the medical men who attended Lord Byron in his last illness, and who was present at the poet's death, at Missolonghi, on April 19, 1824, has just died at Constantinople. He had been during very many years a resident of the European suburb of Pera. Dr. Millingen was to the last full of reminiscences of Byron, and it is to be regretted that he has left behind him no written record of his intercourse with the poet. Such memoranda, it is stated, the Doctor had drawn up long since; but these precious notes, with all his other papers, were destroyed in the great fire at Pera in 1870. Mr. Trelawney is now nearly the only survivor among those who knew Byron intimately.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

MUSIC PRIMERS.

This valuable series (published by Novello, Ewer, and Co has recently received several important additions.

Herr Pauer has contributed an excellent treatise on Musical Forms, in which he deals with the various constructive features of sacred and secular, vocal and instrumental music, of the ancient and modern schools. His introductory portion is explanatory of accent, metre, rhythm, style, figure, melody, the period and its construction, and thematic work—the following sections—illustrative of all the important species of musical composition, being supplemented by an appendix devoted to melodrama, monodrama, duodrama, chamber music, drawing-room music, descriptive music, tone-painting, programme music, Schumann's fancy pieces, and obsolete forms. The book is full interest and instruction, and will aid the comprehension and enjoyment of all styles and schools.

The Primer of Plain Song, by the Rev. T. Helmore, treats of the most ancient species of church music, the old notation of which, and the several "modes" (plagal and authentic), are explained, many musical illustrations being given, both in the obsolete and the present notation, in addition to the large amount of instructive matter comprised in the fifteen chapters of the work. Both the primers just referred to have the advantage of a comprehensive index.

Mr. Curwen, the active and successful promoter of the Tonic-Sol-Fa system, has supplied a concise and clear explanation of the process by which letters are used instead of musical notes, thus simplifying the elements of musical instruction, especially in teaching class-singing. The speedy facility obtained by the Tonic-Sol-Fa classes, as exemplified by many public performances, is proof of the value of the system for popular musical education.

The Primer on Fugue is by Mr. James Higgs, who has condensed a large amount of information in a moderate compass. The author states that his Primer "is addressed to all who hear or play fugues, as well as to students who desire to write them." The several chapters of the work treat of the component parts of a fugue, subject, answer, counter-subject, episode, stretto, order of reply, modulation, pedal, and the construction of a fugue as a whole. Copious musical examples are given in illustration, besides several pianoforte and choral fugues, by Bach and others, put into score. Mr. Higgs has contributed a valuable addition to the musical library.

Another excellent treatise is the Primer of Instrumentation, by Mr. E. Prout, who is specially qualified for the authorship of such a work by his extensive theoretical and practical knowledge of the subject. He treats, copiously and clearly, of all the instruments used in the orchestra, both in their single and associated employment, even as in the complex combinations of Wagner's score. Extracts from the works of this composer and of Brahms, and from those of many of the great masters of the past, are given, an index thereof affording ready reference to them.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co. may be congratulated on the deserved success of this excellent and inexpensive series, which is still in course of extension.

The Lord Lieutenant, who left Dublin last week for a short sojourn at Knockdrin, near Mullingar, has fixed Jan. 21 for his first Levée of the season.

Rear-Admiral Willes on Wednesday laid the foundation-stone of a new dock at Devonport Dockyard. It is to be 386 ft. in length, thus being the largest dry dock in the world.

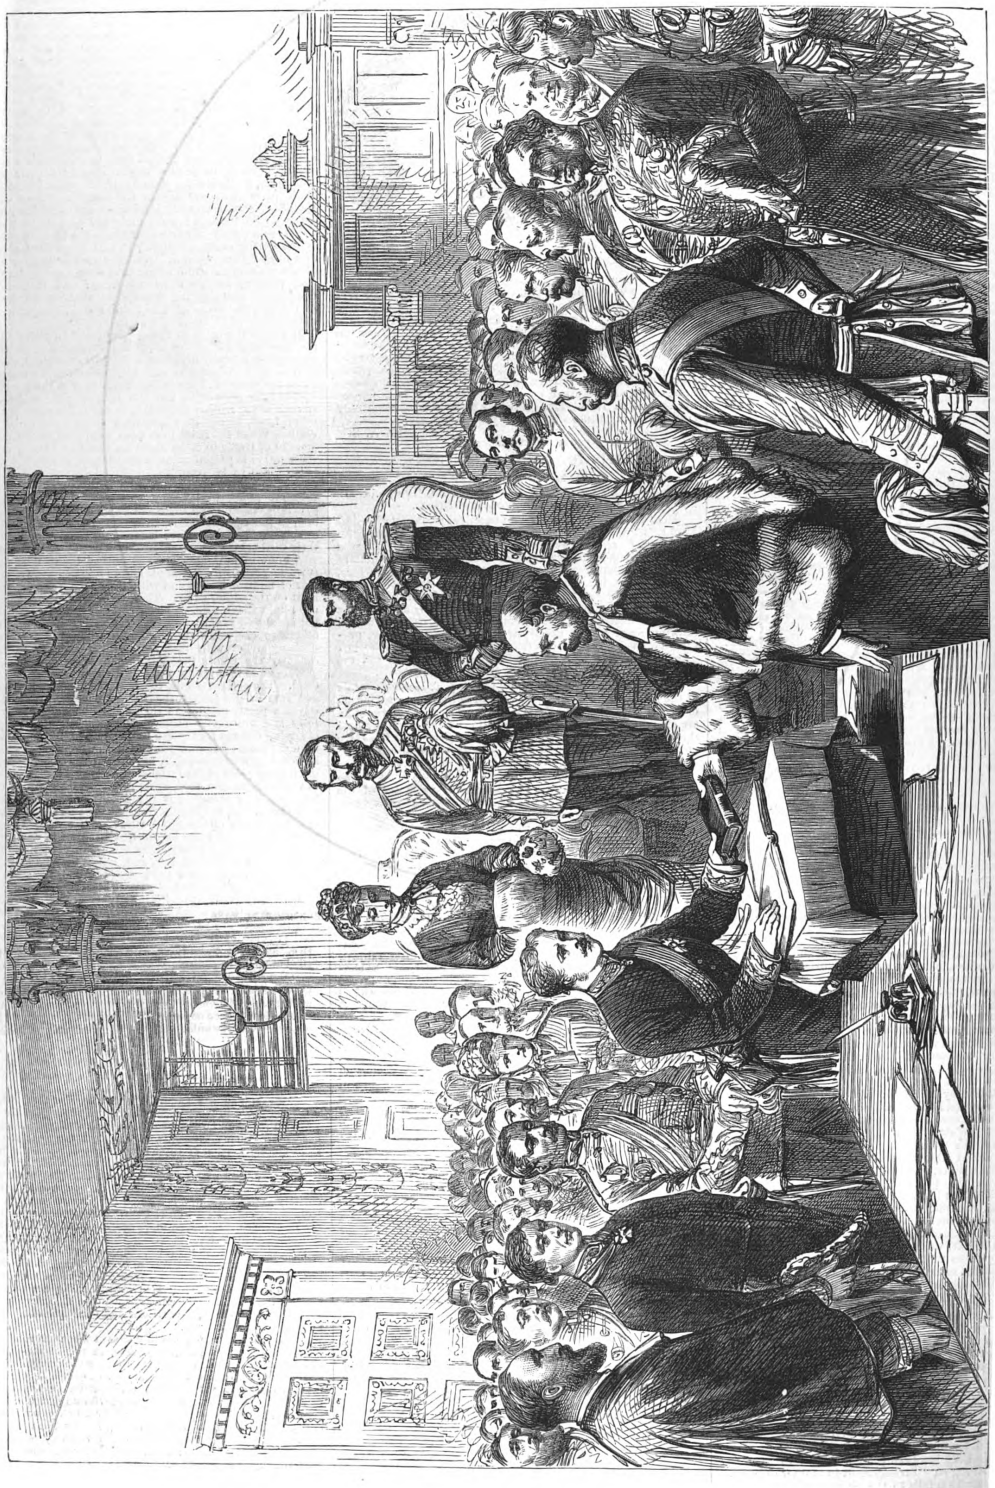
The approaching New Year is heralded by the timely publication of Messrs. Kelly and Co.'s "Post-Office London Directory," making now its eightieth annual entry into our populous metropolitan world of still increasing magnitude and variety of social conditions. The volume has continually grown in bulk, till at last we have exactly 2500 pages filled by its closely printed catalogue of streets and persons, without reckoning 400 pages of advertisements; and it has been found expedient to use new and smaller type for the "Commercial" portion of the Directory, with the old-faced figures, presenting a neat and perspicuous effect. The topographical area included in this Directory approaches in form that of an irregular rectangle, extending from the western boundaries of Kensington and Chelsea, to the eastern and south-eastern suburbs adjoining Bow, Cubitt Town, Greenwich, and Blackheath, a distance of nine miles and a half; and from Highbury and Holloway in the north, to Kennington, Walworth, and Deptford (inclusive) in South London, which is about six miles. The map given with this volume is folded in such a manner that any part of it can be referred to without unfolding the whole, which was formerly in danger of being torn. It is altogether most complete and convenient for its purpose, and has been made as correct as possible to the present date.

CANADA: "SURPRISE-PARTIES."

The bare mention of a Canadian winter is apt to induce many Englishmen to shrug their shoulders, as they picture to themselves vast tracts of eternal snow and wretched wights afflicted with blue noses and frozen ears, who can barely keep the flame of life alight, in spite of furs and huge log-fires. But, instead of forcing people to hibernate like snakes and bears, a Canadian winter is, of all the changing seasons of the year, the most enjoyable; for the dry, exhilarating air acts on the animal spirits in an inverse ratio to the falling of the mercury.

Roads nowhere less than four feet deep in snow, and the air filled with myriads of flaky crystals—sometimes coming down large and glittering, sailing hither and thither falteringly, their floating career to earth undisturbed by Boreas; but oftener hurled headlong in their course in one continuous blinding sheet of snow by rude blasts of the North Wind! A long series of such days, with the mercury never above zero, are believed by many Englishmen to constitute a Canadian winter. Now, in justice to the climate of our northern Dominion, it should be thoroughly understood that rarely is there more than one day in the seven a stormy one, that though very cold there is little wind, and that the prevailing aspect of the heavens is a sky unflecked by a single cloud.

There are days when, in addition to the thermometer registering an unpleasant proximity to zero, there are biting winds and blinding snowstorms. But these are few and far between. It is almost an unfailing axiom that when the mercury falls to zero there is neither snow nor wind; and it is this still, translucent state of the atmosphere that makes the winters of Canada, in spite of the intense cold, delightful in the extreme.



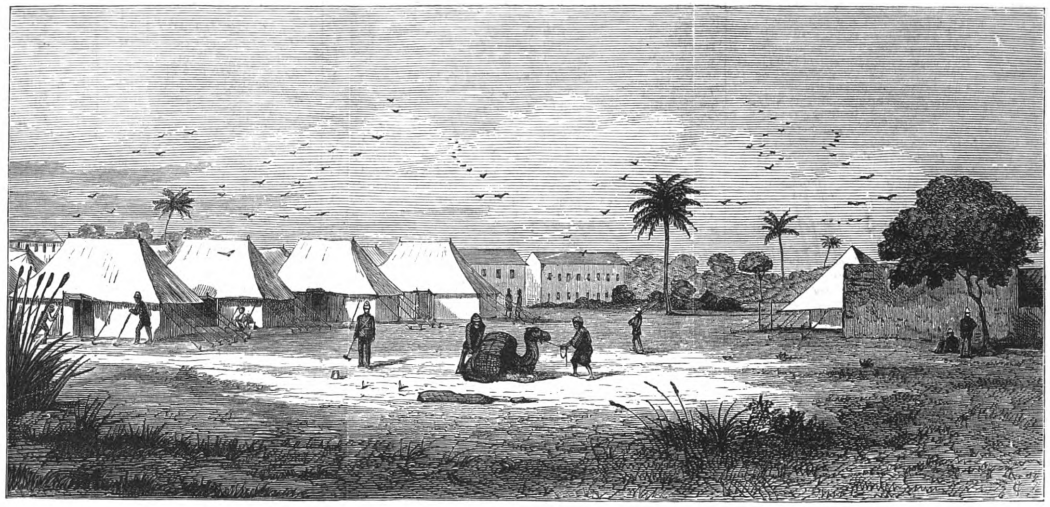
Many are the times in the depth of winter, when the roads are not only in perfect sleighing condition, but when the atmosphere is really delicious, with just enough dash of cold in it to raise one's spirits and energies to the highest point,—when the snow has been beaten down so that the horses throw up but little snow-dust, and the sleighs glide along a hard, smooth track, neither abounding in too much snow nor, on the other hand, laying bare here and there patches of mother earth. When the roads have been subjected to the necessary amount of traffic to make them in the above state, and when the weather is propitious, pleasure-sleighs, containing surprise-parties, are to be seen, in all directions, gliding gaily and merrily along the beaten tracks on their way to friends whom they are going to take by storm. In addition, a day is generally chosen when there will be moonlight for their return; and, in the case of farmers, the moon generally lights them away as well as home, for before they start they like to see their cattle and horses comfortably "fixed" for the night.

I know of nothing more enchanting than to be one of a surprise-party, on good roads and in good company, behind a pair of mettled horses, and with the moon casting her white light on the whiter snow. There is a wonderful charm in a moonlight sleigh-ride. The night luminary paints everything not enveloped in the snow with most vivid distinctness. The otherwise execrable zig-zag fences staud out, for once, in pleasing relief with their crystallised fretwork; and how saliently she paints the dark green pines and firs!—those genial giants that retain their dusky verdure when all else is dead. The gallant steeds, too, and the bright-coloured robes and furs in the jaunty sleighs and cutters, make of themselves a pretty picture as their swan-like outlines flit gracefully and noiselessly onwards. The moon lights up some charming objects for the eye to dwell upon, but none more so than those of the women and girls who, though ensconced in shawls and buffalo-robes, have the grace to show the more interesting parts of the facial contour; for there is a freshness in Canadian women that, apart from mere beauty, is characteristic. Very charming is the cadence of their voices, and very cheery, too, the chimes from the bells on the sleigh-shafts and the jingle of the small silver ones strung around the belted steeds. If these be spirited brutes the driver has to keep a tight rein, for they enjoy the evening just as much as their masters and mistresses, and, unless they be held in, are apt to break away into a good round gallop, the state of the roads rendering the effect of pulling scarcely perceptible.

On mild moonlight nights hundreds of pleasure-sleighs—one-horse cutters, sleighs-and-pairs, and here and there a four-in-hand—are to be seen gliding along the well-beaten tracks; some of them out merely for the enjoyment of the drive, the majority, however, with suspicious-looking hampers and baskets protruding from among the buffalo-robes and bear-skins, that suggest longer entertainment than an hour's outing. These sleighs, freighted with healthful, pretty faces and manly forms, such as few but British-sprung communities can produce, convey surprise-parties to many a wealthy citizen and humbler tradesman, and farmer and country-squire. British-sprung communities cling to the old names. Open-handed to all comers, whether friends or simply bowing acquaintances, Canadians, like all colonists, are eminently hospitable, unfettered as they are by old-country conventionalities.

The evenings are generally spent in dancing, which is much indulged in throughout the Dominion, especially in the Lower Province—Canadian women, rich and poor, being very graceful in their movements on the light fantastic toe. The more elderly portion of these surprise-parties pass the time at euchre, in discussing the political aspect of affairs, the prospects of the wheat crop, &c., according to their several proclivities. Euchre is analogous to our whist, which it entirely supersedes, and is a game the Canadians have learnt from their cute friends on the other side of the Lakes and the St. Lawrence: it is played more quickly than whist, each hand comprising only five cards. So general has it become throughout Canada and the States, that when anyone has been cheated, beaten in some bargain, or otherwise got the worst of anything, he is said to be euchred. It often happens that those to whom the surprise-parties are going are themselves on a similar errand elsewhere, in which case the merry sleighers waken up with the jingle of their bells the quietude of some neighbouring habitation.

Although times are generally chosen when the roads are in good condition, there are, of course, in out-of-the-way parts unbeaten tracks and snow-drifts to be got through, and then an excitement ensues that does not always end pleasantly, though upsets in the snow are not often serious, and are looked for, except in the cities, as inevitable periodical occurrences. The light compact horses rarely flinch at a snow-drift, but pluckily push their way through, now plunging up to their necks as they breast the white feathery waves, now emerging into a shallower path, snorting out the snow that has gathered about their nostrils, their flanks quivering from their exertions and glistening with the flaky crystals that soon dissolve on their warm glossy skins. If the snow be not too deep, and the tops of the snake-fences on each side of the road be visible, a driver with a steady hand and confidence in his horses will generally take his party through these unbeaten paths without a "spill;" but often the snow is too deep, or too crusted, or the fence-tops, by which he steers, completely hidden from view, and then a detour is his only choice.



THE MARQUIS OF LORNE BEING SWORN IN AS GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF CANADA.
FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

MAJOR-GENERAL F. S. ROBERTS, V.C., C.B., COMMANDING THE FORCES IN THE KHOORUM PASS.

The victory won in the Peiwar Pass on Monday week by this distinguished officer, in command of the British-Indian forces proceeding through the Khoorum Valley into Afghanistan, gives additional interest to our Engraving of his Portrait. General Roberts, though in the prime of life, has brought the experience of a twenty years' service in the Quartermaster-General's Department, of which he is the actual head, to bear on his new command. He has also served through many campaigns. At the siege of Delhi he earned the Victoria Cross for personal gallantry in sabring a standard-bearer and capturing his flag. The various operations connected with the relief of Lucknow and its subsequent siege and capture saw him acting as an Assistant Adjutant-General. For this campaign he received the brevet of Major, besides a medal and three clasps, and was frequently mentioned in despatches. At the Umbeyla Expedition in 1863 he was present, and was again mentioned. He served throughout the Abyssinian war as Quartermaster-General of the Bengal Brigade, and was given a Lieutenant-Colonelcy for his meritorious services. As senior Staff officer, he accompanied the Looshai Expedition of 1872, for which he was rewarded with the Companionship of the Bath.

CAMP OF 59TH REGIMENT AT MOOLTAN—RENDEZVOUS OF THE QUETTA FIELD FORCE.

NOVELS.

Extraordinary would be the best word to choose, if it were necessary to describe by a single epithet the story contained in the three volumes entitled The Return of the Native, by Thomas Hardy (Smith, Elder, and Co.); for, from the title to the conclusion, it is assuredly out of the ordinary. The characters are uncommon, the scenery is uncommon, the dialogue is uncommon, the incidents are uncommon, the style is uncommon, the diction is uncommon; and, though the descriptions are uncommonly good, the movement is uncommonly slow, the personages are uncommonly uninteresting, the action is uncommonly poor, the conclusion is uncommonly flat. One scene especially may be mentioned, in which both the power and the weakness of the author are exhibited together and most strikingly. It is a scene of gambling with dice. Two men, on "a stagnant, warm, and misty night," in the open air, with a flat stone, for lack of table, between them, and, with a lantern to give them light, recline upon the ground and "shake their elbows," until one of them has been "cleaned out," having lost a hundred spade guineas, which, by-the-way, were not his own. The loser has just shuffled off into the darkness, and the winner is just shutting the lantern and preparing to take his departure, when from behind a bush rises a "tall crimson form," which advances to the spot lately occupied by the loser of the spade guineas, sits down in the vacant place, and challenges the winner to continue the game. The red figure might pass for Mephistopheles; and the whole situation is worthy of the drama with which that character is most commonly associated. The pair begin to play by the light of the lantern; and, when that is put out by the rush of a death's-head moth, they gather a number of glowworms upon a leaf, and continue the game by the aid of those living lamps. Around the gamblers, from time to time, collect the wild heath-ponies, which gaze upon the spectacle with wondering eyes. The former winner is now the loser: Mephistopheles, as was to be expected, pockets the stakes. The whole scene is very original and very striking, and therein the author shows his peculiar power; but the description is cumbered with an excess of detail, and therein the author shows his peculiar weakness. His story resolves itself, for the most part, into an unconnected collection of studies, minute studies, both of character and of natural objects, with an intermixture of unnecessarily lengthened expositions connected with certain rustic superstitions and rustic customs. The studies are undoubtedly excellent, and, notwithstanding a curiously affected sort of language, are admirably placed before the reader; but, so far as the interest of the narrative is concerned, they have rather a wearying than a stimulating effect. Novel-readers, it may be safely asserted, think more of their own gratification, which depends upon the attractive qualities inherent in the story itself, than of the knowledge and talent exhibited by a writer in the treatment of what is merely subordinate and accessory; and an author who relies more upon the mere fringe of his story than upon his story itself for the exhibition of his powers, runs a risk of obtaining less popularity than is awarded to his inferiors in intellectual gifts and literary composition. People, in fact, will not read novels for the sake of the quaintness and the cleverness displayed in them; there must be some strong scent, whether of romance or of reality, to follow from the opening to the conclusion, and that scent must not be allowed to become so far lost that it can with difficulty be picked up again. The hero of the story is the Mephistopheles above mentioned. He is really a very good man, and is ultimately recompensed according to his deserts. He is a reddleman; and as it is probable that ninety-nine persons out of a hundred do not know what that means, they would do well to turn to the novel for information. They will find themselves very agreeably enlightened, both on that subject and on many other points, equally curious, concerning the habits, manners, customs, and vocations of residents in out-of-the-way country districts.

A dedication informs us that For Perceival, by Margaret Veley (Smith, Elder, and Co.), is a "first book;" and, so regarded, it may be pronounced a very creditable performance. It is free from all the most prominent faults characteristic of lady-novelists, or the majority of lady-novelists, at any rate, when they first rush into print with the intention of taking popularity by storm. They, as a general rule, adopt a sensational style, which almost necessitates the introduction of vicious, immoral, and criminal characters; and, from sheer ignorance and inexperience of anything but what is perfectly unobjectionable, and from a vague fear of not displaying a sufficiently intimate acquaintance with wickedness, they sometimes invent personages, actions, and scenes which for pruriency, shamelessness, and iniquity, surpass anything that would enter into the heart of a man to conceive, or that, if it did, he would dare to set down upon paper for the supposed gratification of the public. They, moreover, as a general rule, express their own and their creatures' sentiments and remarks in a sort of English which would hardly escape the censure of a strict grammarian. In the present instance no such characteristics are discernible; there is nothing sensational in the style, nothing amiss with the grammar. One might even go so far as to say that the style is a little tame, and that the language, though correct enough, is not handled with any remarkable effect, expressive, impressive, melodious, or other, whether in description, or in narrative, or in dialogue. Howbeit, the whole expanse of story is bespangled here and there throughout its length and breadth with sparkling little pieces of smartness, vivacity, archness, irony, and downright humour; there are many pretty situations and bits of life-like babble between gallant youth and lady gay, such as the softer is better calculated than the harder sex to appreciate; and, above all, the tone, though somewhat sordid, if there be anything sordid in a pervading spirit of Mammon, is in other respects unexceptionable. The book, indeed, might be placed by a judicious schoolmistress quite safely in the hands of schoolgirls and for schoolgirls, one would say, rather than for grown men and women, the story is calculated to have most attraction;—if only schoolgirls had leisure enough: for it must be acknowledged that the novel requires a great deal of reading. It is, indeed, overladen with unnecessary characters, unnecessary descriptions, unnecessary observations, unnecessary dialogue. Nor is that which is unnecessary enlivened or justified in every instance or in many instances by that which is entertaining or noteworthy. The plain truth is that the whole story might have been compressed with advantage into about a third of the space which it has been made by expansion to occupy. The main purpose of the tale appears to be the glorification of a high-minded young man, whose Christian name is Percival, and whose recommendations seem to consist chiefly in an olive complexion, well-cut features and clothes, hands either white or olive (according to the author's fancy or memory at a particular moment), and a certain nobility of moral character, exhibited principally in the form of a strict regard for truth and a sublime contempt for anything like deception. The worst of such superior beings is that they sometimes overdo it to such an extent that they are liable to be mistaken for prigs. And to that category many readers are likely to consign the immaculate Percival. However, he is vastly admired, though rather for his physical than for his moral qualities, in the story; and the alacrity with which pretty girl after pretty girl assumes her brightest smiles "for Percival" reminds one of the famous scene in which the devoted Highlanders, in one of Scott's novels, step forward to sacrifice themselves "for Hector." Percival, be it noted, has a brother, so like him and yet so unlike, that in a photograph or under certain conditions of light and shade it is difficult to distinguish one from the other. Hence the cardinal incident of the story, which ends with the beatification of Percival at a sacrifice greater, as many a reader will think, than was either necessary or becoming. It must be confessed, however, that any other solution of the difficult situation attained towards the close of affairs would probably have been less effective and less pathetic, though it might have met with more ready acquiescence.

THE MAGAZINES.

The most noticeable contribution to a scarcely average number of the Cornhill is another of Mr. Henry James's graceful and piquant social sketches. The point, as formerly, is the contrast, not harsh or unfriendly, between American and European manners and feelings, the parties on this occasion being two young Englishmen of rank on their travels in the Western States and the female members of an American family of position. The superior refinement of the latter in all essential respects is brought out with delicate skill and with no trace of exaggerated national feeling. Mr. Leslie Stephen's essay on Landor is a fair exposition of the causes which prevent average readers from enjoying this exceptional writer, all the more entitled to attention as this distaste is evidently shared by Mr. Stephen himself. His criticism is perfectly just as far as it goes; but, while evincing remarkable keenness of perception in the detection of Landor's weak points, indicates a no less marked incapacity to appreciate his strong ones, except the massiveness and dignity of his style. Nothing is said of the serene poetical wisdom which characterises him as a writer above almost all his contemporaries, and contrasts so strangely with his total want of self-control in actual life. "For Percival" attains a satisfactory conclusion. The only other paper of mark is an account of the three Burmese heroines, who form the standard theme of the national drama, a favourite amusement of the people. This pleasant sketch is from the pen of Mr. St. Barbe, of the Indian Civil Service.

Macmillan, though varied, is not very interesting. The most remarkable paper is Mr. E. B. Tylor's curious notice of the existence of backgammon among the Aztecs, another touch of nature making the world kin. "Haworth's" and "A Doubting Heart" both good, and there is a fine ring in the veteran Professor Blackie's lines descriptive of "My Walk." Mr. Crosskey's defence of the Birmingham "caucus" system is spirited enough, but takes no account of the inevitable degeneracy of all political associations in the second generation. Mr. Laing-Meason's sketch of our Indian army si instructive but dry; and Mr. Clarke's notes on Afghanistan are less interesting than we should have expected.

Blackwood has two contributions in its best manner in totally different styles. One, "The Cottage by the River," is an admirable specimen of the melodramatic tale—so telling, though so obviously artificial—which has so repeatedly given a distinctive character to the pages of this periodical. "The Fruit and Vintage of Herefordshire" is an equally excellent specimen of Blackwood's cheerful and withal scholarly manner, mellow and genial as the subject. The first of a series of papers on Journalism evinces good sense and good information. "French Home Life" concludes the present instalment with a striking picture of the impending extinction of the country gentry as a political power, due, the friendly writer frankly tells them, to their obstinate pride and folly.

Fraser again puts forth a poor number, where the good articles are mostly too heavy. "Public Works in Asiatic Turkey," and "Solvency and Revenues of India," however, though open to this charge, are well worth study. Among lighter papers we have chiefly to note the concluding ones of the two interesting series, "Holidays in Eastern France" and "Among the Burmese," and another of Vernon Lee's ever acceptable musical essays, the subject this time being the eccentric novelist and musician Hoffmann.

The most important contributions to the Contemporary Review are the communications from Germany and Russia, treating of "contemporary life and thought" in those countries. The picture of the political confusion in Germany is especially interesting, and is illustrated by a table showing the comparative loss and gain of Parliamentary parties within the last eight years. Mr. Shaw Lefevre writes an interesting history of the recovery of Epping Forest from encroachments, which could hardly have occurred in any country but this. Professor Monier Williams sketches the tenets of the various sects into which the Hindu worshippers of Vishnu are divided; and Mr. Sayce insists on the claims of the Phœnicians, rather than the Egyptians, to be regarded as the founders of Greek civilisation. In spite of Mr. Gladstone and Dr. Littledale, the Abbé Martin is still as unable as Protestants in general to discover "What hinders Ritualists from becoming Roman Catholics."

By far the most important contribution to the Nineteenth Century is Sir Henry Rawlinson's temperate and able statement of the causes which have produced the "Afghan Crisis." Another essay on Indian affairs, from the pen of Sir Erskine Perry, is more remarkable for good sense than novelty. Sir Erskine's warnings against hasty and premature interference with Indian ideas and customs, are entitled to much weight. In "Dogma, Reason, and Morality," the author of "The New Republic" to all appearance identifies himself with Roman Catholicism, although it would be hazardous to affirm that he may not have left himself a loophole yet. The matter, however, is hardly worth investigating. Mr. Newenham Houre draws a flattering sketch of the loftiness and spirituality of ancient Egyptian religion, with perhaps too implicit a reliance on the accuracy of the versions of hieroglyphical texts. Mr. Ralston brings the various forms assumed by the legend of "Beauty and the Beast" into one view; Mr. Ruskin concludes his "Colours of Pre-Raphaelitism" with a touching allusion to failing strength even more impressive than his usual eloquence; and Sir H. Tyler records in incisive language the hasty but probably not incorrect verdict of a practical man on South Africa, "physically, politically, and commercially a country of peculiarities and anomalies." Another contribution of high interest is Mr. Sclater's exposition of some of the as yet unsolved difficulties attaching to the theory of the formation of species by derivation and modification, to which he nevertheless continues to adhere.

The Fortnightly Review is less interesting than usual, although M. de Laveleye's review of Dr. Busch's reminiscences of Prince Bismarck will, no doubt, find many readers. The topic, however, is one on which every intelligent reader is as well qualified to form a judgment as M. de Laveleye; in fact, Prince Bismarck's character is so distinctly inscribed on the page of history that no collection of personal traits, however interesting in themselves, can do much to deepen the impression already current. Lord Carnarvon's address on Imperial administration is amiable and high-minded, rather than suggestive; and a reply to Mr. Hyndman's impeachment of Indian financial management, though containing valuable statistics, bears too much of a semi-official character. The only other paper of much interest is Mr. Wheeler's narrative of the late Russian campaign in Asia. The astounding failures of the earlier part, and the no less astonishing success of the latter, are ascribed solely to merits and demerits of the commanders who respectively directed the operations.

A brilliant campaign also forms the theme of the most interesting contribution to the Atlantic Monthly, where Major Crowninshield describes the operations by which General Sheridan expelled the Confederate troops from the Shenandoah Valley in the autumn of 1864. The number is, as usual, full of variety, as is Scribner's Monthly, where by far the most remarkable article treats of the singular prehistoric dwellings, excavated in the cliffs, recently discovered in the State of Colorado. The analogy to the Edomite remains at Petre is striking. It is remarkable that the dead appear to have been burned, instead of buried, as usual upon the American continent. "An Irish Heart" is a pretty story, and "Undergraduate Life at Oxford" is suggestive to English as well as American readers.

Belgravia and Temple Bar are particularly good this month. The latter loses an excellent serial by the conclusion of "The First Violin," the former gains what promises to prove one of equal mark in Mr. Francillon's new novel "One by One." The miscellaneous papers are excellent in both, especially "An Imperial Pardon," "Two Japanese Stories," and "Theatrical Makeshifts," in Belgravia. The most remarkable contribution to the Gentleman's Magazine is a series of unpublished letters containing some new particulars relating to Dr. Johnson. The University Magazine has an excellent portrait and fair biography of Mr. W. Spottiswoode, a good paper on Margaret Fuller, and an imaginative prose sketch entitled "Laelia."

We have also received Good Words, London Society, The Month, The Churchman's Monthly. Part 2 of Hayda's Dictionary of Dates, Part 2 of Josephus, Part 2 of Domestic Medicine, Part 1 of Cassell's History of India, Part 1 of International Portrait Gallery, Part 2 of Haydn's Bible Dictionary, Masonic Magazine, Pantiles Papers, Psychological Review, Popular Science Review, St. Nicholas, Part 9 of Our Native Land, No. 36 of Men of Mark, Part 7 of The Cheveley Novels—Samuel Weir, St. James's Magazine, Magazine of Art, Geographical Magazine, Lippincott's Magazine, St. Nicholas, Charing-cross Magazine, Mirth, Science for All, Science Gossip, Familiar Wild Flowers, Cassell's Family Magazine, Poet's Magazine, Church Sunday-School Magazine, Mission Life, Daisy, Golden Childhood, Christian Age, Myra's Journal of Dress and Fashion and Myra's Mid-Monthly Journal and Children's Dress, Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine, Sylvia's Home Journal, Milliner and Dressmaker; and monthly parts of All the Year Round, Once a Week, Weekly Welcome, Golden Hours, Day of Rest, Sunday at Home, Sunday Magazine, Leisure Hour, Garden, Gardeners' Chronicle, and Gardener's Magazine.

POCKET-BOOKS AND DIARIES.

The middle of December has brought its customary parcels of serviceable Pocket-Books, containing the next year's calendar of days, and of decorated cards for the prettiest little gifts of friendship or family affection at this season of anniversary remembrance. Messrs. Thomas De la Rue and Co. have not failed to produce the most convenient and beautiful portable Diaries for the ordinary use of ladies and gentlemen, in a variety of suitable forms; discarding henceforth the photograph of an astronomical subject which they were wont to put in as a frontispiece, but in all other points maintaining the known style of these exquisite pocket-books, whether bound in rich crimson velvet, with gilt clasps, in soft morocco leather of a delicate stone-colour, in substantial russia, for masculine service, or in the tablet shape, which is most handy for pencil-writing at any moment. A new contrivance, adapted for the waistcoat pocket, is that neatly condensed into a case only one inch wide, and three inches long, which Messrs. De la Rue call "Fingers;" it gives the complete almanack, but without space for memoranda.—The Desk Diary, edited by Mr. W. Godward, contains a large amount of statistical information.—Messrs. Letts, Son, and Co., of New-cross and King William-street, have as usual provided for all commercial men, for all lawyers, doctors, clergymen, private householders, and other classes, the most serviceable forms of diary and memorandum book, adapted to their respective needs of daily business.—The "Cosmopolitan Masonic Calendar, Diary, and Pocket-Book" for 1879 (published by George Kenning, 198, Fleet-street, is a comprehensive book of reference for the use of Brethren of the Mystic Tie.

CHRISTMAS AND NEW-YEAR'S DAY CARDS.

The Christmas Cards and those for New-Year's Day presentation, manufactured by Messrs. Marcus Ward and Co., of London, Belfast, and Philadelphia, have much artistic beauty of design. Those representing floral subjects are very true to nature, and the arrangements of colour, frequently relieved by a dark chocolate background, are extremely pleasing. Others display the figures of children, in quaint, old-fashioned costumes, drawn by Miss Kate Greenaway; of beasts and birds enacting some of Æsop's Fables, or behaving naturally in the "Farm and Forest;" with illustrations of "Past and Present," or "The Good Old Times," and many such pleasant themes. "Window Pictures" is a set of four landscape scenes, viewed from a window of stained glass panes, with different modifications of the prevailing hue. Mr. H. Rothe, of King-street, Covent-garden, as well as Messrs. T. De la Rue and Co., and other fancy stationers, must be commended for the ingenuity and good taste shown in productions of this kind. Mr. H. Rothe's "Four Seasons," mostly in sombre colours but relieved with gold, present graceful figures of a child, with one or two elder persons, of rather classical design. De la Rue's Cards, which are executed in chromolithography from original water-colour drawings, and upon richly-enamelled cardboard, with ornamentation of gold and colour, set before us an immense variety of subjects, treated in the best style of elegant grotesque delineation. Mr. Arthur Ackermann, of Regent-street, publishes a series of beautiful cards for Christmas and the New Year. There are six charming designs by Miss E. G. Thomson, and some in illuminated relief, Mr. Ackermann's own production; the others are manufactured by Messrs. Prang and Co., of Boston, United States.—Mr. Harding, of Piccadilly, supplies a very diverting series of antiquated costume figures, not coloured, examples of the fashions of attire "when George the Third was King."—A good assortment of Christmas and New-Year greeting cards is published by Mr. B. Sulman, of Milton-street, City.

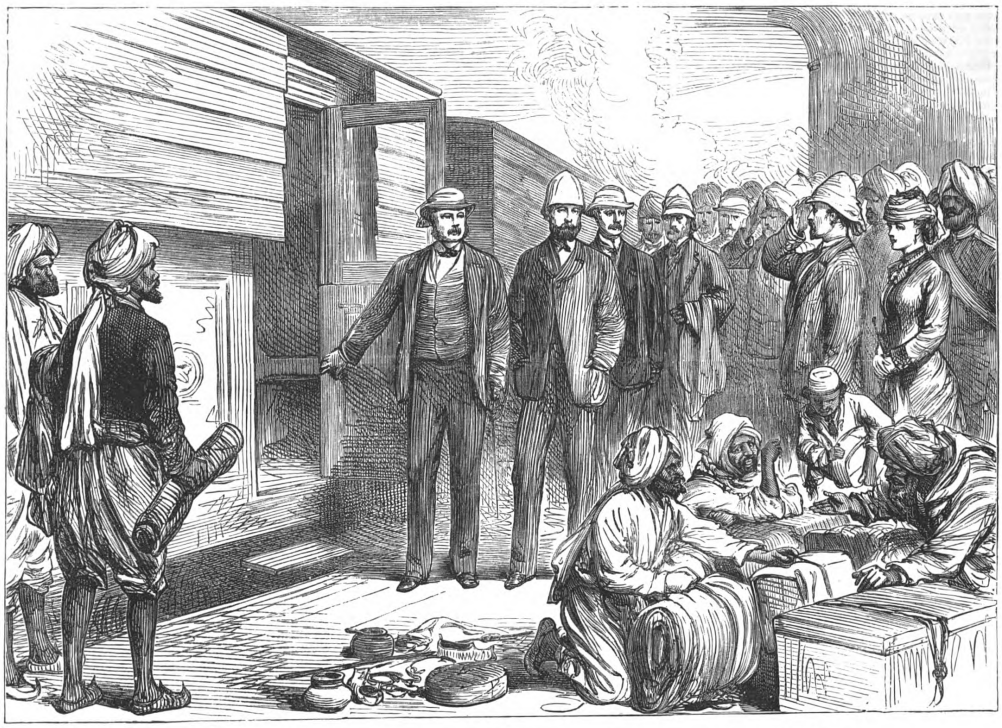
THE LATE MR. ALFRED WIGAN.

THE LATE MR. G. H. LEWES.



THE LATE MR. ALFRED WIGAN.

The most faultlessly natural actor of refined social comedy on the modern English stage retired from public view some years ago. We had last week to announce the death of Mr. Alfred Wigan, who was sixty-four, and whose first appearance was forty years since. Middle-aged playgoers in London, if they enjoy good taste, must cherish the recollection of those quiet scenes of domestic interest they used to see presented at the Olympic, from the winter of 1853 onward, when Mr. Alfred Wigan showed in perfection the manners of an unaffected and unpretending gentleman, French or English, without any of the bounce and strut which some other comedians have put on. We remember the first night of "Still Waters Run Deep," a dramatic piece of considerable force, adapted by Mr. Tom Taylor from the French story of "Le Beau-Fils," and in which "John Mildmay" was performed by this most intelligent actor with a truthful conception of the individual character as well as of the social type. It was the well-bred, self-controlled, upright, but cautious man of the world, an honest diplomatist of private life, checkmating roguery without the use of equivocal means. There were several other congenial parts which Mr. Alfred Wigan seemed to identify with his own personality, by the perfect consistency and, so to speak, the sincerity of his representation; these were characters of sterling worth and profitable examples of conduct. His more recent appearances in connection with the St. James's, the Queen's, and the Gaiety Theatres were mentioned in our obituary notice.

The Portrait is from a photograph by the London Stereoscopic Company.

THE LATE MR. G. H. LEWES.

This accomplished man of letters, whose death was announced last week, was in the sixty-second year of his age. He had shown his versatile genius in many different branches of authorship, as a novelist, dramatic poet, student of mental philosophy, biographer, critic, and physiologist, besides holding the editorship of the Leader and the Fortnightly Review. To him, perhaps, more aptly than to any other contemporary writer, may be applied the epitaph which is inscribed on Goldsmith's monument in Westminster Abbey—"Nullum feré scribendi genus non tetigit; nullum tetigit quod non ornavit." Yet we are inclined to think none of his works first-rate of their kind; and he has scarcely added to the stock of original and pregnant ideas, or given a decided impulse to the progress of thought. As a master of literary execution, and a discriminating scholar of the higher sciences, his performances have received their due share of public esteem. His future reputation will probably be akin to that of a leading French "Encyclopédiste;" or we might call him a masculine Harriet Martineau, free from her peculiar foibles of moral judgment.

The Portrait of Mr. Lewes is from a photograph by Messrs. Elliott and Fry, of Baker-street.

ART.

INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

As usual, the Winter Exhibition of this society consists of a larger proportion of more or less finished drawings than of "sketches and studies." Like the summer gathering, it manifests a steady growth in importance concurrently with the progress of its younger members and the accession of new ones. The institute may well be proud of the fact that two of its young members, Mr. Herkomer and Mr. C. Green, carried off prizes at the Paris Exhibition (the former one of the two grand prix d'honneur awarded to the British school), whilst only one medal was won by a member of the old society—Sir John Gilbert. The present display offers more novel interest than that in Pall-mall East; and nowhere, perhaps, can the tendencies of our younger school be better studied. The Institute owes much to the circumstance that several artists in its ranks bring to water colours a ripened experience gained in the wider range of oil painting. Larger modes of treatment prevail than in the Old Society, where the example of Frederick Walker and Alfred Hunt, and possibly the praise of extreme finish by Mr. Ruskin, have too much influence.

There was a time when Mr. Herkomer himself followed in the wake of the lamented young chief of the Old Society, but now he has at one bound broken through the bonds of all precedent, thrown off the harness of his own routine, and even passed the limits which might seem to have been fixed by the nature of water colour itself. We do not hesitate to say that the lifesize bust portrait here of a gentleman holding a skull, called "A Phrenologist" (273), though described as "unfinished," and obviously so as regards the hand and some minor details, is, for truth of modelling, power of colour, and vigour of execution, one of the most masterly drawings of our day. And little less remarkable are the head "studies" on the same scale of an elderly gentleman (145) and a lady (153). It will be interesting to artists and amateurs at a distance to know that (unlike Mr. Herkomer's former practice) in the painting of these heads—which rival the force of oil, while they retain the aerial brilliancy of fresco—"body-colour" is very sparingly if at all employed. The artist also sends a very grandiose design in illustration of the Niebelungen Lied—"Siegfried Capturing the Bear" (236), in which the brawny legendary hero is but an accessory to the mighty boles of giant oaks and pines in a primeval forest. We are hardly satisfied, however, that the conventional treatment is fully justified by or fully subserves the imaginative impressiveness sought to be conveyed; but of the elevated style and technical strength of the work there cannot be a doubt. Mr. E. G. Gregory approaches very near to Mr. Herkomer in two striking studies of male heads, about half lifesize (228 and 245). They are admirably drawn, thoroughly understood as regards light and shade, and extremely spirited in handling. A study of a lady seated at a casement (320), by the same artist, is almost illusive in lighting and beautiful in colour. Mr. W. Small, another vigorous painter, who has also discarded body-colour, is well represented in a drawing of a pretty but thoroughly rustic lass spreading clothes to dry (51), a replica of his oil picture in the Dudley Gallery, and which, if the foliage in the upper part equalled the lower half of the drawing, would leave nothing to desire. Mr. Walter Wilson sends a large drawing (104) of a scene in a picturesque seaside village with several figures, foremost among which is a sturdy fisher-girl casting looks that are "witching" and "baiting-hooks" (as we are informed by a motto which serves as title, though she is hardly a syren in face) on a young fellow who is hoisting to her shoulder a basket of mussels. This is broad in effect, and otherwise promising; but the warm tone of the sky so pervades the figures that they acquire a certain transparent insubstantiality. More solid, while equally characteristic and honest, is Mr. Clausen's "Fisher Folk in Church, Island of Urk, Zuydersee" (65). Of the Dutch master Israels there is a small but excellent example, though the subject is of the tritest—"Grace Before Meat" (307)—a fisherman and his aged mother seated at their lowly board in reverential attitude before the steaming bowl of potatoes that constitutes their humble midday meal. The rude and fumbling execution and sombre tone seem at once to give more pointed intensity to the exactly-hit expressions of pious thankfulness, and to deepen the pathos of the artist's constant theme of contentment with a hard lot. Yet we confess we begin to tire of this eternal harping upon mournful minor chords—this chosen métier of trading in sorrow. If no glimmer of hope or joy ever reaches those poor Scheveningen people, it is quite certain that the painter's funereal tones are artificial. In this very hut, with the sunlight visible through the window over the door, there should be much more light reflected and refracted about the room.

In landscape also this exhibition is rich in broad, free, manly work; and, curiously enough, the influence of David Cox is very perceptible here, though scarcely discernible in the society of which he was a member. Mr. Collier's bold and brilliant coast-scene, on "A June Morning" (71), in which one almost feels the bracing sea-breeze; the "Waste Land" (357), by Mr. Wimperis, where the expression or the generalising influence of wind by the oblique parallelism of the strokes is only too Cox-like; Mr. Syer's really noble drawing of "Anstey Cove, Torquay" (266), with its tumbling waves, and breeze on shore—quite free, by-the-way, from the conventionality of the middle period of the artist's practice in oil; Mr. Orrock's views on the Lincolnshire coast (see especially No. 187), in which, with steadily increasing success, he sets himself the difficult task of rendering the delicate gradations of receding distance on a level country under grey skies; Mr. Beavis's studies near Harwich (184) and "Hastings" (159), with their careful draughtsmanship and nicely discriminated tints and aerial perspective; Mr. Harry Johnson's "Skirts of Dartmoor" (146), showing the superiority of "study" direct "from nature" to studio elaboration; Mr. E. Hayes's drawings of a brig in a fresh breeze off "Newhaven Harbour" (293); and, still better, the "Dutch Boats becalmed off Amsterdam" (223), with its beautiful pale-golden, yet pearly, effect—like a cool Cuyp; and several architectural sketches by the veteran Louis Haghe—all whose more or less mastery of that last lesson in art—what to leave out. There is not so much a suppression as a subordination of detail to general effect, accompanied by greater surface elaboration, in the views of "Leith Hill from Reigate Common" (232) and "Ben Venue from the Trossachs" (240), by Mr. Leitch, specially noteworthy for a sense of the requirements of pictorial composition that is now rare in our school; and in several refined views on the downs and south coast, by Mr. H. G. Hine, which, as likewise in his congenial subject of "Moonlight" (60) on a quiet night, evince true sympathy with nature in her moods of tranquil sentiment. Other landscapes which, if not remarkable for breadth, are free from pettiness, and besides good examples of their respective painters, are Mr. Mogford's "Rainbow, Westmoreland" (88), Mr. E. Hargitt's "Arran Hills, from Cantyre" (111), Mr. Philp's "Off the Land's-End" (283), and "The Barley Mow" (274), by Mr. E. G. Warren—a considerable advance upon some recent works. Nor must we omit to mention "Heliopolis, as it was and as it is" (175), by Mr. William Simpson, the prince of cosmopolitan sketchers, who is now far on his way to the Afghanistan highlands as Special Pictorial Correspondent for this Journal; the series of sketches on the coast and inland by Mr. Harry Hine, a new member, which are executed in a similar key of quiet colouring to that of his father; and the studies of Elizabethan halls and manors, by Mr. J. Fulleylove (another new member), of which the best is the charming view of the court of "Tabley Old Hall" (204), with its gay parterres of flowers.

Returning to the figure works, we have to welcome, as a third new member, the distinguished Academician, Mr. P. F. Poole, who makes his début with "The Cave of Mammon, from Spenser's 'Faerie Queene'" (248)—a water-colour replica of his oil picture exhibited at Burlington House a few years back, and reproducing much of its weird imaginativeness. A recent accession of value and promise is Mr. E. Bale, whose drawing of a scene in the environs of Rome, with children presenting "An Easter Offering" (154), in the shape of a bunch of daisies, to an aged priest, is delightfully naïve and sweet in colour and feeling. Not less meritorious is the single figure (261) of a pretty damsel in white satin petticoat and creamy-rose silk sacque of the last century absorbed in an old letter. And Mr. Bale is not behindhand in dealing with character—witness, "A Woman of Amalfi" (267), an Oriental type of face which seems to recall the mediæval connection of the now half-submerged city with the East. There is always a certain unvulgar distinction in all that Mr. J. D. Linton does, although we may have to complain of black over-wrought shadows, as in this study of a young lady in white, relieved (like Mr. Bale's figure) against a whitish wall. We find more of the painter's characteristic latent richness of colouring in the study (314) for a picture of the magnates of a beleaguered town dispatching a mounted messenger and herald with a flag of truce. Unlike several of his brother members, Mr. C. Green continues to finish his drawings with the utmost precision and minuteness; indeed, under the sustained and exhausting labour of mechanical stippling so minute, the wonder is the artist's invention is not chilled, that he manages so well to co-ordinate character, colour, light and shade, and other essentials of a good picture. Of several small drawings here the most important is that of a lady and gentleman seated "Tête-à-Tête" (21), attired in the astounding fashion of the Regency. Similar in mode of execution, but with less perception of atmospheric influence (the faces being uniformly rather too yellow), is a cleverly composed drawing with many figures (197) by Mr. Townley Green, representing a company of seventeenth-century actors performing on a stage improvised in an inn-yard, with the audience below and in the surrounding galleries.

Having already exceeded our limits, we must be content to simply commend to the visitor the contributions of Messrs. E. M. Ward, H. B. Roberts, G. G. Kilburne, J. Absolon, J. Aumonier, W. L. Thomas, C. Werner, W. M. May, J. and E. H. Fahey, J. Hardy, W. Wild, and J. Tenniel, Miss Mary E. Gow, and Mrs. Duffield. But even these names do not represent all that remains of interest in an exhibition much above the average of former years.

CONTINENTAL GALLERY.

At this gallery, in the Haymarket, a "Winter Exhibition" is being held, which comprises examples of Clays, Muntne, Passini, Braith, Vibert, Trayer, Duverger, Bouguereau, Israels, Madrazo, Gussow, Roybet, Boldini, Gilardi, and the deceased masters Troyon, Daubigny, and Diaz. But, besides these painters (with whom the public has made acquaintance at the French and other galleries), two other artists of extraordinary power are represented who are unknown, or but little known, in London. One of these is M. Charlemont, a young French painter, who was medaillé for his first work exhibited in the Salon last year. His picture here represents a negro guarding the gate of a harem, and the characterisation of the ebony visage, the treatment of the white drapery, and the elaboration of the weapons and other details surpass, in everything but colour, the famous Moorish executioner of Henri Regnault. The other is the Spanish painter, Domingo, who in three pictures directly challenges Meissonier on his own ground as regards choice of subject, and scale; and, although the colouring is less rich, although he is not free from the Spanish tendency to blackness, he is equally searching and subtle, whilst the brio of the handling is even greater.

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The specialty of last week was the performance of "Oberon" on Saturday, after an interval of eight years.

Weber's final stage work, composed for Covent-Garden Theatre, and produced there in 1826, has received comparatively few performances, notwithstanding the charm and imaginative beauty of the music, and the poetic grace of the libretto supplied by Mr. Planché (the subject taken from Wieland's poem). In its original shape, it was rather a drama with music than an opera according to the proper significance of the term, the company engaged at the theatre at the time when Mr. Charles Kemble gave Weber the commission for the work having comprised but few vocalists, the chief having been Miss Paton, who represented Reiza, Mr. Braham, who was the Sir Huon, and Madame Vestris the Fatima. When the work was revived at her Majesty's Theatre in an Italian version (in 1860), the dramatic portion was revised by Mr. Planché, who has himself explained the necessity for excising a quantity of "dialogue written for the purpose of making parts for actors who could not sing, and supplying the deficiencies of singers who could not act." Recitatives were also added by Sir (then Mr.) Julius Benedict (Weber's pupil), who likewise introduced pieces from the composer's "Euryanthe," in order to strengthen the musical interest. The performances of "Oberon" in the year just named, and subsequently, included the special feature of the fine declamatory singing of Madame Titiens as Reiza, and, in the earlier instances, of Madame Alboni as Fatima, this lady having been afterwards efficiently replaced by Madame Trebelli. In spite, however, of the merits of the music and the performance, the opera was not often given, and, as already said, had been unheard for some years until Saturday last.

In the performance now commented on, the character of Reiza was filled by Madame Pappenheim, who sang with great effect in several instances, particularly in the great scena, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," in which the singer produced a special impression. In other instances, too, her declamation was highly meritorious, among them having been the duet with Sir Huon, in the second act (taken from "Euryanthe"). The music of Fatima was again assigned to Madame Trebelli, who, as on former occasions, sang with great charm of voice and style; both her songs—"A lonely Arab maid," and "Oh, Araby, dear Araby"—having been encored. Miss Purdy and Mdlle. Bauermeister were, respectively, efficient representatives of Puck and the Mermaid—the song of the latter was taken much too slowly. Signor Gillandi, as Sir Huon, sang under the disadvantage of a cold, which somewhat interfered with his delivery of the scena, "Oh! 'tis a glorious sight," in which, nevertheless, he produced a favourable impression, and was much applauded. As Oberon, Signor Carrion sang with care, but was somewhat overweighted with the scena in the third act (originally written for Sir Huon, but replaced by the other tenor scena expressly composed for Braham). Other parts were filled by Signor Mendioroz (Sherasmin), Signor Mancini (the Caliph), and Signor Roveri (Babekan). Signor Li Calsi conducted, as usual. "Oberon" was announced again for last Thursday evening and next Wednesday morning; the season terminating on the following Saturday evening.

The week's performances of English opera announced by Mr. S. Hayes began at Covent-Garden Theatre on Saturday last, the pieces given having been "Maritana" (the second and third acts) and "The Waterman." Madame Cave-Ashton was the principal lady vocalist in each, Mr. Sims Reeves having appeared as Tom Tug in the last-named piece. Each of his three songs was received with enthusiastic applause by a demonstrative audience. Out of respect to the memory of the late Mr. Frederick Gye, the theatre was closed on Monday, and for the following evening "The Beggars' Opera" was announced, with Mr. Reeves as Captain Macheath.

The first concert given by the South London Choral Association at St. James's Hall, yesterday (Friday) week, displayed the excellent singing of the choir to great advantage, especially in Ambroise Thomas's characteristic chorus, "The Tyrol," Wilbye's fine old madrigal, "Sweet honey-sucking bees," and Knyvett's glee, "The Bells of St. Michael's Tower," as rewritten by Sir R. P. Stewart; other pieces having been given with effect by the choristers. Vocal solos, mostly familiar to the public, were contributed by Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Maybrick, and Mr. Brinley Richards played a brilliant pianoforte piece with great success. Mr. L. C. Venables conducted ably.

The benefit and farewell performance of Madame Rose Hersee, previous to her departure for Australia, took place on Saturday last at the Alexandra Palace in "La Sonnambula."

The Saturday evening concerts at St. James's Hall are continuing their successful career, last week's programme having been of the same popular and varied kind as on the preceding occasions. Madame Montigny-Remaury contributed some brilliant pianoforte solos, and Mr. Reynolds played some effective pieces on the cornet.

Mr. John Boosey's London Ballad Concerts are maintaining their long-established reputation for the attractive and efficient nature of the performances.

The third concert of the eighth season of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society took place on Thursday evening, when the performance consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" ("Lobgesang") and Rossini's "Stabat Mater."

Favourable accounts are received of Miss Helen Hopekirk, a young lady of Edinburgh, who has just finished a two-years' course at the Leipsig Conservatorium of Music, and has been very successful in one of the Gewandhaus Concerts, where she played Chopin's Concerto in F minor, and the Larghetto from Henselt's concerto. She was recalled after each piece. Miss Hopekirk studied under Mr. Liechtenstein, of Edinburgh.

THEATRES.

On Monday the tragedy of "Hamlet" was performed at Drury Lane to give Mr. Bandmann an opportunity of appearing as the melancholy Prince. A numerous audience assembled, in recognition of his merits as an actor. Many German friends were present, as well as many admirers of the actor's talents, and the reception accorded to him throughout was satisfactory. He was frequently—rather too frequently—called before the curtain, and other demonstrations, usual on exceptional occasions, were liberally accorded. Mr. Bandmann has much improved since we last saw him in the character, and now pronounces English with considerable facility. Much of his previous violent action has been moderated, and the more subtle passages of the dialogue are given with a regard to precision which is a great improvement. Miss Wallis played Ophelia with considerable elegance, and distinguished herself especially in the fourth act, indicating the mental disturbance of the poor victim of the destiny provoked by the guilt of others, with artistic skill and much truth to nature. The general cast was not a great one; but sufficient merit was secured to render the performance safe throughout. The applause at its conclusion was demonstrative.

At the Vaudeville Mr. D. Mackay, acting manager and treasurer, took his benefit this morning, Mr. Byron's comedy of "Our Boys" being the attraction.

Mr. Arthur Sketchley gives his last reading of "Mrs. Brown," forming a portion of Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's entertainment at St. George's Hall, this (Saturday) afternoon. A "Musical Fairyanza," entitled "Enchantment," written by Arthur Law, will be produced at the Gallery next Monday evening. "A Tremendous Mystery" retains its place in the programme, and Mr. Corney Grain has a musical sketch in preparation for the Christmas holidays.

Mr. J. D. Allcroft, M.P., has promised £500 towards establishing a free library at Worcester.

Last month fifty-five vessels left the Liverpool port for foreign parts, having on board 3888 passengers. Of these 2078 were English, 32 Scotch, 353 Irish, 1191 foreigners, and 234 whose nationalities were not known. Eight ships went to British North America, conveying 386 emigrants.

There was a perceptible increase in the quantity of fresh meat landed at Liverpool last week when compared with recent periods, while the arrivals of live stock showed a considerable decrease. All the steamers conveying fresh meat came from New York, bringing 3415 quarters of beef, 1575 carcases of mutton, and 190 dead pigs. Ten barrels of turkeys also came from Canada. Four steamers arrived with live stock, the total being 647 cattle, 1009 sheep, and 30 pigs.

ART-BOOKS.

The Christmas publishing season brings forth, as usual, its new works on art and illustrated books. It is expedient to clear up arrears by reviewing some works of this class which have remained unnoticed on our table. Among those that have been longest on hand is A Brief History of the Painters of All Schools. By Louis Viardot and Other Writers. Illustrated (Sampson Low, Marston, and Co.). This "brief" history, forms a portly octavo volume of 467 pages of small type. The illustrations, engraved on wood, between forty and fifty in number, are generally well selected and well executed. They are for the most part derived from M. Charles Blanc's "Histoire des Peintres de toutes les Ecoles," but that does not militate against their usefulness; we could only have wished to have had more of them. The bulk of the work—the "Introductions to the Foreign Schools," and the criticisms on the works of the great masters—is from the rather high-flown but not indiscriminate text of M. Louis Viardot in "Les Merveilles de la Peinture." But as this portion of the present volume had already been published in England in divisions comprising the great schools, it need not be reviewed anew. Additional biographical details relating to the old masters are, however, supplied, together with short memoirs of many minor artists not mentioned by M. Viardot. There is also a section on the English School, and some information on the American painters from Tuckerman's "Book of the Artists." A work of the kind under notice, containing a compendious history of painting from its infancy in pre-historic and classic times down to the present day, with competent criticism of the leading schools and masters, has long been needed by the general reader; and that want is fairly supplied in this brief history, the editor and compiler of which has evidently read up for his part of the performance with diligence. There are, however, sundry errors and misconceptions regarding technicalities which render the work less eligible to place in the hands of the young student. For instance, the actual invention of the Van Eycks, i.e., an oleo-resinous vehicle, is clearly not understood, as may be seen by reference to Sir Charles Eastlake's "Material for a History of Oil Painting." The medium of the old tempera painters is wrongly described to have consisted of the white, instead of (usually and principally) the yolk, of egg; and much uncertainty may be caused by confounding the process of tempera with common distemper. Still more extraordinary is it to find fresco spoken of as synonymous with distemper. After mentioning Leonardo da Vinci's "Last Supper" as a fresco, we are informed that "it is thought" he "did not paint this wonderful composition in fresco—that is to say, in distemper, on and in a damp wall, but in oil." Here, besides the technical blunder, there is an historical mis-statement, for it is perfectly well known from internal evidence, if there were not written historical evidence to prove, that Leonardo painted his great work in oil. Some of the memoirs are curiously meagre. What (for a single example) shall we say of a notice of Giotto that contains no mention of his works in the Arena Chapel, Padua, and speaks of his "series of pictures called the 'Life and Death of San Francesco d'Assissi,'" not as existing par excellence at Assissi, but "dispersed over the whole of Italy?" With all our reverence for Giotto, we can but smile, also, when we are told that "he carried draperies to a perfection which remains unsurpassed." We have not been at the pains to ascertain how many of these and numerous similar errors, or if any of them, are chargeable to M. Viardot. But it was, probably, a wise discretion on the part of the French writer to omit from the enumeration of Guido's works the reputed portrait of Beatrice Cenci in the Barberini Palace, Rome. Strange to say, however, an illustration of the picture is given, though there is no reference to it in the text. We feel called upon, therefore, to remark that the picture cannot have been painted by Guido, for it has been ascertained that he was away from Rome at the time of the Cenci's execution. The story of his having caught a glimpse of the pitiful face as she turned her head on the way to the scaffold consequently falls to the ground. The reader is doubtless familiar with the portrait to which we refer—that of a young girl in white turban and scarf, with her head thrown back and aside over her shoulder. At every turn in Rome one sees reproductions in all forms of the contorted head, till one fancies one has a "crick" in the neck; at every hotel one hears the flock of English and Americans in ecstacies over its imaginary pathos and beauty. As for the Cenci herself, documentary evidence has lately been discovered and published in Italy proving that she was far from being the spotless, girlish heroine of popular tradition and Shelley's drama. Instead of sixteen, she was six-and-twenty at the time of her execution. Her will made provision for a daughter. Never perhaps in the history of art has a picture been invested with so much adventitious and suppositious interest as the portrait which forms the one great attraction of the small Barberini collection. How it came to be accepted as a work of Guido is a mystery, for it has little resemblance to any one of his three manners. Had it not been viewed through a halo of romance it would, if noticed at all, have been regarded merely as the rather common-place production of an unknown third-rate painter, just redeemed from inanity by a touch of deprecatory expression.

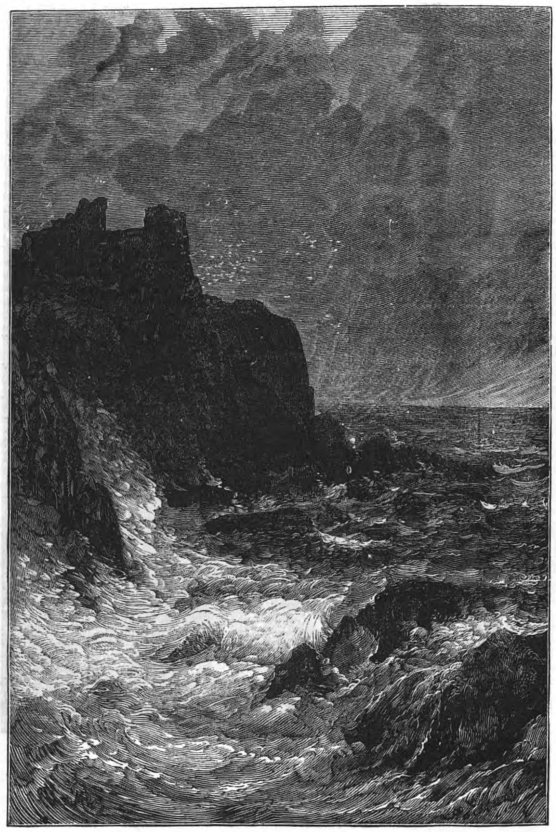
A translation, under Mrs. Bury Palliser's editorship, of Albert Jacquemart's standard "Histoire du Mobilier," which Messrs. Chapman and Hall have published under the only available but scarcely equivalent English title, A History of Furniture, with all the exceedingly admirable illustrations on wood of the original edition, over 160 in number by the author's son, M. Jules Jacquemart, the eminent engraver and etcher, comes at an opportune moment, now that we are beginning to apply true principles of taste to the decoration of our home interiors, and a passion for "bibelots" of all kinds is spreading so rapidly amongst almost all classes. Nor shall we appreciate this book less highly when we remember that both the learned author and the accomplished English editor are now no more. "The History of Furniture" fills—and very satisfactorily fills—a positive vacuum in our art-literature. The word "furniture," though it may upon occasion be made very elastic, scarcely explains the wide scope of this work. The French "mobilier" is more comprehensive, including, as it does, movables of all descriptions—"everything," in the words of our author, "that is movable, transportable, and easy to place in security." Yet even this definition will scarcely suggest the immense variety of objects described, classified, and treated of historically and critically by M. Jacquemart. Not only have we furniture in the strict sense of the word, or ornamental goods and chattels of all dates and styles, but we also have tapestries, embroidery, hangings of various tissues, stamped leather and painted papers, objects derived from sculptural art, including marbles, bronzes, ivories, wood carvings, terra-cottas, &c., and miscellaneous objects of ornamental art, such as clocks and ornamental bronzes, arms, and works in the baser metals, goldsmith's work, jewellery, snuff-boxes, gems, enamels, glass, ceramics, lacquer, wrought leather, &c. The most incomplete part of the present work is that relating to ceramics; but this deficiency is more than supplied by the author's "Histoire de la Porcelaine," "Les Merveilles de la Céramique," and, above all, by his "Histoire de la Céramique." And the same field is well occupied by Marryatt and other English writers. M. Albert Jacquemart was probably the most careful annotator of sale-catalogues of our time, and the fruits of this practice will be found in the lists of artists and art-workmen in the several departments. M. Jacquemart was not, however, a mere compiler. He turned the experience of his long life to account by dealing scientifically with principles and styles; and his critical observations are always deserving of respectful consideration. We must not put down this book without expressing our warmest admiration for the illustrations by M. Jules Jacquemart—himself, like his father, a distinguished collector. It is really astonishing with what directness and certainty this artist seizes on the essential character of each object, and renders it with unhesitating vigour or the utmost delicacy, as may be required; and not only is the draughtsmanship of the forms faultless, but the very diversified textures and the effects of light thereon are caught with wonderfully suggestive fidelity.

It is pleasant to turn, if a little wearied with the mass of rather dry facts in the last-named volume, to the lively Causeries sur l'Art et la Curiosité, of the well-known art-savant and collector, M. Edmond Bonnaffé, published by A. Quantin, Paris. A kind of Chauvinism characteristic of our not too modest neighbours, lends additional piquancy to these gossipping yet curiously learned strictures on art and art-industry in ancient, mediæval, and modern times; on the position, past and present, of the artist and art-workman—or of the latter simply, as M. Bonnaffé will have it, for of old the artist was merged in the artificer—and on the delights and perils, the utility and dignity, of the collector's mission. It is charming to read with what ingenious naiveté our author attempts to show how little the French Rénaissance owed to the Italian; and, on the contrary, how much the Italians are indebted to the French—as in the building of Milan Cathedral! We English are a little "perfide," as usual: M. Bonnaffé is too polite to say so much, but that is the inference. For the French have "le génie inventif;" they start an invention, but leave it for a caprice, a new fashion, a revolution; when straightway the English hasten to gather and appropriate it; they leave nothing to chance; they adopt it, they raise it, they cause it to grow tranquilly, silently, and when the work is achieved to the applause of the world, the French are all astonished at not having known how to do as much. "On l'a dit depuis longtemps, le Français invente, l'Anglais perfectionne. Du Sommerard invente le Musée des Arts Décoratifs, et l'Angleterre fondé Kensington." Several of the chapters, particularly that on "Le Commerce de la Curiosité," contain a large number of interesting facts relating to collectors, from classic and mediæval writers.

A pleasing novelty and originality of subject and style will probably recommend, to many of this season's book-buyers, the attractive volume called Child-Life in Japan. It is a collection of Japanese child-stories, by Mrs. M. Chaplin-Ayrton (publishers, Messrs. Griffith and Farran). Its external covering, black with scarlet and gold symbolic ornamentation, promises something quaintly characteristic, of which its diverting pages yield us plenty, the queerest drawings and the most fanciful humorous or pathetic tales. There are seven full-page engravings by Japanese artists, and some thirty smaller pictures, which are often very droll. The book is dedicated to a little English girl, born in Japan, who is called "Ojosama" by her affectionate nurse, and who was lately sent from that country to a grandmother in England. It is a good idea that these Japanese nursery stories should serve to keep alive in the child's heart the tender memories of her earliest infancy. Mrs. Chaplin-Ayrton has a loving sympathy with children all over the world, and a lively sense of whatever is most likely to please them. She has, moreover, a genuine talent for narrative, and for the accompanying graphic delineation. The graceful-grotesque, which is a delightful combination of qualities in literature and in art, seems to be her peculiar domain. We do not know where to find more charming samples of this piquant mixture, than in the pleasant new book she has put before us. Looking at any one of the pictures it contains, we see no ugliness, but a wild and wayward oddity, in the figures, attitudes, and grouping. There is a general defiance of perspective, and everything is off its balance, as in the pictures that sometimes arise to the mind while dreaming. But such is the proper elementary condition, as we take it, of true burlesque art. Nowhere is a hideous or repulsive form presented to view; the lines are those of grace, but they make a whimsical caricature of the subjects represented. We might refer to certain artistic packs of playing-cards for an instance of what is here meant to be commended, where the funny King and Queen and Knave of each suit are really pretty figures, but preposterous as human portraits. The Japanese stories, which Mrs. Chaplin-Ayrton has partly invented and partly collected, with some assistance from Mr. Basil Chamberlain as translator, are decidedly interesting. They are preceded by an engaging account of the favourite sports and pastimes of Japanese juvenility, illustrated by the seven page engravings. These represent the "Kangura," in which we see two children, one with a terrific boar's head mask trying to frighten the other; a brisk snow-balling combat; a couple of young musicians, with drum and fife; others spinning their tops, playing with puppy-dogs, walking on stilts, and fondling the least sensitive of pets, a tortoise, like that English child to whom Sydney Smith once said, "You might as well pat the dome of St. Paul's, to please the Dean and Chapter." These examples are followed by a description of the print-shop where pictures are to be bought for a scrap-book; a dialogue between little Yoshsan and his sister Kika (which name signifies a chrysanthemum) upon the festive enjoyments of O'Shogwat, or New-Year's Day; the same little boy's happy visit to the Chrysanthemum Show, under the care of a kind grandmamma; and the series of native Japanese legends. We like that of the two babes who were left by their parents in a junk at the river's bank, and how they fared when the vessel drifted out to sea; and the more wonderful story of Fish-save, a child so named because he was safely carried by a fish from the shore of China, where his deserted mother had cast him, on the waves, to the abode of his father in Japan. The virtues of filial piety and family duty are specially commended by the patient heroism of a boy, who thawed the winter ice with the heat of his prostrate naked body, that he might catch fish for the dinner of his unkind stepmother; by the exemplary conduct of the girls of Echigo, and the "Parsley Queen," and the two daughters of Okada, who exposed themselves to be shot for storks by an infatuated sire, in order to cure him of his sinful practice of killing harmless creatures. The story of Uranai is a convincing proof of the marvellous gift of "second sight," which has been an article of popular traditional belief in many other countries. An essay, by Professor Griffis, on the various kinds of games played by the Japanese, completes this interesting book, which is a most acceptable contribution to our better acquaintance with that clever and amiable nation of the Far East. We may be permitted to add one word concerning Mrs. Chaplin-Ayrton personally, as her diplomas and degrees of professional education appear on the titlepage. She is a lady whose husband some years ago was appointed by the Japanese Government to superintend the scientific studies of electricity and the construction and working of telegraphs at the Mikado's capital, where she has been residing with him. But she has also pursued, both at Edinburgh and in Paris, the most complete course of instruction in surgery and medicine that is open to female students in Europe; and we believe that her practice among both Japanese and European ladies has been attended with good success. Her lectures, in the Japanese language, to a class of native young women, were very well attended; and she gained much influence amongst them.

THE TRAINING-SHIP SHAFTESBURY.

The School Board for London has added to the other training-ships on the Thames, of which there are now seven, this one stationed at Grays, on the Essex shore, near the Exmouth, the training-ship of the Metropolitan Asylum Board. The Shaftesbury was the steam-ship Nubia, purchased by the School Board from the Peninsular and Oriental Company for £7500. Having been fitted up, she began to receive boys, under the Industrial Schools Act, on Sept. 8 last, since which date seventy-five boys have been entered. Her decks and cabins have an air of roominess and a height not to be found in any other training-ship. She is about 3000 tons burden, length over all 330 ft., beam 39 ft., and a march of eight times round her upper deck is about a mile. On this deck a large quantity of water is kept, which is pumped up every day from the larger quantity kept in tanks in the hold. Fifty tons are thus raised to a level, from which supplies are drawn all over the the ship for cooking, cleansing, or extinguishing fire in case of need. On this deck, also, inclosed in an iron house, are the "Alpha" gas machines. The ship is beautifully and economically lighted by gas made from gasoline. Gas pipes are laid all over the ship; the keys of the main are kept under lock, and everything is so well under control that in less than a minute every drop of oil is started overboard. The captain's quarters are on the school or main deck; adjoining these are the board-room, rooms and lavatories for the committee, office, and library. The schoolroom, 80 ft. long and 8½ ft. high, is well lighted by twenty-two fine windows of a single pane each. It is airy and well ventilated. In the centre of the deck, upon a platform slightly raised, stand a piano and harmonium, so that music and singing are not forgotten. Next to the school-room are two class rooms, 30 ft. by 15 ft., which can be thrown into one by tricing up the partitions on bulkheads. Then comes the tailor's shop, where the boys are clothed, and taught to mend their own clothes. The lavatory is a large room, well lighted, warmed, and ventilated. The boys have a bath every morning in a small galvanised iron bath, and then a plunge into a large one, 16 ft. by 12 ft., and 5 ft. deep. This can be warmed in winter by hot water. The mess or lower deck comprises, aft, the officers' mess-room and cabins, and the mess-deck for boys, 110 ft. long, fitted up with tables and stools, mess kettles, and other utensils. There are fourteen boys in each mess, and, when the ship is full, as many as four hundred boys can sit down to meals at once. On the fore part of this deck are more officers' cabins, carpenter's shop, band instrument room, and the cooking galley or ship's kitchen. Here the arrangements are very complete, with a cool larder and store-room for bread. The sleeping or orlop deck is 200 ft. long, with officers' cabins at each end. Here three hundred boys can sleep; but iron bedsteads, not hammocks, are used; these are constructed of galvanised gas piping, and are very cheap. It is intended that fifty of the elder boys shall sleep in hammocks on another deck. The supervision of the boys is excellent, three officers keep watch in turn every night, and lights are burning all night under lock and key, so that they cannot be tampered with. The ventilation is ample. The capacious hold of the ship is divided by four watertight bulkheads. In the after compartment are the stern moorings, three store-rooms, water-tanks, store and provision rooms again. In the next compartment are the band-room, drying-rooms, boiler-room, in which the boiler heats the water for warming the ship by a series of three-inch pipes fixed round each deck; and coal-hold, in which are stowed eighty tons of coal and coke—a year's supply. In the third compartment is another series of water-tanks; and in the foremost compartment are the bow moorings. For stability, the hold is covered with about 700 tons of concrete, which gives it a clean and wholesome appearance. For extinguishing fire, besides the taps all over the ship and fire exterminators, there are three powerful Downton pumps. The Shaftesbury carries twelve boats, and there is a tender attached to her in the shape of the barque Swift, a useful little vessel of 150 tons, in which during the summer months the boys take a weekly sail to the Nore and back, and thus learn in a practical way the art of navigation. The Board have secured a field of six acres close by, so that an infirmary can be erected and a swimming-bath constructed. In this field the boys are also drilled, and it is used as a playground. The Shaftesbury, with her tender, has been fitted up in a most efficient and economical manner, and much is due to the experience and practical knowledge of Mr. Thomas Scrutton, the chairman of the Industrial Schools Committee. The superintendent of this training-ship is Captain William Scriven, late R.N., who was selected by the committee out of fifty candidates for this important position. He has a liberal staff of twenty-four officers, including schoolmasters and seamen-instructors.

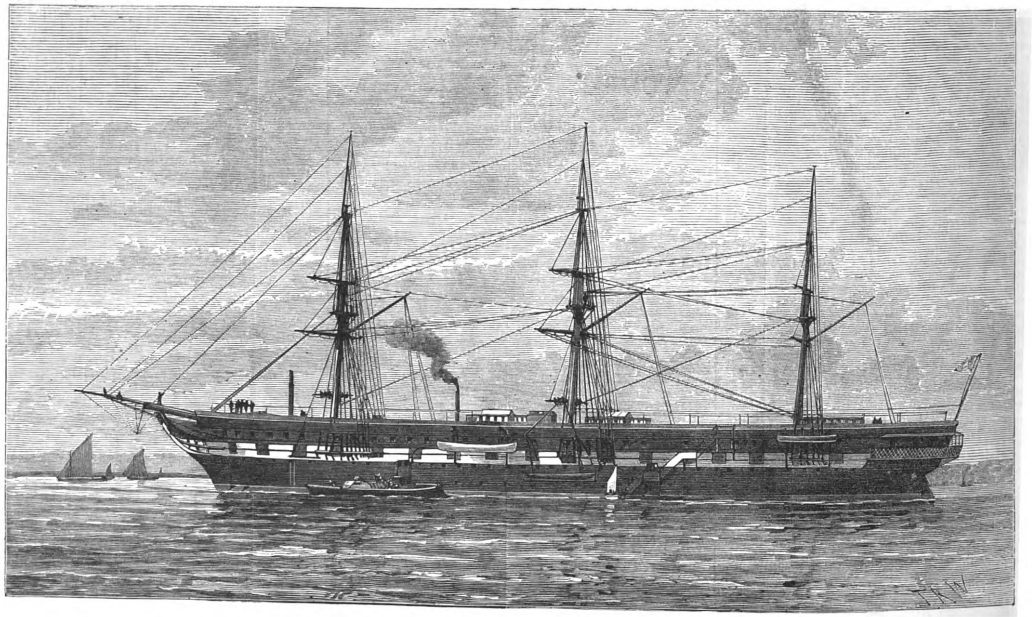


A meeting of the Royal Geographical Society was held on Monday evening, at which the president, Lord Dufferin, took the chair for the first time since his return from Canada. Papers on the Swedish and Dutch Arctic Expeditions were read by Mr. Clements Markham; and Sir Leopold McClintock, Captain Feilden, Admiral Hammond, and Sir Allen Young took part in the discussion which ensued.

The Bishop of Rochester presided on the 16th inst. at the distribution of prizes at St. Saviour's Grammar School, Southwark. The report of the examiners was satisfactory. The proceedings were varied by the presentation of a testimonial to the second master, Mr. W. H. Ruston, and by the announcement that the Bishop had conferred an honorary canonry in Rochester Cathedral on the Head Master, the Rev. E. Boger.

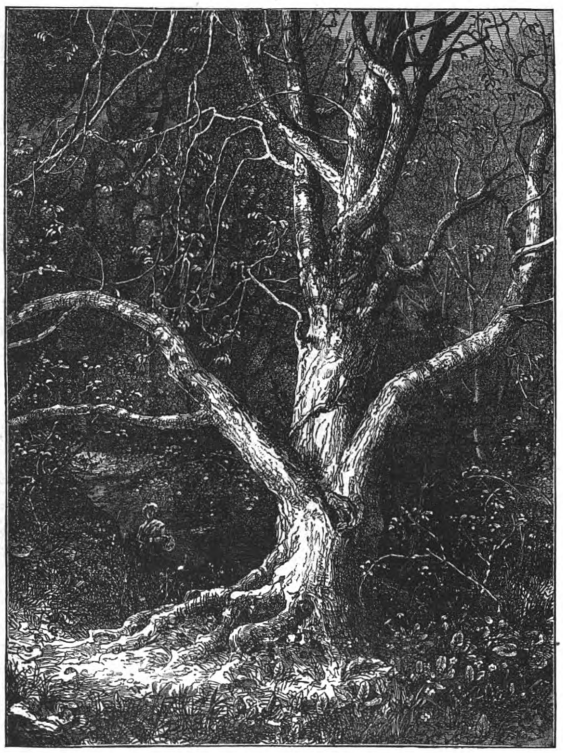
The Duke of Northumberland, president of the Royal National Life-Boat Institution at its house, John-street, Adelphi, on the 5th inst., when the services performed by the life-boats of the institution during the month of November were reported, and rewards amounting to £550 were ordered to be paid to life-boat crews. Various sums were also granted to the crews of shore-boats for saving life from wrecks on our coasts. Payments to the amount of £2400 were made on life-boat establishments. The receipt of various contributions and legacies was announced. New life-boats were ordered to be placed at four different stations. Reports were read from the four inspectors of life-boats of the institution on recent visits to the coasts.

"CALEDONIA," AND "OUR VILLAGE."



Among the new books of mingled artistic and literary attractiveness, proffered to this year's Christmas purchaser, Mr. Nimmo of Edinburgh has published a volume entitled "Caledonia," which contains selections from the descriptive poetry of Sir Walter Scott, Robert Burns, and Allan Ramsay, with Illustrations drawn by Mr. John MacWhirter, and engraved on wood by Mr. R. Paterson. They present thirty-five notable scenes of landscape sublimity and beauty, including several views of nobly-seated towns, castles, and sacred edifices, in that glorious North British "land of brown heath and shaggy wood, land of the mountain and the flood," which is the pride and delight of this United Kingdom, and of our common British nationality. For we have no idea, here as Englishmen, of allowing the Scotchmen to have Scotland all to themselves, since the fond and enthusiastic admiration of true lovers of Nature, in her most romantic aspects, has claimed and won for us an equal inheritance of patriotic attachment to the wildly varied scenery and heart-stirring associations of local history or legendary adventure, which greet the tourist at every day's journey from Tweedside to the Pentland Firth. In the present time, less than in the past, could we afford to spare this portion of our national patrimony of cherished interest in places inalienably rendered our own by the earliest studies and entertainments of youthful imagination, and probably visited in after years with the familiarity of home rambles, not as the intrusive traveller in foreign lands. As Mr. Goldwin Smith truly remarks, in his recent essay on "The Greatness of England," we feel that in this age, more than ever, "the Scottish Highlands, the mountains of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and of Wales, Devonshire, and Cornwall, are the asylum of natural beauty, of poetry, and of hearts that seek repose from the din and turmoil of commercial life." Enough has been said to justify our ready appreciation of the subjects presented in "Caledonia;" and the extracts from Burns and Scott, if not those from Ramsay, will have been often perused before, with a still renewed and strengthened perception of their vivid truthfulness, by the majority of cultivated readers. The engravings, one of which is borrowed by permission for the adornment of our own page, are finely designed and executed; but this is sufficiently attested by the example here produced, with no other commentary needful than what the poet has supplied:—

TANTALLON CASTLE, FROM "CALEDONIA," ILLUSTRATED.



I said, Tantallon's dizzy steep
Hung o'er the margin of the deep.
Many a rude tower and rampart there
Repelled the insult of the air,
Which, when the tempest vexed the sky,
Half breeze, half spray, came whistling by.
Above the booming ocean lent
The far-projecting battlement;
The billows burst, in ceaseless flow,
Upon the precipice below.
The steepy rock, and frantic tide
Approach of human step denied;
And thus these lines, and ramparts rude,
Were left in deepest solitude.

It was above half a century ago that Mary Russell Mitford, from her pleasant rural cottage near Reading, charmed a great many readers with the engaging sketches of English country life, collectively known as "Our Village." The charm has not yet lost any of its potency, nor is it likely to abate "while yet a nook remains, where English mind and manners can be found;" while the grass is green in our meadows, the spring flowers appear in yearly blossom, on the hedge-rows in every sequestered lane, and the merry song of thrush or blackbird is loud in every copse or cluster of leafy elms. These sights and sounds of rural England, with the familiar habits and ordinary manner of life among the common folk of agricultural districts—their ways of thinking and speaking, their fixed social degrees and kindly mutual relations, with the old-fashioned proverbial fidelity of their attachments to place and persons—were formerly considered an abiding pledge of modest happiness, to be enjoyed in peaceful retirement from the bustle of towns. One used to look forward then to the opportunity of making for oneself, possibly, a home in the country, after some thirty or forty years of competitive jangling and huckstering in mercantile or professional business, or of servitude in a public or private office. Everybody has grown wiser now, it is to be supposed; and few or none can be any longer deluded with the imaginary contents of unpretending rusticity in this age of universal Mammon-worship; yet we may still return, with a sigh of gentle regret, to the contemplation of tranquil and simple ways of living, and to the scenes and characters of "Our Village," which delighted us in early youth, before we had seen the world. A beautiful volume, just published by Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington, among the illustrated books of this season, is filled with select descriptive passages from Miss Mitford's ever bright and acceptable series of mixed writings upon this congenial theme. They are accompanied by a great number and variety of fine wood engravings, some of full-page size, but the majority of them vignettes inserted in the text, or head-pieces or tail-pieces of the chapters, which have been drawn mostly by two artists, Mr. C. O. Murray and Mr. W. H. J. Boot, the former generally taking the figure-subjects, the latter doing the bits of landscapes or trees and flowers. The engraver is Mr. James D. Cooper; and the quality of this work may be seen in a good example which we are permitted to set before our own readers, being an Illustration of the admiring remark, "How boldly that superb ash-tree, with its fine silver bark, rises from the bank!" The season, we are told, is that of the latter part of April, but "sad wintry weather, with a north-east wind, and a sun that puts out one's eyes without affording the slightest warmth." Notwithstanding this austerity of the backward spring-time, Miss Mitford, like a cheerful, healthy-minded, sensible woman as she was, set out that morning, with her favourite Italian greyhound, Mayflower, for a walk to the neighbouring coppice, where she noticed the beauty of this noble ash; and here comes Mr. Boot, the artist of the present Illustration, who follows in her steps, a long while afterwards, to the same identical woodland corner; and his pencil, as we see, has been very skilfully employed to finish the picture that was traced by a line from her pen, at least fifty-five years ago. The original edition of "Our Village" bears the date of 1824. We are glad to have this one, enriched and adorned with such an abundance of beautiful engravings.

THE TAPESTRY EXHIBITION AT WINDSOR.

The art of weaving tapestry, which in mediæval times was more important than painting itself, and which, since the Renaissance, has been among all the arts only second to painting through the productions of Arras (whence the name long given to tapestry) and Brussels, Gobelins, and Beauvais, and several Italian towns, has for a long time past not thriven in England. It took root for a while in Warwickshire in the days of Cardinal Wolsey; at Mortlake under the Stuarts, and subsequently in Ireland, and at Soho; but it never continued to flourish; and in the recent great revival of all the arts of interior and household embellishment in this country it has been the last to receive attention. The Tapestry Manufactory which was founded at Windsor about two years back, under Royal patronage, and which has been ably directed by Mr. H. Henry, bids fair, however, to remove this reproach, judging from the excellence of its products now forming the principal attraction of an exhibition in the Town-hall of the Royal borough. The chief specimens here displayed are those which were recently on view at the Paris Exhibition. The collection includes eight large panels representing scenes from the "Merry Wives of Windsor," the designs being by Mr. T. W. Hay. They formed the dining-room decoration in the Prince of Wales's pavilion at Paris, and received a gold medal. They are the property of Sir A. Sassoon, K.C.S.I., by whom they have been lent for the present exhibition. There is also a series of panels of tapestry representing hunting scenes, designed by Mr. E. M. Ward, R.A., for Mr. Christopher Sykes, M.P., and a number of smaller productions. Among the other specimens is a large panel representing the Siege of Londonderry. It was formerly a panel in the old Irish House of Lords, afterwards the Bank of Ireland, at Dublin. It has just been restored at Old Windsor. It is said to have been the work originally of Huguenot refugees. The exhibition includes a series of eight panels in appliqué work on gold ground, part of the decoration of the morning-room in the Prince of Wales's pavilion. This was executed by the Ladies' Work Society, of which Princess Louise is the president. There are also a number of valuable pictures.

Dr. Schliemann has resumed his excavations at Mount Hissarlik, in search for the buried Troy, with characteristic energy: but his labours are now suspended till spring, on account of the severity of the winters in the district. The fresh excavations are made on the site of the King's house, as the learned doctor calls the large mansion to the north-west and west of the great gate, and principally among the wood ashes, ten feet deep, the remains, as he believes, of the burnt Troy—the third downwards of the four pre-historic cities which he also concludes have occupied the site. On clearing the débris from the great gate it was found that there had been three gates; and east of these a number of house walls have been brought to light. As usual, these seldom exceed six feet in height, and must, as the doctor thinks, have formed substructures to lofty wooden buildings, which would account for the mass of wood ashes. The walls of the King's house, which are at a depth of 26 or 28 feet below the surface of the hill, are "precisely like the cyclopean walls of the Royal Palace at Mycenæ and the cyclopean house at Tyrins. The objects last discovered are generally similar to those lent to the South Kensington Museum, including splendid ladies' hairpins, a bracelet, beads, silver rings, and other ornaments, a distaff of wood, and a piece of lustrous green Egyptian porcelain. Dr. Schliemann considers, however, that by far the most interesting object he has ever found at Troy is a dagger of steel four inches long. Homer speaks of iron as rare and valuable; how much more so must it not have been, asks the doctor, centuries before the poet's time? The first iron used was probably meteoric, and Dr. Birch, of the British Museum, says this is confirmed by the ancient Egyptian name for that metal. Dr. Schliemann is astonished at, and cannot account for, the "billions" of shells of cockles and mussels found in all the strata of the pre-historic débris. The fish are found no more on the shores of the Hellespont or Ægean, though, doubtless, they were once plentiful. But it has been suggested that the shell-fish were of the kinds which yield dyes, such as the dye which rendered Tyre so famous. Another suggestion is that the shells may have been collected for the purpose of being burnt to make lime. Our Number for Nov. 30 contained an Engraving of Africans burning shells for lime.

MR. GYE.

Mr. Frederick Gye (whose death, from a gun accident, was recorded last week) was in his sixty-ninth year, and had been nearly thirty years director of the Royal Italian Opera, the performances at which, under his able and liberal administration, had assumed an importance, and a scenic and stage splendour, hitherto unapproached. Under his management many of the greatest operatic works were produced, and many of the most eminent singers brought forward, among these having been Mesdames Bosio, Adelina Patti, Lucca, and Albani. It was also at the Royal Italian Opera-House (Covent Garden Theatre) that Grisi and Mario obtained some of their greatest triumphs. The late Mr Gye was not only a skilful operatic administrator, but was also an intelligent and amiable gentleman, and was respected and esteemed alike in his business transactions and social relations. The management of the Royal Italian Opera will be carried on by his sons.

The deaths have also been announced of—

3. P takes Q P	Q takes P
4. Kt to Q B 3rd	Q to Q sq	If 17, Kt to K 5th, White can take it with the Pawn; and if 17, Kt to Q 4th, then 18. B to K 5th is a good reply.

Black's opening is not very promising. His third move is inferior to P to K 5th, which leads to at least an even game; and here he should have played the Q to K 3rd.

5. Kt to B 3rd	B to Q Kt 5th	18. B to K 5th	P to Kt 4th

It would have been wiser to have retreated the B to Kt 3rd.

CHESS INTELLIGENCE.

A match between the Belsize and South Hampstead Chess Clubs was played last week and resulted in a rather hollow victory for the former. The South Hampstead Club has been established very recently, and it may be assumed that, with a larger experience of match play, the members will render a better account of themselves than is shown by a score of one game out of a possible ten.

On Saturday last the Wednesbury Chess Club engaged in a match with the Church of England Association of Stourbridge. There were eleven players on each side, and in all thirty-one games were played at the sitting, of which Stourbridge scored sixteen and Wednesbury fifteen.

Mr. W. T. Pierce, the well-known composer of problems, now contributes a weekly chess article to the Brighton Herald.

The Leeds Corporation will now buy the manorial rights of Hunslet Moor, the voting of the ratepayers having resulted in favour of that course.

A new asylum, built at Dareth, under the direction of the Metropolitan Asylums' Board, was opened last Saturday for the reception of 500 imbecile children. At the same time the foundation-stone of an asylum for adult imbeciles was laid by Dr. Brewer, the chairman of the board.

The formal registration of the deaths through the wreck of the Princess Alice took place last Saturday, under the direction of the Registrar-General. The known aggregate loss, as nearly as has been ascertained, is 600 persons. It is believed that eighty bodies are still missing.

A meeting of the finance committee in connection with the Mansion House Fund for the holding in London next year of a great Agricultural Exhibition was held in the Venetian Parlour on Monday afternoon. The Lord Mayor presided. The fund amounts to £7700, of which £4438 has been received. Of this amount £4000 has been already voted in prizes.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated June 26, 1873) of the Right Hon. Sir Lionel William John Manners, Earl of Dysart, late of Buckminster, Leicestershire, who died on Sept. 23 last at No. 34, Norfolk-street, Strand, was proved on the 6th inst. by the Hon. Frederick James Tollemache and the Hon. Algernon Gray Tollemache, the brothers, and the Right Hon. Charles Douglas Richard, Baron Sudeley, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £1,700,000. The testator devises all his real estate to his executors for twenty-one years upon trust to receive the rents and apply them at their absolute discretion in discharge of the debts of his late son, Lord Huntingtower, and for the support and benefit of all his said son's children, whether legitimate or reputed, and for other persons who may be interested under the entail therein created; and, subject thereto, the testator devises all his said estates to the use of his grandson, the Hon. William John Manners, commonly called Lord Huntingtower, for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively, according to their respective seniorities in tail male; the testator's copyhold and leasehold estates are given in the same manner. The furniture and effects at Buckminster and Ham House, Petersham, are to be enjoyed by the person entitled to the possession of the said mansions. To his niece and daughter-in-law Catharine, Lady Huntingtower, he bequeaths £1500 per annum for life, or until she shall marry again; to his granddaughters, the Hon. Agnes Mary Manners Tollemache and the Hon. Agatha Manners Tollemache, £200,000 each; to his said brothers, Frederick James Tollemache and Algernon Gray Tollemache, £200,000 upon trust, to divide the same at their discretion amongst certain branches of his family; to his executors such sum as will yield a clear annual income of £500, to be distributed by them for the benefit of such deserving persons, whether formerly in his service or not, or for any charitable object, as they may see fit; to his executors, for their trouble, £10,000 each; to his son Alfred Manners, £10,000; to his servants William Pick and Caroline Pick legacies of £250 each, and annuities of £104 each for life. The residue of the personalty is to be laid out in the purchase of freehold property, to be held upon the same uses as those declared of his real estate.

The will (dated Feb. 17, 1877) of Sir Frederick Martin Williams, Bart., M.P., late of Goonorea, near Truro, Cornwall, who died on Sept. 3 last, at Wrafton, near Barnstaple, was proved in London, on the 7th ult., by Dame Mary Christian Williams, the widow, the sole executrix, the personal estate being sworn under £160,000. The testator gives, devises, and bequeaths all his real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever to his wife, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, absolutely.

The will (dated Aug. 8, 1871) of Mr. Frederick Nathaniel Micklethwait, late of No. 3, Chapel-street, Grosvenor-square, and of Faversham Hall, Norfolk, who died on Oct. 18 last, was proved on the 19th ult. by Felix Pryor and William Blackman Young, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £70,000. The testator leaves legacies to his brothers and sisters, executors, servants, and others, and the residue of the personalty to his sister, Mrs. Maria Diana Charlotte Drake. All his real estate he gives to his brother, Sotherton Nathaniel Micklethwait.

The will (dated Sept. 21, 1878) of Mrs. Steuart Amelia Dunsmure, late of Pittville-crescent-road, South Norwood Park, who died on Oct. 19 last, was proved on the 20th ult. by James Boursiquot Tennent, the sole executor, the personal estate being sworn under £30,000. The testatrix leaves £50 to the National Hospital for the Paralysed and Epileptic, Queen's-square, Bloomsbury; special bequests to her three grandsons, and numerous other legacies. The residue of her property she gives to her daughter, Mrs. Tennent.

The will (dated May 29, 1876) of Mr. Charles Gordon, late of Wiscombe Park, Southleigh, Devon, who died on June 18 last, has been proved at the Exeter district registry by Richard Marker, the acting executor, the personal estate being sworn under £14,000. The testator bequeaths such sum, not exceeding £400, as, with the balance of certain moneys left by his sister, will suffice for the efficient restoration of Southleigh church.

The Manchester Guardian is informed that the late Mr. Frederick Thomas Mothersill, of Woodside, Bowden, who was a partner in the firm of Messrs. William Mothersill and Co., Pall-mall, has bequeathed £22,000 to local institutions.

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.
JAMES EPPS AND CO., HOMŒOPATHIC CHEMISTS.

THE "Civil Service Gazette" says:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly-nourished frame."

THE "Naval and Military Gazette" says:—"The nutritive qualities of cocoa over either those of tea or coffee are now so generally acknowledged that the steady increase shown by official statistics in its consumption during recent years ceases to be a matter of surprise. One of the first firms to popularise this now indispensable adjunct to our breakfast-table was Messrs. Epps and Co., whose name, since 1830, has been so continuously before the public, and whose Homœopathic Cocoa is as familiar in our homes as the proverbial 'household words.' Those whose business it has been to watch at Messrs. Epps's works the elaborate and complex processes, and to note the care and labour bestowed before the crude cocoa bean is considered ready for consumption, cannot but admit that the popularity Messrs. Epps's productions have secured is fully deserved. The vastness of these works may be imagined when it is stated that four millions of pounds of prepared cocoa alone are prepared there yearly. The reputation gained, now many years since, for Mr. James Epps's preparation, both for its purity and its value as a dietetic, has been more than maintained. A constant increasing demand fully testifies to this—which must be as gratifying to Messrs. Epps as it is certainly flattering to the good faith they have kept with the public to secure so gratifying a result."

"All the Year Round" says:—"Having now disposed of fancy chocolate, let us stroll to the Euston-road, hard by the Regent's Park, to Epps's cocoa manufactory, where may be studied the making of cocoa on a stupendous scale, giving a just idea of the value of these articles, not as luxuries, but as actual food."

THE "Court Journal" says:—"In a climate so varying and trying as our own, to maintain sound and uniform health, our daily diet cannot be too carefully and attentively studied. Advancing science and recent discoveries have within the last few years been instrumental in adding several most valuable additions to our comparatively short list of dietetic foods. Foremost among these should be ranged cocoa, which, although known here several centuries previously, only came into general use within the last forty years. One of the first to popularise this now indispensable adjunct to our table was Mr. James Epps, whose 'Prepared Cocoa' has gained such just repute for its excellent and nutritious character. Prepared originally on homœopathic principles, in a subtle and convenient form, and easy of digestion, it met a public demand, speedily became popular, until now Messrs. Epps produce over four millions of pounds of their cocoa a year, and their manufactory is the largest of its kind in this country."

"Cassell's Household Guide" says:—"We will now give an account of the process adopted by Messrs. James Epps and Co., manufacturers of dietetic articles at their works in the Euston-road, London."

THE "Morning Advertiser" says:—"In the middle of the seventeenth century an announcement appeared in one of the few journals of the period, to the effect that 'out of Blanquette-street, at a Frenchman's house, is an excellent West India drink, called chocolate, to be sold at reasonable rates.' This is the first record we have of the introduction of cocoa into England. For a time it flourished as a fashionable drink, and then, like all fashions, subsided. Nearly two centuries after, in 1832, the duties, which had been almost prohibitive, were greatly reduced, and one of the first to take advantage of re-establishing the popularity of cocoa was Messrs. James Epps and Co., the Homœopathic Chemists. Under the name of 'Prepared Cocoa' they introduced a soluble and convenient preparation, which required no boiling, and was palatable and highly nutritious. It met a public want, speedily became popular, and year by year has increased in demand, till the consumption now exceeds four millions of pounds yearly."

THE "Christian World" says:—"'If I am to take cocoa,' said I, 'I must know what it is made of: I must therefore examine the process: I must dive into the mystery of its manufacture; I must see and judge for myself of the ingredients of which it is composed. With myself what are the ingredients of which it is composed. With myself what are the ingredients of which it is composed. With myself what are

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1878.

The Country is in mourning—The Country mourns. How great a difference there may be between the two states—the outward and the inward—need not be pointed out. There is no difference in the present instance. The "trappings of woe" correspond but too closely with the sorrow of the heart. Princess Alice of Great Britain and Ireland, the Grand Duchess of Hesse-Darmstadt, the second daughter of Queen Victoria, has been removed from the present life by the terrible malady which had, a few days before, carried off her youngest daughter and which had put in sore peril the lives of her husband and the rest of her children. The lamentable event occurred on the anniversary of her father's death, seventeen years ago. It brings with it touching reminiscences which will now be closely associated with the memory of her life. How she nursed the Prince Consort in his mortal illness, how the tenderness and self-sacrificing devotion of her love smoothed his passage from this world to the next, how she upheld her Royal Mother under the fresh burden of her widowhood, how ten years afterwards she nursed her brother the Prince of Wales, and was happily rewarded by the restoration of his health, we all know. And now she has herself fallen a victim to the very virtues which commended her to our hearts. There is a pathos in the incident mentioned by Lord Beaconsfield in the House of Lords on Tuesday last which is simply irresistible. "The physicians," he said, "who permitted her to watch over her suffering family enjoined her under no circumstances whatever to be tempted into an embrace. Her admirable self-restraint guarded her through the crisis of this terrible complaint in safety. She remembered and observed the injunctions of her physicians. But it became her lot to break to her son, quite a youth, the death of his youngest sister, to whom he was devotedly attached. The boy was so overcome with misery that the agitated mother clasped him in her arms, and thus received the kiss of death." Her illness was watched with painful anxiety, not in her adopted country only, but in that of her early home. Medical science, however, was unable to stay the progress of her disease. The conflict is over. Death has gathered into his arms all that was mortal of the Royal Princess, and the Court and the people of this country share between them the sorrow which arises from the irreparable loss occasioned by her decease.

Yet not a loss only, or wholly, nor a gloom entirely unrelieved. The dark cloud has its "silver lining." Even what we see on this side of the grave, distressful as it is to many, grievous to all, is yet spanned by a bow of promise. The life of Princess Alice is even now far from having worked out its beautiful results. It was a life of blessing to all who came within its sphere, and of potent influence for good to those who were outside of it. Her exalted position was but the accident which displayed it more vividly and more widely than would otherwise have been the case. Its genuine lustre was in itself. It would have been charming anywhere, in any rank, in association with any circumstances, but it was rendered more conspicuous in that it was lifted up on high. We need not speak in a depreciating tone of the external grandeur—albeit grandeur in simplicity—the centre of which she so exquisitely adorned. They who were nearest to her either by the ties of relationship or by the privilege of personal intercourse, speak admiringly of her intellectual culture, her solid judgment, her brilliant vivacity. We can believe them. But that which most attracts and fixes the regard of most men was the tender and ever outflowing sympathy which she had for all kinds of human suffering. An ornament to her Court, a bright and sparkling gem in her family, diffusing gladness wherever she vouchsafed her presence, she was always ready, in the alleviation of sorrow, to take the post demanding the greatest self-denial and to meet the troubles from which she might have been excused had she shrunk from them. "So good, so kind, so clever," says the Prince of Wales, in a letter written on the day of her death—words of simple testimony to her worth which find an echo in the bosom of every subject of the realm. She was a feminine exposition of the spirit of "Albert the Good," and her death brings back to us in full flush the grateful remembrances we have of his life.

The blow, as might have been expected, has been a heavy one for the Queen. The day on which it occurred necessarily reopened the deep wound made upon her domestic happiness, never perhaps to be completely healed, by the death of the Prince Consort. Her people rejoice in the assurance that her Majesty's usual health has not shown any indications of giving way under the stroke. They are thankful that she had an opportunity, as late ago as last autumn, of seeing and exchanging embraces with her beloved daughter. They are fully sensible that it is out of their power to offer her such consolation as will reach to the depth of her affliction. They are willing to bear her grief, if that were possible; but, that not being so, they are anxious to share it. They well know that they owe much to her, but they know not how much. They looked on with admiring and even affectionate sympathy whilst she was engaged in training her children for the high positions which they occupy. They cannot see her in domestic trouble without yearning to give her such solace as their unanimous participation in her grief may help to afford. The light which the life of Princess Alice casts forward, as a glorious example upon their several households, beams also in its reflex radiance upon the family life and maternal influences of their beloved Sovereign. They owe to her an untold sum of thankfulness, and they cannot allow her daughter to pass away from earth without becoming increasingly sensible of the debt of obligation under which the mother in her child has laid them. With more fervency than ever they will now repeat the refrain of the National Anthem, "God Save the Queen."

The lesson of the late Princess's life is as noble as it is obvious. Moral worth is a far more felicitous distinction than high position. It is well when both are combined, as in her case; but the first claims our reverential homage even when quite apart from the last. The women of society are not the only persons who may profit from what they have been called within the last week to witness. Love is the surest parent of love. To be lovely is the best forerunner of lovely action. Influence, honour, and unfailing satisfaction are to be acquired, not so much by the triumphs of ambition as by the quiet discharge of daily duties, and by the unostentatious but continuous outflow of a loving heart. In this respect to give is to receive, to bless is to be blessed, and, in the words of Holy Writ, to lose life is to find it.

The annual report of the Postmaster-General, with the usual mixture of instruction and amusement, has been issued.

Mr. E. J. Stone, her Majesty's Astronomer at the Cape of Good Hope, has been appointed by the Radcliffe Trustees Radcliffe Observer at Oxford, in succession to the Rev. R. Main.

The Queen has directed letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal granting the dignity of a Baronet of the United Kingdom to the Right Hon. Sir Andrew Buchanan, G.C.B., of Dunburgh, in the county of Stirling.

The Home Secretary, acting on medical advice, has ordered the release of Dr. Baxter-Langley from prison four months before the termination of the term of eighteen months' imprisonment, to which he was sentenced in 1877.

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have awarded the medal for long service and good conduct to the following men:—Martin M'Mahon, commissioned boatman of her Majesty's Coastguard; J. G. Marshant, chief carpenter's mate; and William Eckersley, chief engine-room artificer, of her Majesty's ship Thistle.

A meeting of the Privy Council was held on the 12th inst. in the Council Chamber, Dublin Castle, when the Lord Chancellor and the Vice-Chancellor were sworn Lords Justices for the government of Ireland during the absence of the Duke of Marlborough.—The Lord Lieutenant has appointed the Right Hon. Hugh Tarpey, Lord Mayor, as High Sheriff of the city of Dublin for the ensuing year.

THE COURT.

The Queen, with the members of the Royal family, received with feelings of the profoundest grief on Saturday last, at Windsor Castle, the terrible intelligence from Darmstadt of the fatal termination, at 7.30 a.m., of the illness of her beloved daughter the Grand Duchess of Hesse (Princess Alice of Great Britain and Ireland). Her Majesty, although overwhelmed with sorrow by this heavy blow, which occurred on the sad anniversary of the death of the lamented Prince Consort, has not suffered in health. The Prince and Princess of Wales, Prince and Princess Christian, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold were with the Queen. The Dean of Westminster also arrived at the castle. The usual service at the Mausoleum was postponed in consequence of the alarming telegram which reached her Majesty the previous day from Darmstadt; but the Queen and the Royal family walked down there in the morning.

Special prayers were read by the Very Rev. the Dean of of Westminster on Sunday in the private apartments of the castle (as in the years immediately following the death of the Prince Consort) before the Queen and the Royal family and some of the household. Divine service was performed in the private chapel of the castle, when the Rev. T. Teignmouth Shore, Incumbent of Berkeley Chapel, Mayfair, officiated. The Duchess of Teck came from London to visit her Majesty.

The Prince and Princess of Wales left the castle on Monday for London. The Dean of Westminster also left. The Duke of Edinburgh, of her Majesty's ironclad the Black Prince, who had arrived at Spithead the previous day from America, came from London, with the Duchess of Edinburgh, to visit the Queen, and remained to luncheon.

The Princess of Wales arrived on Tuesday on a visit to her Majesty.

A solemn service was performed by the Dean of Windsor in the private chapel of the castle on Wednesday, at half-past two, the hour of the funeral of the lamented Princess at Darmstadt, in the presence of the Queen, the Princess of Wales, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, Princess Christian, Princess Beatrice, the Duke of Connaught and Strathearn, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Duchess of Teck.

The Court will be in mourning from the 18th inst. to Jan. 29. General mourning is ordered to be worn for three weeks from the 15th inst.

The Court will pass the Christmas at Osborne.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince of Wales visited the Empress Eugénie and Prince Louis Napoleon at Camden House, Chiselhurst, on Thursday week. The Duchess of Edinburgh dined with the Prince and Princess at Marlborough House. Prince and Princess Christian and the Duke of Cambridge lunched with their Royal Highnesses after their return from Windsor on Monday. The Prince, with Prince Leopold and Prince Christian, left Marlborough House in the evening for Germany, to be present at the funeral of the Grand Duchess of Hesse.

THE DEATH OF PRINCESS ALICE.

The whole English nation, and, we believe, the German nation also, have since last Saturday joined with our Queen and the Royal family, and with the bereaved husband and children at Hesse-Darmstadt, in heartfelt mourning for the untimely death of this illustrious lady. Her Royal Highness was, to quote the touching words of her brother, the Prince of Wales, in the letter which Earl Granville read on Tuesday evening to the House of Lords, "so good, so kind, so clever!" As daughter, sister, wife, and mother, she had ever shown the characteristic virtues of womanhood; and she had laboured, both in England and in Germany, with a "thoughtful beneficence," to relieve the sufferings of the sick poor in hospitals, of wounded soldiers, and prisoners of war, at the same time cultivating every pursuit of refined intelligence and taste, and the graceful accomplishments befitting her exalted rank. The dates and other details of her personal history will be found set forth in the usual form of an Obituary Notice. Our leading article this week is naturally devoted to this topic, which has, more than all other contemporary affairs, occupied the public mind; while the votes of condolence in both Houses of Parliament, with the appropriate speeches of Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Granville, in the one instance, of Sir Stafford Northcote and Lord Hartington in the other, are recorded as an authoritative testimony of national regret, and of profound sympathy with the Royal Mother, for whom we have never ceased, these seventeen years past, to feel the reverential tenderness due to a Royal Widow.

Her Royal Highness died a little before eight o'clock in the morning last Saturday, in the Grand Ducal Palace at Darmstadt, her state the day before having been such as to give rise to the greatest alarm, with increased fever, and the swelling having extended to the windpipe or larynx. She had been ill since just after the death of her youngest child, Princess Maria Victoria, a little girl of four years, who had, with others of the family, been attacked by diphtheria. Upon the death of her little one the affectionate mother herself went to the bedside of her son, Prince Ernest, who is ten years of age, and who was suffering from the same disease. It appears to have been upon the occasion of this sorrowful interview, and by a kiss from the poor innocent boy, which his mother could not refuse at such a moment, that the germs of the terrible malady were conveyed to her system.

The sad intelligence was received at Windsor Castle on Saturday morning. The Queen had received previous telegrams from Sir William Jenner to explain to her Majesty the significance of the symptoms observed.

Immediately on the event becoming known in London the Home Secretary wrote to the Lord Mayor communicating the fact, and requesting him to give directions for the tolling of the great bell of St. Paul's Cathedral. His Lordship also read the letter from his seat in the Justice Room of the Mansion House, and a copy was posted outside the building.

On Sunday morning and evening, in their pulpit discourses, particular allusions to the mournful event were made by Canon Liddon, at St. Paul's; by Canon Prothero, at Westminster Abbey; by the Rev. H. White, at the Chapel Royal, Savoy; by Canon Spencer, at the Temple Church; by Canon Farrar, at St. Margaret's, Westminster; by the Bishop of Columbia, at St. Stephen's, Westminster; and at most other churches and chapels in the metropolis and throughout the country.

At Darmstadt, on Tuesday, the funeral solemnities in connection with the burial of Princess Alice commenced. The body was removed from the Grand Ducal Palace to the church within the old castle, where the religious ceremony was to take place next day. The hearse was preceded by a half-squadron of Dragoons and a number of Court officials, and was followed by the Royal carriages and another half-squadron of Dragoons. The torches were carried on either side of the hearse by six servants, and some non-commissioned officers of the Guard made up two lines of escort. There had been a heavy fall of snow during the day, but the night was almost cloudless. The whole of the route to the church was lined with spectators, who respectfully uncovered as the procession passed. The Princess was well known to the inhabitants of Darmstadt, not only through frequently being seen in the town with her husband, but by reason of the personal interest which she took in the local charities and other institutions. The procession having arrived at the church, the coffin, covered with a crimson pall, was placed on a black velvet catafalque, bearing the Grand Ducal crown and the arms and orders of the Princess, and throughout the night was attended by a guard of honour. Between nine o'clock and noon on Wednesday the church was open to the public, and during that time some thousands of persons passed reverently by the coffin. By two o'clock, the hour fixed for the reading of the burial service, the edifice was filled with the nobility, members of the diplomatic corps, the Ministry, military officers, Privy Councillors, members of the two Chambers, the Mayors of Darmstadt and other towns, the municipal councillors, the President of the National Synod, and a deputation of the clergy, officials of the palace, representatives of Ministerial departments, and deputations from various regiments. The right side of the altar was occupied by members of the Women's Union for Nursing Sick and Wounded in War, founded by the Grand Duchess and bearing her name; on the left were ranged ladies who had been presented at Court. Everything being in readiness for the service, the mourners—the Grand Duke of Hesse, the Prince of Wales, Prince Leopold, Prince Christian of Holstein, and the Grand Dukes of Mecklenburg and Baden among others — entered the church, and were conducted to their places with the ceremonies usually observed on such occasions. The Crown Prince and Princess of Germany were not present, the Emperor William having, after a consultation with his physicians, declined to permit them to attend the funeral on account of the risk of infection. In their absence the Imperial family were represented by General Goltz, Colonel Panwitz, Count Matuschka, and Count Seckendorff. M. de Quaade was in attendance for the King of Denmark, General Burnell for the King of the Belgians, and Baron von Perglas and Count Durkheim for the King and Queen Dowager of Bavaria. The Burial Service, to which some anthems and chorales were added, was performed by Assistant Chaplain Grein, one of the Ducal chaplains, and the Rev. Mr. Sillitoe, the resident English clergyman. The coffin was then removed from the catafalque to a hearse drawn by eight horses, and the sad procession passed to Rosenhohe by way of the Market-place, the parade-ground, the Alexanderstrasse, the Muehlstrasse, and the Erbachsterstrasse. The route was densely lined with spectators, and the utmost order prevailed.

During the funeral ceremony at Darmstadt and Rosenhohe a solemn service was held at Windsor Castle.

From all parts of the country we have reports of resolutions of condolence carried by Town Councils and other bodies. Minute guns were fired on Wednesday at Woolwich, Chatham, Portsmouth, and Devonport, and the flags of her Majesty's and other ships were flown half-mast high.

We present on the front page of this week's Number the portraits of the lamented Princess Alice and her youngest child, both so lately taken from their afflicted family; and our Extra Supplement consists of a separate Portrait of her Royal Highness, for which, as well as for the subject of our front-page Engraving, we are indebted to a photograph by Mr. Alexander Bassano, of Piccadilly.

THE AFGHAN WAR: CAMP OF GENERAL ROBERTS AT THULL, ON THE KHOORUM RIVER.

THE AFGHAN WAR.

We have to thank Lieutenant C. H. Atchison, R.H.A., for a sketch taken by him, on the 3rd ult., of the village of Thull, and the banks of the Khoorum river, with part of the camp of Major-General F. S. Roberts's forces, which have, since the 20th ult., advanced up the Khoorum Pass, occupied the upper valley with its forts, stormed the Peiwar, on the 2nd inst., and reached the summit of the Shutargardan, 11,200 ft. above the level of the sea. The tents shown in this sketch are, in the centre, those of the Commissariat storage; to the left, the guard-tent of the 5th Punjaub Cavalry; and the two buildings on the low hill are ancient Mohammedan tombs. This place, Thull, where the troops under General Roberts were concentrated for the central column of advance into Afghanistan, is situated on the frontier, on the left bank of the Khoorum river, fifty-seven miles south-west of Kohat, which was the real base of operations, and forty-two miles from the military cantonment of Edwardesabad, or Bunnoo; it is 168 miles from the city of Cabul, and 198 from Ghuzni, in Afghanistan. The distance from Thull, through the Pass, to Mohammed Azim's Fort, usually called the Khoorum Fort, is about fifty miles. The climate of the Khoorum Valley is described as very salubrious; for about six weeks the winter is severe, but during the spring and autumn it is charming. The valley is fertile, filled with orchards, and well cultivated. The principal tribes are the Baugash, a large section of whom dwell in the Hungoo and Kohat districts under our rule, and who are peaceably disposed, and the Turis, who are far better fighting material than their neighbours. These two tribes are estimated at a strength of 5000 able-bodied men each. The Jajis can put about 2500, and the Mangals about 2100 fighting men into the field. There are upwards of forty walled villages in the valley, capable of stubborn defence against assailants unarmed with artillery. The chief crops of the valley are rice, wheat, cotton, and barley, which the inhabitants bring down to the fair at Bunnoo. Water, forage, and firewood are abundant throughout the district. The whole of the inhabitants are Mohammedans of the Shia persuasion, and are consequently inimical to the Sonni rulers of Cabul. So long ago as 1849, when the late Sir Herbert Edwardes was employed in the Bunnoo district, the then ruler of Khoorum officially informed the British officer that his tribes were anxious to place themselves under our rule. The occupation of Khoorum and the adjacent Valley of Khost has often been considered as a possible measure by the Indian Government, to be carried out in much the same way as the occupation of Cyprus has been recently achieved—that is, that we were to pay the Ameer his usual annual taxes, amounting to £1500 per annum. It was calculated there would be a very trifling loss to the Indian Exchequer, but the gain in a strategical sense it was supposed would counterbalance it. There is no doubt that, with strong military posts in the valley, we shall be far nearer Cabul and Ghuzni, and more able to inflict a blow either on the Ameer or on the Afreedis of the Safed Koh, should such steps be desirable. The fort of Khoorum had been garrisoned by the Ameer's soldiers. It was visited not only by Lumsden's Mission in 1857, but also by a force under Sir Neville Chamberlain in 1856. It is by no means a formidable stronghold. It is situated nearly in the centre of the valley, 25 miles east of the Peiwar Pass, 115 west of Kohat, 120 from Cabul, and 150 from Ghuzni. Like the majority of Eastern forts, it is a square mud building; the faces are about 120 yards in length, with circular towers at the angles. A second work, with loftier parapets, is built inside. In this are the magazines and storehouses. The outer work is surrounded by a ditch, which can be flooded at pleasure. Enough has been said of this district to show that the occupation of this valley as far as the Peiwar Kotal is a considerable advantage. Its communications with Kohat, the base of operations of the central column, are easy, and the valley itself will form an admirable secondary base for the ulterior advance on Cabul. Its seizure will undoubtedly be a great blow to the Ameer.

SATURDAY NIGHT IN THE METROPOLITAN POULTRY MARKET. BY W. J. MORGAN.

Ali Khel, which General Roberts has now occupied, is a large village peopled by Jajis, about fifteen miles west of the Peiwar Pass. There is plenty of water, but forage and provisions are scarce. It is 150 miles west of Kohat, and 100 east of Ghuzni. The Darwesh Khel Wuziris, who live on the right or southern bank of the Khoorum, have always been on fairly friendly terms with us; their proximity to the Bunnoo frontier, and their constant intercourse with British subjects, have doubtless induced them to join us. The direct road from Thull to Bunnoo, which follows the course of the Khoorum river, has been used by the convoys, and this is not the first time that route has been followed by British troops. After the Kotul Khel Wuziri Expedition in 1859, the 6th Punjaub Infantry, with another corps, returned to their cantonments on the break up of the field force by the bed of the Khoorum, so that it was known to be practicable. If the Wuziris consent to keep this road clear for our troops and commissariat convoys, it will prove of inestimable advantage. Marwar, the great grain-producing district of the trans-Indus provinces, is within seventy miles of Thull by this route; but, should it be closed, all transport will be compelled to move round by Kohat, a distance of 180 miles. Doubtless our political officers will subsidise the Wuziris largely, in order to ensure the constant use of this valuable road.

The following is the latest news of the campaign received up to Thursday, when this was written; it is communicated by the Viceroy of India, in a telegram on Wednesday:—

"General Sir S. Browne marched for Jellalabad yesterday; hopes to reach on 20th. All quiet in Khyber Pass and neighbourhood.

"General Biddulph has occupied the eastern side of the Khojak Pass. The road had been sufficiently improved to enable him to continue his advance on the 15th inst. General Biddulph hopes to come to an arrangement with the neighbouring tribes for keeping the pass open. Many offers of service have been received. The prospect of obtaining supplies beyond the pass is satisfactory."

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Both Chambers met on the 12th inst. The Senate, after an unsuccessful attempt by the Right at a day's delay, took up the Budget, but did not get through the general discussion. In the Chamber M. Morel's election for Puy, challenged by the Right, was confirmed by 312 to 130; and, after disposing of some other business, the Chamber adjourned till the Senate has discussed the Budget. The debate on the Budget was continued in the Senate yesterday week. After a speech by M. Bocher, who was replied to by M. Léon Say, the general discussion terminated. In the Senate on Saturday M. Waddington, in reply to a question by M. Gontaut-Biron, made a statement of some length respecting the foreign policy of France. That policy, he said, had not varied since the close of the Congress. It was embodied in the instructions given to the French Plenipotentiaries at Berlin. They were to defend the interests of France, to maintain peace, to do nothing to compromise French neutrality, and to avoid all engagements concerning the future. These conditions had been scrupulously respected, and France left the Congress as free as she entered it. She had constantly supported the execution of the Berlin Treaty. No doubt there were difficulties; but, with the accord of the Powers, they must soon be settled. With regard to Greece, M. Waddington said, in the action which France had initiated to secure for that country a sufficient frontier she would not be isolated, but would act in concert with all the Powers. His explanation of the position of the country was adopted as satisfactory, and the Senate passed on to a consideration of the Budget of the Interior. On Tuesday the debate on the Budget was resumed. On the motion of M. Belcastel, a member of the Right, an addition of 100f. a year to the salary of the lower clergy, which had been struck out by the Chamber of Deputies, was restored by 159 to 112. In consequence of this vote the Chamber will have to meet again before the 31st inst., in order to reconsider this portion of the Budget. The Senate on Wednesday adopted the Budget of Expenditure.

The Treaty of Commerce between Germany and Austria-Hungary to be in operation for the ensuing year was signed at the Foreign Office, Berlin, on Monday.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The three days' debate of the Hungarian Delegation on Eastern affairs terminated last Saturday in the adoption, by a large majority, of the motion of Herr Hegedus to grant a sum of 20,000,000 florins for the occupation expenses in 1879. Count Andrassy defended the Eastern policy of the Government in a long speech, and maintained that the occupation of Bosnia would not disturb the monarchy or shift its centre of gravity. His speech was received with prolonged cheering. The Austrian Delegation has agreed to the greater number of the resolutions adopted by the Hungarian Delegation, but has resolved to adhere to its former rejection of the proposals having reference to the appointment of an additional number of captains, the building of a new turret-ship, and other matters. In the Lower House of the Hungarian Diet on Monday the bill proposing the prolongation of the military law was passed by an overwhelming majority. Only the members of the Extreme Left voted against the measure. The Hungarian Delegation assented to the resolutions adopted on the previous day by the Austrian Delegation, and there is, in consequence, no necessity for a common vote. An agreement having been thus effected, the Austrian delegation assembled and voted the common Estimates for the coming year. After a long discussion in Tuesday's sitting of the Lower House of the Hungarian Diet, a resolution was adopted, by 199 votes against 125, indemnifying the Government for the projected expenditure in the first quarter of the ensuing year. In Wednesday's sitting of the Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath, the Minister of Commerce submitted the Treaty of Commerce with Germany. The treaty was referred to the Economical Committee. The House next discussed the bill authorising the Government to continue levying the taxes for defraying the State expenditure during the first quarter of 1879. After a protracted debate the bill was passed in second and third reading, in accordance with the resolutions of the Budget Committee. The Committee of the Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath upon the Army Bill has confirmed its former resolution not to discuss the proposal for a prolongation of the present law. The Committee resolved, after a protracted debate, to report in favour of the Government bill, but rejected the proposal to declare itself at the same time on principle in favour of a reduction of the war footing of the army. The Committee also threw out the proposal that the Provisional Army Law should only remain in force until March 1 next.

AMERICA.

The United States Senate yesterday week passed by 35 votes to 26 the Electoral Bill introduced by Mr. Edmunds respecting the method of counting the votes in the Presidential election. The bill enacts that a disputed vote in any State shall be left to be settled first by the State, and, failing that, by Congress. The American correspondent of the Times states that the Senate Appropriation Committee has amended the Diplomatic Appropriation Bill, so as to make it exactly conform to the present state of the service, and also reinstating second secretaries, at London, Paris, and Berlin. The House of Representatives on Saturday last discussed a bill distributing nearly 10,000,000 dols. of the Geneva award remaining in the Treasury, but without taking action. Three parties contend for this balance, but nobody in Congress has yet proposed to repay the money to England. In Monday's sitting of the Senate the Chaplain alluded in the opening prayer to the death of Princess Alice, and besought the mercy of the Almighty for those who mourned for her. The Senate has passed Mr. Blaine's resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the alleged cases of intimidation in the Southern States during the recent elections by 56 votes to 6. An amendment to the resolution was also agreed to, making it applicable to the whole of the United States.

Congress has adjourned for the Christmas holidays.

Sir Brandreth Gibbs presided at the annual meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society, which was held on the 12th inst. The report of the council stated that the society then consisted of 6797 members, showing an increase of 157 during the current year. The funded property remained the same as at the last general meeting—viz., £26,511; the balance at the bank on the 1st inst. was £942, and there was £1000 on deposit. Particulars of the preparations for the next year's gathering of the Royal Agricultural Society were given in the report. The show, which will assume the form and proportions of an International Agricultural Exhibition, will begin on Monday, June 30, and close on Monday evening, July 7. It will be held at Kilburn.

There were 2397 births and 1698 deaths registered in London last week. Allowing for increase of population, the births were 77, and the deaths 89, below the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The deaths included 17 from smallpox, 34 from measles, 46 from scarlet fever, 14 from diphtheria, 47 from whooping-cough, 33 from different forms of fever, and 11 from diarrhœa. The deaths from smallpox rose to 17 last week, a higher number than in any week since the beginning of August last. The deaths referred to diseases of the respiratory organs, which had been 428, 441, and 460 in the three previous weeks, further rose to 501 last week, and exceeded by 15 the corrected weekly average: 350 resulted from bronchitis and 101 from pneumonia. In Greater London 2944 births and 2014 deaths were registered. The mean temperature was 28·4 deg., being 12·5 deg. below the average in the corresponding week of sixty years. The mean was very considerably below the average on each day of the week; the coldest day was Friday, when the mean was but 25·8 deg., showing a deficiency of 14·8 deg. The lowest night temperature was 20·5 deg. on Saturday. The duration of registered bright sunshine in the week was 3·6 hours, the sun being above the horizon during 54·9 hours.

CISSY, THE LITTLE PEACEMAKER.

BY PERCY FITZGERALD.

In the little village of Mytton, Lancashire, is one of the prettiest old churches, where the old Sherburnes sleep, side by side, on their venerable stone couches. Good Squire Leadbetter, the most regular attendant at church, often thought that these recumbent warriors and their noble dames, picturesque as their attitudes were, took up somewhat too much room, and would have exchanged some at least for a few extra pews. He was a vehement man, this Squire—smooth of aspect and courteous in manner, but with a boisterous soul, quick to resent. Some dated this irritability from the death of his wife, the charming, trusting, worshipping Eva Leadbetter, who believed him to be the noblest, cleverest being in the world—which he was not—and that envy, malice, hatred, and ill-will were exerted to prevent his being Prime Minister of England. There was left to him, however, a second Eva, a pretty little child, her mother's replica, a most engaging little prattler, with a sort of child's wisdom and good sense that was rather uncommon.

Cissy was her name; and Cissy Leadbetter used to advise gravely with her father on all the village difficulties and troubles; and sometimes caused him to turn and gaze on her with wonder as she indicated rather than suggested a solution of the difficulty. A very serious little personage, too. The fact was, "mamma's death" had overshadowed the mansion and hid all in it; and roomy as it was—with a fine old stair and some great rooms rambling away, dark, echoing—they lived below, on the ground floor, which was, indeed, ample enough for all concerned. Thus the regions above became associated in her mind with mystery—it seemed akin to the dark clouds on gloomy days, and was, in short, sacred to mamma. Mamma was gone, and the misty realms overhead were, as it were, gone from them too. She had never been up stairs "in my life," she would say, with an air of experience, as though she were forty or fifty years old.

There was another wise personage residing in that rather gloomy mansion—the dog, Neptune by name. A huge blood-hound—solemn and sapient—walking like a philosopher, and with a deep bay or growl that recalled the low pipe of the organ in Mytton church. He was Cissy's friend and companion; both were fast friends, walking out together, and communicating in a way that was sufficiently intelligible. They went out to walk together, and the pair were as well known as the Preston Coach—she tripping it very fast, and Neptune stalking along rather slowly, to accommodate his pace to hers.

But there was another shadow over that young existence. About a quarter of a mile off lived one Squire Hornby, the owner of Hornby Chase, their nearest neighbours and relations, too, whose inviting old house could be seen from the windows of Leadbetter Hall, and more especially that velvet lawn on to which the Hornbys used to troop out for bowls or other pastime—a gay, handsome family of merry girls and boys. Nay, even the ring of their cheerful voices would often be borne to the ears of Little Cissy, looking out wistfully from her own gloomy tenement. How she longed to be with them, she and Neptune, as she saw them fly round and round chasing each other, the bright colours glinting in the sun. But there was a barrier insurmountable. Between the two Squires raged a feud, which dated from the marriage of Mr. Leadbetter. His late wife being a mere girl, and many years younger than he was, was not acceptable to this family; or Squire Hornby had uttered some rough speeches, saying that his friend had been taken in by a little adventuress, a speech which the other had resented, and since his wife's death had turned into a cause for eternal hate. The offence became of a sudden rank, and cried for vengeance. It was an insult to the dead. Then had come a dispute about a bit of land or a path, which was fought with fury; indeed, they would have been glad to contend about a scrap of ribbon or paper—anything for an excuse. And one day the pair had met on the high road, and, dealing out hot words, it had all but come to a blow. After which they never interchanged a word. This was held by all around to be a disastrous thing for the parish; efforts were made to mend matters and set the fracture; and Parson Fenton, under whose guardianship the stone Sherburnes slept "in icy hoods and mails," venturing once to remonstrate with Squire Hornby, received so rude a reception that a third party became drawn into the quarrel, and it was noted by the rustics that "Parson and Squoire beant speakin', loike."

All this was miserable and very sad for the poor little mistress of the mansion; for that intimacy, trifling as the occasion might be, would have clearly changed the whole course and colour of her existence. It was hard on Neptune; for here was society for him and acquaintances he would have liked to make. There it was, however, and there it was to be: the little grave, solemn girl, and her dog, and the brooding father, she being brought up in this ascetic way, a perfect little nun. It was, indeed, a sore trial for her: these were such gay, brilliant children, their clothes so fine, their carriages and attendants so brilliant and numerous, and they seemed so happy. On their side the favoured children often took note of the little monastic child, and wondered what a dreary life she must be living. Sometimes they met her on the road, and mamma, an amiable, gentle lady, gave the little pariah a smile. But the papas had sternly forbidden all intercourse.

Now, there are some who may recall the Christmas of 183—, which was one of the "hardest"—expressive term!—that old people can remember. All things were snowed up, high roads and private paths; coaches stopped, gangs of men having to be employed to cut them out of drifts, working like soldiers in the trenches. The branches of old trees, burdened with a weight they were not accustomed to, gave way, and many, enjoying an honoured old age, lost brave old limbs, and were, as it were, ignobly crippled. It was a serious business for Mytton, which was not on the beaten track, and in danger of being altogether cut off from the outer world. Some visitors, too, had been asked for the first time since mamma's death—a period from which all things were dismally reckoned—so she would have company. But two days before Christmas the snow began; and the visitors—friendly cousins—they, too, may have been on the road, and, perhaps, were "snowed up" at some wretched country inn—made no sign. So, instead of its being the cheerful Christmas to which the little nun was looking, it was actually to be more dismal than usual, owing to disappointment.

It was unfortunate, too, that at Hornby Chase there was to be no lively Christmas. Squire Hornby's family had all set off a week before to a gay country house, and papa was to follow; but here was the pitiless snow, which had shut him up. An affectionate man, his situation, removed from children and wife, was pitiable enough.

It was late on Christmas Eve. The snow had ceased falling. Lights were twinkling among the trees, and Cissy was sitting in the window looking out, while her father was gazing vacantly into the glowing logs in the grate. Suddenly there was a sound of trampling in the hall and of cheerful voices, and the stout cook came running up in person to announce the joyful news,

"Please, Sir, here's a hamper's come!"

Down went father and daughter to welcome it, and there was a rough carrier, who had come across from Whalley.

"They got the coach through this morning," he said, "with fifty men working all night; and I thowt, as you'd sent over for the hamper, that this must be she."

"Why, it can't be for me;" said Mr. Leadbetter, "we expected no hamper. No one ever dreams of sending me anything."

"Well, you see, Sir, what with the snow and slush, there be no direction, or it be fallen off. But it be for you, in course."

There was no card or direction, but there was the moral certainty from the contents; the carter unpacking it himself, and drawing forth an enormous goose of Leadenhall, so stupendous that Cissy exclaimed, with conviction,

"There, Papa! That proves it—the goose!" There was wine below and there were Strasburg pies, and all sorts of good things.

He went away to his room, and the carrier departed. Cissy left, and carefully making investigation of the treasures of the hamper, began to grow grave, and yet graver. "No," she said; "I begin to think this cannot be for us." It was too splendid: and, when she came to a box containing a pretty little gold cross, with a pair of ear-rings, the most lovely piece of work in the world, for which she would have given her eyes, she shook her head sadly. On the top of this box was a little scrap of paper hastily written over:—"Dearest! I send the things, as you desired; with the ornament for little Ciss. We expect your dear self on Christmas Eve." So it was for them, after all! Oh, what ecstasy—what delight! And the little cross and ear-rings—they were for her! She put both on, as of course, and looked in the glass; then was about to rush up to papa, when the little face grew grave and sad.

"Oh, it can't—it can't be!" she said. "Papa will take nothing from the Hornbys; but he must, for my sake!"

It was quite clear. Welcome as the treasures were in themselves, they were doubly welcome as a peace-offering from the kind, generous, and magnanimous Hornbys.

She rushed to her father, who had retired to his gloomy cave.

"Look—look!" she cried. "It's for us. I found it out. And these trinkets they 're for me."

"I am glad," said he, kissing her, "that somebody has thought of you this Christmas and sent you a Christmas-box."

"But who do you think it is?" she said roguishly, and with her wise air.

"I am sure I could not guess," he said, wearily.

"No, I am sure you could not," she answered; "because it 's from a person you could never——. Oh," she added, impulsively, "isn't it truly generous to forget all the quarrel and make the first advance? For it is one, you know, and"——

She faltered; for there was gathering in his face looks of wonder, anger, and even rage.

"You dared—I mean, they dared! As if we were paupers, to whom they could send their alms at Christmas! Take their gimcracks off!—at once; without an instant's delay! My poor Cis! But it's not your fault."

And, turning from her, he seized his pen, and she knew he was writing a furious letter; for she heard him mutter, "This must come to an end at once—at once!"

Then he called to the servant, and bade him pack up all these things and carry them over to Hornby, "with that letter." "And don't exchange a word with their servants—not a word, mind—but throw it down in their Hall, at their door, and begone." Then he flung himself into his cave again. And the hamper was packed, the stupendous goose reintroduced to his straw, and little Cis sadly took off the cross and earrings, and put them where they were before. It was then carried away.

It began to grow dark, and in that little wise head was a plan being formed. She stole up stairs softly, and paused a moment at the door of her father's study. He was still at the fire, in his high-backed chair; but his face was turned to "Mamma's picture" over his chimney-piece. And she heard him say, "What a Christmas! Since she left me I am a poor desolate wretch." Then he muttered threats, and she heard the words distinctly, "He shall meet me. It has come to that, at last."

Now was Cissy, at the door of the house, tripping forth, having called her faithful Neptune to be her companion. It was a clear night, and the snow had become crisp and hardened under foot. There was nobody abroad on that whitened expanse, but the lights of Hornby Chase glowed through the warm crimson curtains as through old stained glass. For to Hornby Chase she was going—a bold step, indeed; but she was a wise, resolute little woman, who saw that the time was come when something must be done.

The door was wide open. She entered softly. With her, Neptune, stepping solemnly. She met no one. It was an old mansion, full of old oak and old galleries, with men in armour keeping sentinel in the hall and on the stairs. There were no servants about. There was a dance that night at the steward's house, and they had all set off. She ascended the stairs; Neptune, on whose full neck she rested her arm, putting his paws down solemnly and with caution. [See Illustration.] It was a mysterious ascent, up those little short lengths of stairs we meet in old houses—the little lady full of woe, her heart beating; but she pursued her course, making for the light that came from under a door at the end of the gallery, and which she guessed was the Squire's study.

She tapped softly. No one answered. She heard the rustling of papers; then tapped again.

"Come in!" and Cissy, still leaning on her protector, stood in the doorway. The Squire was standing up at a cabinet, going over papers. "What is it?" he said, without turning his head.

"Oh! Sir—Squire Hornby," began the little voice.

"Good gracious!" he said, giving a genuine start. Did he think it was a ghost? "Why, what on earth does this mean?" He was so astonished, he could hardly speak.

Cissy exclaimed, "Indeed—indeed, I came, Sir, because—and the ha—ha—mper"——and here, quite overcome with excitement and alarm, she dropped her head on Neptune's shaggy neck and burst into tears.

"My poor, poor little woman," said the Squire, drawing her over to him. "Tell me about it. What is it? What about the hamper?"

Then Cissy, feeling that a great responsibility was cast upon her, collected herself, and proceeded to relate the whole story, giving a graphic picture of the earrings, and even of the stupendous goose.

"You see," she said confidentially, "dear, good Squire Hornby—though we are enemies, I can't help calling you that—papa is in a nervous way from living alone, and he sees things gloomily. What are we to do? Poor dear papa is so wretched, and I don't know what to do; for it all comes on me. O do, Sir, advise me."

"I see," said the Squire, "he believes it comes from me"——

"No, no!" said she, eagerly. "I heard him as I came out bewail himself that there was nobody in the world to care for him."

"I am his friend, and always have been, if he would let me be so. And he is cast down, you tell me, little woman, and lonely this Christmas night?"

"Oh yes, yes!"

The Squire was getting his hat and putting a comforter round his neck.

"I beg your pardon," said Cissy humbly, turning to go; "I see I am taking up your time, but I thought it best to come and tell you about the hamper and prevent more mischief."

"Stay, stay!" said the Squire. "You are not going without me. A little lady like you must not be abroad of nights by yourself."

"Oh! I have Neptune. And are you coming with me?"

He took her hand. They set off across the snow—Cissy wondering and wondering. Here they were, at the door of her own house. She then turned to him expecting he would say "Good-bye." "Oh, thank you, so much." How her little heart fluttered. What was going to be? How would it end?

"What! You are coming in?" she exclaimed in delight.

"Yes," said he, smiling, "if you will help me. Go to your dear father and tell him I have come to see him."

She flew away, and in one moment came rushing back.

"Oh dear, Squire. Go up, go up; go to him! Do you know what he said?—'Thank God! I am not abandoned by all the world.'"

The Squire lifted up Cissy and kissed her; then patted Neptune's big head, and went up stairs slowly. He remained away a very, very long time. Then came her father's voice over the stairs.

"Cissy, my darling, come up."

And she fluttered up, that little peacemaker. Christmas Day was a happy one; for she, her father, and Neptune went over to Hornby Chase and spent an evening of peace and good will.

SATURDAY NIGHT IN THE POULTRY MARKET.

The commodious and rather handsome structure which has been erected by the City Corporation of London, close to the Metropolitan Meat Market, in Smithfield, for the sale of poultry, is a busy place on Saturday night, when wholesale dealers are accustomed to dispose of their remaining stock, in a prompt and summary manner, to a mixed crowd of retail purchasers, not a few of whom seek to provide their Sunday dinner in this way at a moderate cost, instead of going to the nearest poulterer's shop in their own street, and there paying a higher price for it. Here are thrifty housewives, mothers of families, landladies of suburban lodgings, bachelors of epicurean taste but of economical principles, who dine at home on the day of rest, and who are disposed to save a shilling by taking a little trouble, careful working-men who fancy they can teach their wives a lesson in household management, and small retailers whose business in their own neighbourhood will begin at a later hour, to go on briskly until the stroke of midnight. To these, and all other comers with money in their hands, eagerly intent upon the object of their quest, is freely offered the surplus supply of plump geese and turkeys, chickens and ducklings, wild-fowl, hares and rabbits, partridges, plovers, and other delicacies of animal food, mostly at a cost much below what one would be charged in the regular tradesmen's establishments; more especially if one's gentility above carrying the article home in basket or bag with one's own hand, and if the tradesman is expected to give a few weeks' or months' credit. There is a charm, as Dick Swiveller might observe, in this simple practice of purveying immediately for one's own wants and comforts, "to which the rich and powerful are strangers." It may be unfashionable, or even "low," but it is cheap and safe, and not unwise, for people who dwell within reach of such marketing facilities to buy the best they can get, at the most reasonable cost.

Tuesday's Gazette states that the Queen has been pleased to confer the Albert medal of the first class on Mark Addy, of Salford, in recognition of his repeated acts of heroism in saving life from drowning in the river Irwell.

The committee of management of the Brompton Hospital for Consumption have, says the World, decided that a ward shall be named after the late lamented Major Whyte-Melville, on account of his liberal contributions, amounting in the aggregate to £1600, and the great interest he always felt in its welfare.

The Christmas vacation at the Royal Military Academy began on Tuesday, when Sir John Adye, the Governor, announced the names of the thirty-seven gentlemen to whom commissions had been awarded, and distributed the prizes. In his report the Governor spoke favourably of the soldier-like bearing and conduct of the cadets, and said that during the past term the general state of discipline had been very satisfactory. The Pollock gold medal, for distinguished proficiency, was presented to Under-Officer Stuart Davidson, and the regulation sword for exemplary conduct was awarded to Senior Under-Officer Edward Armitage.

There was a perceptible decrease in the amount of American fresh meat landed at Liverpool last week when compared with the previous one, while the arrivals of live stock were characterised by the same feature. Four steamers reached the Mersey with fresh meat, consisting of 4033 quarters of beef, 852 carcases of mutton, and 596 dead pigs. There were also landed eight boxes of poultry from Canada. During last Christmas season a large number of turkeys and geese arrived from Canada, and were well received in the English market. The arrivals of live stock amounted to 187 cattle and 751 sheep. —The Allan mail-steamer Caspian, which arrived in the Mersey on Wednesday from Canada, had on board a valuable consignment of Canadian poultry for the Christmas market, comprising 203 barrels of turkeys and nine cases of geese and ducks, nearly 4000 head in all. The Dominion steamer Mississippi, which also reached the Mersey on Wednesday, brought about 1600 Canadian turkeys and geese. They are all in splendid condition, and were dispatched at once to the leading markets.

Dean Stanley, as president of the Midland Institute at Birmingham, gave an address in the Townhall there on Monday, his subject being an historic survey of American Institutions. The Dean observed that many of the independent States, having been formed on mediæval models, had already decayed, and were fast hastening in that direction. One of the most remarkable facts, he said, about modern America was the development of its institutions, among which the abundance of libraries for the people was the great glory, as it was the great reproach of the metropolis of our own country. Dean Stanley subsequently presented the prizes to the successful students. In concluding his address the Dean alluded in a touching manner to the death of Princess Alice.

"She ascended the stairs; Neptune, on whose full neck she rested her arm, putting his paws down solemnly and with caution."

A NEW SUIT FOR CHRISTMAS. BY H, WERNER.

FROM A PHOTOGRAPH PUBLISHED BY THE BERLIN PHOTOGRAPHIC COMPANY.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

Three score years have passed since England, in one universal outbreak of bitterest grief, mourned the loss of a beloved Princess. The very hopes of the nation's Future seemed to have died with the Princess Charlotte of Wales, consort of Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg. Sorrow as general and as sincere has been awakened in every rank and grade of society by the untimely death of the Grand Duchess of Hesse-Darmstadt, Princess Alice of Great Britain. Everybody is heartily and unfeignedly sorry. Everybody deeply sympathises with the bereaved husband, with the poor little children at Darmstadt yonder, left motherless; and, moreover, is deep and reverent pity felt for that August Parent, whose bright and beneficent life journey has yet been marked by Three sad gravestones: those of the Duchess of Kent, the Prince Consort, and, now, of the Princess Alice.

It would be wholly inopportune and impertinent, I take it, to say more directly on this head at present. The country has unanimously mourned the dead. The minute guns have been fired; the muffled peals have tolled; and out of respect for the sorrowing kindred that survive it now becomes us, I should say, to be silent. No good purpose can be served by deluging the newspapers with column after column of lachrymose rhetoric, and more or less fulsome eulogy of a deceased Lady whom we know, on the authority of her Mother and her Brother, to have been good, and kind, and clever, but of whom otherwise the great mass of the public could have known but very little. Lord Beaconsfield marred his truly eloquent oration in the House of Lords by suggesting the "Kiss of Death" (with its inexpressibly shocking associations) as a subject for pictorial or plastic illustration. It were better to leave the Dead alone. Mr. Alfred Austin has written in the Standard, and in much better taste, some very pathetic and well-turned verses on the same subject; but all the dialectical and poetic threnodies of orators and poets will not equal the stern magnificence of Malesherbes' rendering of the Horatian lines—

> Le pauvre en sa cabane est sujet à ses lois,
> Et la garde qui veille aux barrières du Louvre
> N'en défend pas nos Rois.

Are we to have a very miserable Christmas? Things at present look sadly like it. Mr. Cross's smooth official words in the House of Commons to the contrary notwithstanding, it has been stated, on indisputably good authority, that there exists an appalling amount of misery and distress among the working people in the provinces, especially in the North. Lord Blantyre, in his letter to Mr. Gladstone, seems to think that the poor are, as a rule, very well off indeed; and that, looking at the care taken of our necessitous fellow-countrymen by the Poor Law "and other benevolent institutions," Parliament might well have agreed to a grant for the relief of the Rhodope refugees. The other day they were the "Rhodope insurgents;" but let that pass. In the parish in which I take the liberty of residing I pay a poor's rate of fourteen pence in the pound; but I have not yet been able to discover the beneficence of the Poor Law. Perhaps I shall find it out when I am broken, and am fain to seek the relieving officer and solicit indoor or outdoor relief. So far as things go at present, I am happy to believe that St. Pancras Workhouse is a very spacious and well-managed establishment; still, the thoroughfares of the parish appear to me to be swarming with beggars and with hungry and ragged folk; and, in fine, the experience of many years convinces me that the first thing done by the Poor Law in the presence of any great disaster, such as an epidemic, a famine, a flood, or an unusually hard frost, is to break down, utterly. What has become of my fourteen pence in the pound? I must make it up (if I can) to twenty pence by subscribing to the "other benevolent institutions" hinted at by the excellent Lord Blantyre. Mind, I see no harm in sending something to the Rhodope sufferers; but, at the same time, we should not forget the claims of the poor-box at Bow-street and the other police courts.

Mem: A lady asked me, the other day, which was the best Charity to which to send a Christmas donation. "Madam," I replied, "a celebrated gourmet was once asked which was the best sauce for fish. 'All sauces,' he made answer." All charities are good to subscribe to; only, before you draw your cheque or cut your five-pound notes in halves, just take the trouble to enrol yourself as a member of the Charity Organisation Society, and make sure, by careful inquiries, that the Charity which you have selected for support is not a swindle.

Juvenile balls put off; Royal visits abandoned; Westminster plays suspended; the shops in Regent-street and Oxford-street full of half mourning gear: assuredly these portents do not seem to foretell a very merry Christmas. Yet the deluge of Christmas-cards is more overwhelmingly abundant, more irresistibly brilliant, and more fascinatingly pretty this year than ever. It is true that these tasteful trifles are put in hand in early spring; and that last March we could not foresee the coming about of "Peace with Honour"—and an Afghan war; the collapse of trade, destitution in the manufacturing districts, and other troubles. I admire Christmas cards, and advocate the circulation thereof, from an artistic, a commercial, and a sentimental point of view: first, because the prodigious demand for them tends to keep alive the beautiful art of chromo-lithography; next, because the production of the cards gives remunerative employment to innumerable hands, including a large number of lady-artists; and, finally, because the interchange of these radiant missives stimulates kindly spirit and good-feeling among all classes. So I mean to scatter Marcus Ward's and Delarue's pretty cartoons broadcast.

I have experienced a sad—a dreadfully sad—sensation this week. From my early childhood I have suffered from defective vision. For awhile I was totally blind; and since my partial recovery, more than forty years since, I have had only one working eye, with the aid of which I have been mercifully permitted to do a good deal on paper, on steel, on copper, and on wood. But things ocular have now come to that pass that I can no longer read even my Pall Mall Gazette, much less write a letter by candlelight without glasses. So I went last Wednesday to a famous firm in Regent-street to be measured for a pair of spectacles. The obliging optician subjected me to a cross-examination, lasting full twenty minutes, as to what I had been doing all my life through in the reading and writing line, and as to what I could see, or could not see at present. Ultimately, with a view to the delivery of the spectacles, he politely asked me for my name and address, which I gave him, somewhat shamefacedly. One does not like to "own up" in the matter of the first pair of spectacles. "Ah!" he remarked, coolly, as he booked the necessary particulars, "We've been waiting for you a long time." Horror! Fancy being "waited for" by an optician. Are the Economic Funeral Company and the marble masons in the Highgate-road waiting for me, I wonder?

Musical critics tell me with enthusiasm about a new lady pianiste, Miss Bessie Richards, who was the other day suddenly called upon to play at Madame Viard-Louis's concert, and achieved a brilliant success in Chopin's scherzo in B flat. Miss Bessie Richards seems to have gone through a somewhat crucial course of training. After studying in England, she went to Leipsic, and was informed by the musical magnates of the Conservatorium there that she had talent, but that her "method" was totally wrong. She studied sedulously for two whole years at the Conservatorium in question, and then, thinking herself tolerably proficient in her most difficult art, she went to Dresden. Said the most eminent professor of music in the Saxon capital to her, "The first thing you have to do, esteemed young lady, is to unlearn everything that you have learned at Leipsic." After this I should certainly have abandoned the pianoforte for the big drum; but Miss Bessie Richards was not to be discouraged. She studied for twelve months with the most eminent professor in Dresden, and now it is to be hoped she will be recognised as a Mistress of Arts.

I like very much the lithographed picture "At the Play" in the Christmas Number of the World, containing portraits of the celebrities of the day, who are supposed to be congregated in the boxes and stalls of the Lyceum on one of Mr. Henry Irving's "first nights." By-the-way, Mr. Irving's "first night," as manager as well as actor, is fixed for Monday, the 30th inst., and there will be, I should say, a rare gathering of celebrities in Wellington-street on the evening in question. The more striking portraits in "At the Play" are those of Lord Beaconsfield, Mr. Montagu Corry, Mr. George Lewis, Lord Alfred Paget, and especially Mr. Montague Williams. Some of the other portraits lack strength and directness.

"The English Colony at Wiesbaden" send me a post-card politely asking me whether that delightful little prima donna Piccolomini, who fascinated us all in the "Traviata" some twenty years ago, was a soprano, a mezzo-soprano, or a contralto. I am very much the Servant of the "English Colony at Wiesbaden," but I am not a musical critic, and am no judge of the voices of cantatrices. Thus much, however, I find at page 376 of the late Mr. Benjamin Lumley's "Reminiscences of the Opera":—Her (Piccolomini's) voice was a high and pure soprano, with all the attraction of youth and freshness; not wide in range; sweet rather than powerful, and not gifted with any perfection of fluency or flexibility. Her vocalisation was far from being distinguished by its correctness or excellence of school. Her acting was simple, natural, graceful, and apparently spontaneous and untutored. To musicians she appeared a clever amateur, but never a great artist." Elsewhere Mr. Lumley speaks of Piccolomini as "a great little cloud compeller" and "a darling pet."

His Majesty the King of the Hellenes has conferred on Mr. Blanchard Jerrold the highly-prized decoration of an officer of the Order of the Redeemer, in grateful acknowledgment of his distinguished services in the cause of Christianity and Greek freedom. Mr. Blanchard Jerrold is probably an accomplished Romaic scholar; so he will permit me to say to him, Kyrie Hippotes! Sas synchairo eilikrinestata kai ex oles kardias mou!

"A NEW SUIT FOR CHRISTMAS."

In this pleasant scene of homely German life, where the Christmas Tree has been duly prepared with its lanterns or tapers all ready to be lighted, and with its appointed gifts for the gratification of each member of the happy family, we behold the entrance of a bright young person, Master Fritz, or Karl, or whatever his name, who is attired in a new suit of clothes for the festive occasion. Such boys have we seen in England, not less elated in spirit by the consciousness of a similar improvement in their outward covering, more especially at that momentous stage of first wearing the breeches, the trousers, or the "knickerbockers," which comes to male mankind once in a lifetime, with the sensation of advanced dignity, as a foretaste of the masterly prerogatives of their sex. The mother or nurse, who has dressed this cheerful youngster in such a becoming fashion, seems little inclined to reprove his juvenile exhibition of personal vanity; and the kind old grandmother, as she looks up from the Bible to greet his approach, is delighted with the brave little man. We are not equally sure of the approval of his little sister, refraining as she does from a glance of admiring curiosity, and devoting her whole attention to the unconscious doll which is fondled in her lap. She may have her private opinion that "Brother" thinks too much of himself, and that men and boys, in general, are too apt to give themselves the air of Lords of Creation. As for the dog, we should like best of all to know his mind upon the subject, but the reader is quite as well able as we are to interpret the wondering wistfulness of his look, and the subdued agitation of his bushy tail. The father's old jacket, hanging beside the door, might be pointed to as a reminder that this urchin will not very often get a new suit of clothes, and that he must learn betimes to work for his own needs.

In consequence of the bad times Lord Chesham has remitted 10 per cent of the rent paid by his tenants in Bucks for the year, and also allowed them half the sum they have paid since the last rent audit in respect of school board rates.

The total collections at Birmingham on Hospital Sunday, Oct. 27 last, for the benefit of the local Queen's Hospital, amounted to £6400, which was £600 more than in any previous years since the Hospital Sunday collection was started.

The steamer Byzantin, belonging to the Fraissinet Company, of Marseilles, and bound from that place to Constantinople, and the steamer Rinaldo, of Hull, from Hull to Constantinople, with a general cargo, are reported by Lloyd's Constantinople agent to have been in collision near Gallipoli. The French steamer sank with 150 persons who were on board, the English steamer sustaining only slight damage.

A large number of prize-distributions to metropolitan volunteer corps took place last week, chief amongst which were those of the 1st London and 1st Middlesex Engineers, the 3rd London, the 4th Middlesex, 26th Middlesex, 37th Middlesex, 40th Middlesex, 46th Middlesex, 1st Surrey, and 10th Tower Hamlets Rifles. In all cases, except that of the 4th Middlesex, the returns showed an improvement upon the past year; and in the case referred to the commanding officer, Lord Truro, ascribed the falling off to the fact that a large number of their men had joined the regular service since the previous year. The 46th made greater progress than any other corps in the metropolis during the past twelve months, having added 250 to its enrolled establishment, and returned about 98 per cent of efficients.

PARLIAMENT.

VOTES OF CONDOLENCE WITH THE QUEEN.

The general feeling of deep regret occasioned throughout the country by the sad intelligence of the death of Princess Alice, Grand Duchess of Hesse-Darmstadt, found apt expression in both Houses of Parliament at the beginning of the week.

Reassembling after a week's adjournment on Tuesday, their Lordships in the Upper Chamber confined themselves to passing the Vote of Condolence with her Majesty, eloquently proposed by the Earl of Beaconsfield, and as eloquently seconded by Earl Granville. With deep feeling, Lord Beaconsfield described the virtues of Princess Alice, and particularised the especial mark of motherly love which cost her Royal Highness her life. The Prime Minister said:—

> A Princess who loved us, though she left us, and who always revisited her fatherland with delight—one of those women the brightness of whose being adorned society and inspired the circle in which she lived—has been removed from this world, to the anguish of her family, her friends, and her subjects. Princess Alice—for I will venture to call her by that name, though she wore a crown—afforded one of the most striking contrasts that I can remember of richness of culture and rare intelligence combined with the most pure and refined domestic sentiments (Hear, hear). You, my Lords, who knew her life well, can recall those agonising hours when she attended the dying bed of her illustrious father, who had sketched out her studies and formed her tastes. You can recall, too, the moment at which she attended her Royal brother at a time when the hopes of England seemed to depend on his life (Hear, hear); and now you can remember too well how, when the whole of her own family were stricken by a malignant disease, she had been to them the angel of the house, till at last her own vital power was perhaps exhausted and she has fallen. My Lords, there is something wonderfully pitcous in the immediate cause of her death. The physicians who permitted her to watch over her suffering family enjoined her under no circumstances whatever to be tempted into an embrace. Her admirable self-restraint guarded her through the crisis of this terrible complaint in safety. She remembered and obeyed the injunctions of her physicians. But it became her lot to break to her son, quite a youth, the death of his youngest sister, to whom he was devotedly attached. The boy was so overcome with misery that the agitated mother clasped him in her arms, and thus she received the kiss of death. My Lords, I hardly know an incident more pathetic. It is one by which poets might be inspired, and in which the professors of the fine arts, from the highest to the lowest branches, whether in painting, sculpture, or gems, might find a fitting subject of commemoration (Hear, hear). My Lords, it is impossible to depict at this moment the sufferings of the husband whom she has left behind and of the children who were so devoted to her; but our duty is to offer our condolence to one whose happiness and whose sorrows always excite and command the loyalty and affectionate respect of this House.

The eulogium pronounced by Earl Granville on the late Princess was of equal interest by reason of the noble Earl's reference to his own recollections of her Royal Highness, and also by reason of the touching passages which he read in conclusion from a letter addressed to him by the Prince of Wales. The Leader of the Opposition said:—

> The accidents of a political career gave me some opportunity of observing the domestic life of the Royal family during the course of eleven years. At the beginning of that period Princess Alice was a singularly attractive child of seven years old. I doubt whether her any childhood or youth was ever more joyous and bright, or ever gave a livelier promise of that which has been so amply fulfilled. At the end of that time I had the honour of proposing an address in this House on her Royal Highness's marriage—a marriage founded upon all the best securities for wedded happiness. The child had grown into womanhood with all those personal, moral, and mental qualities which the noble Earl has so well described. The principal characteristics of her married life appear to have been—first, absolute devotion to her husband and children; next, a course not merely of benevolence, but of unceasing thoughtful beneficence to all depending upon her; and, lastly, a remarkable talent for acquiring the sympathy and attracting the regard of some of the most gifted of the intellectual country which she had adopted, and to whose interests she was devoted without ever breaking a link in the chain of memories and associations which bound her to the country of her birth. The noble Earl has tactfully alluded to the singular coincidence of three dates which will never pass from the pages of English history. My Lords, I trust that neither the writer nor your Lordships will think it indiscreet if, instead of trusting to my own language to impress your feelings as to the loss which has befallen the Royal families of England on this last 14th of December and Darmstadt, I read to you a few words extracted from a letter written on the day of the sad tragedy by a brother passionately devoted to his sister, and who left England last night to pay the last sad tribute of affection and respect to her beloved memory:—
> "So good, so kind, so clever. We had gone through so much together—my father's illness, then my own; and she has succumbed to the pernicious malady which laid low her husband and children, whom she nursed and watched with unceasing care and attention. . . . The Queen bears up bravely, but her grief is deep beyond words."

Their Lordships, having fulfilled their mournful duty of agreeing to the Vote of Condolence with the Queen on the melancholy occasion, adjourned till Thursday, Feb. 13 next.

Language to the full as loyal and sympathetic as that which came from Lord Beaconsfield and Earl Granville introduced the Vote of Condolence to the Lower House on Monday—the Chancellor of the Exchequer moving, and the Marquis of Hartington seconding, the Address with characteristic directness. Sir Stafford Northcote, indeed, has rarely expressed himself more happily than he did in the few sentences wherein he summed up the exemplary character of the late Princess Alice, and elicited sympathetic cheers from both sides the House when he added:—

> Before such a sorrow it is almost impossible to speak; and yet we know that words of sympathy are most valuable, and that by no one is the power of sympathy more valued than by her Majesty; for we have her own example to show that no calamity falls upon any portion of her people but she is the first, by kindly words and kindly message, to manifest her own sympathy. I feel convinced the House will unanimously agree to an address which will testify at once our personal affection for the Sovereign, our deep sorrow for her loss, and our earnest prayer that God may support her in our affliction.

THE AFGHAN DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Briefly as the rest of the proceedings in the Lower Chamber may be summed up, a few salient points in the conclusion of last week's debate yet require mention. On Thursday week, for example, Mr. Grant Duff's able speech having been replied to by Mr. Bourke, Mr. A. E. Gathorne Hardy vigorously wielded the cudgels in defence of his father, Lord Cranbrook; but the liveliest speech of the night came from Mr. Goschen, who, besides attacking the Government with spirit, succeeded in demonstrating that the Opposition had no more intention of tolerating Russian intervention in Afghanistan than Ministers had. The following (Friday's) sitting saw Sir Stafford Northcote early on his legs to give notice of a motion for a grant in aid of the sufferers in the Rhodope district—an announcement which induced Mr. Anderson a little later to proclaim that, in view of the wide-spread distress prevailing in our own country, he proposed to meet the Chancellor of the Exchequer's motion by a direct negative. Then came the tug of war. Resuming the Afghan dispute, Earl Percy opined the House would approve the policy of the Ministry. But this declaration of confidence did not hinder Sir William Harcourt from attacking the Government tooth and nail for fostering a "blood-and-thunder policy." Epithets, indeed, abounded in Sir William Harcourt's rushing oration, to which the Attorney-General's plain, unvarnished advocacy formed a strong contrast. Among other notable speeches, that of Mr. Burt denouncing the Afghan War on behalf of the working classes whom he represented, and that of Sir A. Gordon explaining that because of his disagreement with the course adopted by Government he had been driven to seek the freer air of the Opposition side, attracted some attention. To those hon. members succeeded Mr. R. E. Plunkett, Mr. Courtney, and Mr. Newdegate. The Marquis of Hartington displayed unusual energy in adducing reasons why he would support Mr. Whitbread's amendment. Nothing daunted, Sir Stafford Northcote gallantly defended

Lord Lytton and the Marquis of Salisbury from the aspersions cast upon them, and grew quite warm in his earnest and manly vindication of the Viceroy. With regard to the general question, the Chancellor of the Exchequer contended that in entering into this war there had been no change from the old policy towards Afghanistan, but rather a development of it. One sentence from the right hon. gentleman's well-argued speech will illustrate this point. "So long (said Sir Stafford Northcote) as the Russians were only moving in Central Asia I think there was no cause for advancing beyond our frontier; but when you find a Russian Mission sent to Cabul, and sent avowedly because there was an unfriendly feeling between England and Russia, and because Russia thought that was the point we were most vulnerable on, I maintain that all the circumstances on which Lord Lawrence founded his policy were so completely revolutionised that the very argument which supported it in the case of one policy would, I think, warrant us in taking a totally different view of what was to be done." The British Mission having been refused a passage through the Khyber Pass, an affront had been offered, no apology had been made, and, for the sake of maintaining unsullied the credit of English rule in India, the Government had been impelled to declare war against the Ameer. The House then divided on Mr. Whitbread's amendment disapproving "the conduct of her Majesty's Government, which has resulted in the war with Afghanistan." The majority for Ministers was 101—328 voting against the amendment, and 227 for it.

On Monday the Address of Condolence with her Majesty was agreed to, as already observed. It then became the by-no-means agreeable duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make plain to the House that the Government had retired from the benevolent position they had wished to take up with regard to the Mohammedan sufferers from the alleged outrages in the Rhodope districts of Turkey. In stating that he did not intend to proceed with the motion for a grant of money to these distressed people in the East, the Chancellor of the Exchequer intimated that overtures on the subject had been made to certain Foreign Powers, but confessed that the coolness with which the House had received the proposition damped the philanthropic ardour of the Cabinet. This acknowledgment of fallibility did not escape hostile comment from the Marquis of Hartington, Mr. Anderson, Sir George Campbell (who pertinently pointed out that the Turkish Government, while unable to receive these refugees, yet contrived to pay for the importation of plenty of arms and ammunition from America), Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Dillwyn, Mr. Serjeant Simon, and Mr. Gladstone; but Sir Stafford Northcote was, peradventure, consoled by the protection condescendingly offered him by Sir Robert Peel, albeit the Leader of the House was finally compelled to eat the leek, and afford yet another exemplification of the truth of the Gallic adage, Qui s'excuse s'accuse. Not without ability, certainly not without confidence, did Mr. E. Stanhope next introduce the subjoined resolution:—

That, her Majesty having directed a military expedition of her forces charged upon Indian revenues to be dispatched against the Ameer of Afghanistan, this House consents that the revenues of India shall be applied to defray the expenses of the military operations which may be carried on beyond the external frontiers of her Majesty's Indian possessions.

Mr. Fawcett exhibited his well-known mastery over Indian affairs in moving as an amendment:—

That this House is of opinion that it would be unjust that the revenues of India should be applied to defray the extraordinary expense of the military operations now being carried on against the Ameer of Afghanistan.

Waning space precludes our saying more than that among the other chief speakers on the first night for or against the resolution were Mr. Gladstone (times have changed indeed when the right hon. member for Greenwich is found seconding a motion by Mr. Fawcett!), the Attorney-General, Sir George Bowyer, Mr. Laing, Mr. Smollett, Mr. Osborne Morgan, and Sir George Campbell. On Tuesday (after a desultory conversation, in which Lord Elcho expressed his sympathy with the Rhodope sufferers) Dr. Playfair had the first word in the Indian debate, and was replied to by Lord George Hamilton. Sir Henry James was followed by the Solicitor-General; and the tedium of debate was relieved by a welcome speech from Sir Wilfrid Lawson, and a diatribe from Mr. Mundella. Mr. Childers's profound discourse was not followed in all its meanderings by Sir Stafford Northcote, who virtually contented himself with promising some more definite financial information a few months hence—a promise that satisfied neither the Marquis of Hartington nor Mr. Jacob Bright. Quite contented, however, were hon. members who form the majority, for they defeated Mr. Fawcett's amendment by 235 to 125 votes, and then carried the resolution. In the course of the debate, it should be mentioned, Lord Barrington, the Vice-Chamberlain, read at the table the Queen's gracious reply to the Address:—

Your loyal and dutiful address affords me much satisfaction. I feel assured I shall receive your cordial co-operation and support in all the measures which may be deemed necessary for upholding the honour of my Crown and for maintaining the great interests of my Empire.

It was getting on for one o'clock on Wednesday morning when the House adjourned to Feb. 13 next.

The prospectus for the eighth annual drawing of the Printers' National Art-Union has been issued, and bears favourable comparison with any of its predecessors.

"UNDER THE OLD FLAG."

The custom of preserving an old set of regimental colours by suspending them, as an historic trophy, in the aisle of some Cathedral Church or other dignified ecclesiastical building, may be connected with that ceremony of blessing the colours, when newly bestowed upon the regiment, in which prelates and influential clergymen have not unfrequently borne an officiating part. The Established Church of England, as its social and political traditions have always seemed to be intimately allied with the sentiments of national loyalty and patriotism, has not hesitated, in general, to lend a certain degree of moral support to the military and naval services of the Crown; and the British Army, in the frank and faithful performance of its duty, without respect to the merits of any particular war, has often been mentioned with respect in sermons from the English pulpit. There is, indeed, a distinct and express Article of this Church, among the well-known Thirty-nine, which affirms the lawfulness of soldiership, if not as an ordinary profession, at least in compliance with the bidding of the civil magistrate in case of need. Without alluding further to any scruples of conscience which good and religious men, such as the Quakers, have now and then entertained upon this subject, we may remark that there appears no incongruity in the sentiment with which a retired veteran, such as we see in Mr. Frank Dadd's interesting design, may be imagined to stand and meditate "under the flag," within the consecrated walls of a venerable Gothic church, and devoutly to muse upon the experiences of his past life, in gratitude for merciful preservation from many dangers in the field of battle, and with a sincere faith in the promises which are the foundation of Christian hope. The presence of his little daughter, or more probably grand-daughter, must give additional sweetness to this moment of serene contemplation; while there is a suggestion of antique and chivalric heroism in the stone effigy of a mailed Crusader, lying upon the mediæval tomb, above which these tattered remnants of "the old flag" were hoisted, as we suppose, not very long ago.

THE CHRISTMAS CATTLE SHOW.

Several days of last week brought their crowds of people to Islington for the yearly Cattle Show, being the eighty-first of the Smithfield Club and the seventeenth held at the Agricultural Hall. The gross number of visitors to this year's show is about 113,000, or more than 8000 fewer than last year. The principal features of this year's show have been the general evenness of the live stock in point of excellence, and the fair prices realised by the sales, although at the close there were a good many still on hand and reserved for the Christmas market. We give Illustrations of two of the finest animals exhibited, a heifer and an ox, each of which won a first prize in its class, and the gold cup of honour, the heifer being deemed worthy of the championship.

THE ALEXANDRA PARK DOG SHOW.

The twelfth exhibition of sporting and other dogs, under the management of the "Kennel Club," was held at the Alexandra Palace, Muswell-hill, from Thursday week to Monday last. This show was quite a success, there being 1058 entries, including most of the champion dogs of other shows. In the champion class for bloodhounds the prize for dogs was taken by Mr. Morrell's Rollo, and for bitches by Mr. R. Johnstone Auld's Mona, which has taken prizes at most of the principal shows in the kingdom. In the champion class for mastiffs (dogs only) the Shah, the celebrity of all the recent shows, belonging to Mr. Harris, was an easy first. The first prize in the ordinary classes for dogs was taken by Mr. Edgar Hanbury's Rajah; and for bitches by Mr. T. W. Allen's Creole. Among the St. Bernard's, the champion classes had only one representative, Mr. Gresham's Monk and the same exhibitor's Shah, both which, of course, took first prizes. The prize retriever (not black) was Mr. Lewis Mackenzie's Garnet, and the first black retriever was Mr. J. W. Morris's Monk. Mr. Maule's Tragedy and Miss Jaquet's Tum Tum gained the first and second prizes respectively for pugs. The attendance of visitors was fairly good, considering the weather.

The will and codicil of Mr. James Johnston, the proprietor of the Standard, who died on Oct. 21 last, has just been proved by Mr. Mudford and the two other trustees and executors, the personalty being sworn under £500,000. The testator bequeaths the sum of £10,000 to his son by his first wife, and legacies of £3000 to each of his daughters by that marriage. An annuity of £2000 per annum is left to his widow, legacies of £300 each to two of his servants, and of £500 to each of his executors. There are one or two other trifling bequests. The testator directs that, with the exception of the above bequests, the whole of his real and personal property, including the goodwill and property of the Standard newspaper, shall be held in trust for the benefit of his five children by his second wife. By a codicil to the will the testator directs that Mr. Mudford is to remain as editor of the Standard for his lifetime, or until such time as he shall voluntarily resign the editorship; and further directs that the paper is to be carried on in every respect as it was being carried on at the time of his death.

ELECTION NEWS.

The election of a member of Parliament for Bristol to fill the vacancy caused by the retirement of Mr. Kirkman Hodgson (Liberal) took place last Saturday. Mr. Lewis Fry, the Liberal candidate, was returned by a majority of 1547 votes over his Conservative opponent, Sir Ivor Guest, the numbers having been 9342, against 7795. The Liberals polled 454 more, and the Conservatives 727 fewer, than at the general election.

The polling for New Ross, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the late Mr. John Dunbar, took place on Tuesday, when Colonel Tottenham, the Conservative candidate, polled 95 votes, and Mr. Delany, Home Ruler, 90. Mr. Redmond had retired.

The nomination for the county of Londonderry, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Professor Smyth, took place on Monday. The candidates proposed were Sir Thomas McClure, Liberal, and Mr. Samuel Maxwell Alexander, Conservative. Thursday was appointed for the polling.

The requisition to Mr. Gladstone inviting him to come forward as a Liberal candidate for Manchester, and signed by 700 members of the executive of the Manchester Liberal Association, was forwarded to the right honourable gentleman on Tuesday.—At a meeting of the Liberals of Midlothian, held in Edinburgh on Wednesday, a letter was read from Mr. Gladstone agreeing to contest Midlothian (Edinburghshire) at the next general election should the Liberal committees be united in his favour.

Lord Robert Montagu, M.P., has announced his withdrawal from the Home-Rule League, on the ground that the course taken by the Home-Rule party in Parliament during the last three Sessions has been injurious to the movement.

The meeting of the shareholders in the West of England and South Wales District Bank was held in Bristol on Wednesday, to receive the report of the official liquidators.

At Bow-street on Thursday, Edward Byrne Madden, aged fifty-six, who is said by the reporter to be a peculiarly mild and inoffensive looking man, and who is described as an "interpreter of languages," was charged on remand before Sir James Ingham with having threatened to kill the Queen. The defendant was apprehended on a warrant issued by the chief magistrate, in consequence of certain language used by the prisoner in letters addressed to the Hon. Adolphus Liddell, the Right Hon. R. A. Cross, and to Lord Lyons. Translations of the letters were read by the chief clerk. The prisoner was committed for trial.

The Christmas parties of this year may obtain a great deal of novel and ingenious entertainment from the "Guinea Pig" apparatus for optical and other scientific illusions of the senses which the London Stereoscopic Company has again provided. For the amusement of the youngest and the gayest Messrs. Thomas Smith and Co., of Wilson-street, Finsbury, have prepared a variety of "surprise crackers," which are exceedingly pretty in their decorative wrappings, and doubtless contain many sweet morsels of sugar-candy, with sweeter flatteries in the versified mottoes. We hope these things will help to make the long evenings seem short.

The executive of the City of Glasgow Bank Relief Committee met yesterday week, the Lord Provost presiding. The total sum subscribed now amounts to £321,423, of which £168,634 is from Glasgow, and £158,789 from other parts. The meeting was of opinion that the case of any shareholders of the Caledonian Bank who might be placed in necessitous circumstances through the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank should be favourably entertained.—Mr. Scott, one of the partners in Messrs. J. Innes Wright and Co., was examined in connection with his bankruptcy in Glasgow on Monday, and at the close of his examination was apprehended on a charge of embezzling £48,000, the proceeds of bills accepted by the City of Glasgow Bank. The trial of the directors is fixed to commence at Edinburgh on Jan. 20.

Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, the eminent pianoforte makers, of Wigmore-street, have manufactured a magnificent grand pianoforte for Mr. E. Ledger. The instrument comprises several most important improvements, whereby the touch and tone are brought to rare perfection. The mechanism applying to the key-board is simple and solid in structure, but nevertheless realises a touch that is most agreeable to the player, commanding all degrees of power and delicacy, and great readiness of repetition. The tone is of extreme beauty, and is unusually prolonged in vibration by the peculiar construction of the sounding-board, a specialty in which is that the thickness is greatest in the centre, diminishing towards the edges. The method of stringing, too, and additional bridges, are peculiar, and tend much to enhance the sonority and vibrating power. Another important feature in the instrument is the addition of a third pedal, which gives the performer the power of sustaining, almost indefinitely, some notes, while others may be played staccato. This is a particularly valuable quality. The metal framework used in the interior is of the most substantial kind, bracing the instrument together with a force that renders it independent of atmospheric changes. The workmanship is of the highest excellence in all the details, and the instrument is, altogether, an admirable specimen of English manufacture.

The third dose delivered me completely, and I am now completely restored to health. Receive, Sir, with the expression of my gratitude, the assurance of my distinguished sentiments."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE.—Dr. J. C. Browne (late Army Medical Staff) discovered a remedy, to decide which he coined the word CHLORODYNE. Dr. Browne is the Sole Inventor, and it is therefore evident that, as he has never published the formula, anything else sold under the name CHLORODYNE must be a piracy.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE.—All attempts at analysis have failed to discover its composition.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE.—Vice-Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood stated publicly in Court that Dr. J. Collis Browne was undoubtedly the inventor of Chlorodyne, that the whole story of the defendant was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say that it had been sworn to. See the "Times," July 13, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE is a Liquid Medicine which assuages pain of every kind, affords a calm and refreshing sleep WITHOUT HEADACHE, and invigorates the Nervous System when exhausted.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE.
COLDS, BRONCHITIS, COUGHS, ASTHMA.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE.
Extract from the "Medical Times," Jan 12, 1866.
"Is prescribed by scores of orthodox practitioners. Of course it would not be thus singularly popular did it not supply a want and fill a place."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE.
From Surgeon Hawthorne, Henry-street, Banbridge, Ireland.
"I have been in the habit of prescribing your preparation of Chlorodyne pretty largely these last three months. I have invariably found it useful, particularly in the latter stages of Phthisis, allaying the incessant and harassing cough; also in Chronic Bronchitis and Asthma."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE.
From F. J. Freeland, Esq., Surgeon, Chichester.
"Mr. Freeland presents his compliments to Mr. Davenport, and requests another supply of Chlorodyne. It has been of marked service in a Case of Diseased Chest, in allaying the cough, and relieved very severe 'after-pains' in another person."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE most effectually relieves those too often fatal diseases
CROUP and DIPHTHERIA.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE
is the great specific for
CHOLERA, DYSENTERY, DIARRHŒA.
Earl Russell communicated to the College of Physicians that he had received a despatch from her Majesty's Consul at Manilla to the effect that cholera had been raging fearfully and that the ONLY Remedy of any service was CHLORODYNE.—See "Lancet," Dec. 31, 1864.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE.
The General Board of Health, London, reports that it acts as a charm, one dose generally sufficient.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE.
Dr. Gibbon, Army Medical Staff, Calcutta, states—"Two doses completely cured me of diarrhœa."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE
rapidly cuts short all attacks of EPILEPSY, PALPITATION, SPASMS, HYSTERIA, COLIC.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S
CHLORODYNE
is the true palliative in
NEURALGIA, RHEUMATISM, GOUT, CANCER, TOOTHACHE.
From Jno. E. Gouldstone, M.D., late Principal Surgeon to the Steam-ship Great Eastern.
"I can confidently state that Chlorodyne is an admirable sedative and Anti-Spasmodic, having used it in Neuralgia, Hydœria, Asthma, and Consumption with remarkably favourable results. It relieved a fit of Asthma in four minutes, where the patient had suffered eleven years in a most distressing manner, no previous remedy having had so immediate and beneficial an effect."
From Dr. B. J. Boulton and Co., Harrogate.
"We have made pretty extensive use of Chlorodyne in our practice lately, and look upon it as an excellent direct sedative and Anti-Spasmodic. It seems to allay all pain and irritation in whatever organ, and from whatever cause. It induces a feeling of comfort and quietude not obtainable by any other remedy, and it seems to possess this great advantage over all other sedatives, that it leaves no unpleasant after-effects."

IMPORTANT CAUTION.
The immense sale of this remedy has given rise to many unscrupulous imitations.
N.B.—Every Bottle of GENUINE CHLORODYNE bears on the Government Stamp the Name of the INVENTOR,
DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE.
Sold in Bottles, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d.
J. T. DAVENPORT,

THE DIGITORIUM; or, Miniature Dumb Piano (Patent). Recommended by all the leading Professors of Music. Price 15s.; or, with ivory keys, 18s. (including the Exercises for practice), sent to any part of the country, carriage-free, on receipt of Post Office Order.

The Digitorium is an invention for strengthening and equalising the power of the fingers. It consists of a dumb key-board of five keys only, which are sprung lightly, heavily, or to a medium strength, as may be required by those using the instrument. At the bottom of the instrument a slide is made to draw out, which supports a small block of wood, intended as a rest for the wrist, and to relieve the muscles of the arm, which are not required to be brought into action. This slide may be drawn out to suit the length of the arm, so as to accommodate the direction of the touch. Small blocks of wood, in half circles, are fastened upon the sides of the instrument, which are used to produce great tension of the fingers.

THE AUTOGRAPHIC TELEGRAPH: SKETCHES AND AUTOGRAPH WRITINGS, SENT BY TELEGRAPH.

ILLUSTRATED BOOKS.

The eminent landscape artist, Mr. Birket Foster, publishes at his residence, The Hill, Witley, Surrey, a handsome volume entitled Brittany: A Series of Thirty-five Sketches, which is, as might be expected from his hand, a production of sterling excellence. The drawings, which he made on prepared paper, were transferred to stone by Messrs. Maclure and Macdonald, using a peculiar and delicate process, so that the lithographic impressions render Mr. Birket Foster's work precisely as he did it. He was accompanied, in a ramble through Brittany, by Captain C. G. Nelson, R.N., and Mr. Robert Dudley, to whom this publication is dedicated. Most of the subjects consist of quaint buildings and groups of figures, in their characteristic attire, such as may be seen in the picturesque old towns of that country. Morlaix, Quimper, Vitre, Dinan, and St. Malo contribute many of these interesting pieces of provincial costume and street scenery, or bits of antiquity like our well-known "Leaves from a Sketch-Book." The masterly drawing will be appreciated by all competent judges. The finest thick paper has been used for this volume, and the lithographs have all the effect of fine pencil or chalk drawings. Each of these is accompanied by a few lines of description on the opposite page.

One of the most important works of illustrated travel and topography is Switzerland: Its Mountains and Valleys, a superb volume, which is published by Messrs. Bickers and Son, of Leicester-square. The engravings on wood, designed by a dozen or twenty of the best German artists, and engraved by Mr. A. Closs, number above four hundred, and are of remarkably fine quality. The descriptive text is written by Herr Woldemar Raden, in a graphic, vigorous, animated style, the force of which has not been lost in this English translation. The volume is beautifully got up in printing, paper, and binding; and it forms an admirable memorial of the sublime Alpine scenery and attractive by-ways, the mountains, glaciers, rivers, and lakes, the historic old towns and romantic Swiss villages or hamlets, with their rustic population in their most engaging aspects of home life. Switzerland, indeed, is a joy for ever to the nations whose lot is cast in tamer regions of the European world.

But Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, in the new volume of their great work entitled Picturesque Europe, after treating in their first of the landscape beauties of the British Isles, present a most inviting variety of scenes from the favourite Continental haunts of our tourists. These are found in Normandy and Brittany, the Rhine, the Alps, the Cornice, the North Italian Lakes, Venice, Rome, and the Pyrenees, with the North of Spain and Castile. The descriptive chapters are written by the Rev. T. G. Bonney, Mr. R. J. King, Mr. Oscar Browning, Mr. Godfrey Turner, Mr. T. W. Hinchliff, and Mr. A. Griffiths. The artists employed to design the steel engravings, which are very finely executed, are Messrs. Birket Foster, Harry Fenn, Louis Haghe, T. L. Rowbotham, S. H. Hodson, L. J. Wood, and Kilburne, besides which there is an immense number of fine wood engravings, drawn by Messrs. Fenn and Rowbotham, Macquoid, R. P. Leitch, P. Skelton, Boot, and others. Upon the whole, it may be said that this volume is superior to any of its class that has yet been produced in England. Mr. Birket Foster's views of Orta, and Mr. H. Fenn's of San Giulio, on the Lake of Orta, the former engraved on steel by Mr. J. J. Crew, the latter on wood, are excellent specimens of their respective kinds. Mr. Boot's grand old oaks in the forest of Fontainebleau, and that other sylvan nook, half filled with luxuriant fern, which he has drawn for a headpiece to the chapter, are wonderfully true to nature. They might be studied with advantage as examples of real vegetable growth. We would refer also to the "Hospenthal," among the steel engravings, and to the "Hospice of St. Bernard," which are most effectively and truthfully delineated. The views of Rome are comparatively insignificant, but there is an ample feast of first-rate landscape and architectural illustration to please the educated eye, and sufficient good reading for the delightful instruction of an intelligent mind.

The powerful imaginative genius of Gustave Doré was never exerted more agreeably than in designing his illustrations to Alfred Tennyson's "Idylls of the King." This noble series of drawings has long been familiar to lovers of poetry and art. The Doré Gift-Book, this year published by Messrs. E. Moxon, Son, and Co., Salisbury-square, contains them all, thirty-five in number, with a special frontispiece in which the portrait of Tennyson is surrounded by figures of the persons whose adventures find place in his romantic narratives. The engravings on steel are beautifully executed by Messrs. J. Saddler, C. H. Jeens, W. Holl, T. O. Barlow, E. P. Brandard, J. Godfrey, A. Willmore, G. C. Finden, W. Ridgway, J. H. Baker, H. Robinson, W. H. Mote, J. Stephenson, and Greatbach, at a cost of nearly £6000, the publishers tell us; and this work is a fitting pictorial shrine for the Poet Laureate's most graceful and dignified conceptions, in which the charming old fables of British chivalry are reproduced with the more refined sentiment of modern domestic life. The introductory essay is well worth reading.

A tenth yearly volume of the droll, but generally truthful, portraits of distinguished men of the day, weekly issued in the paper called Vanity Fair, has now made its appearance It comprises fifty or sixty personages of greater or less note, the most important being the Prince of Wales, Lord Beaconsfield, Pope Leo XIII., and King Humbert of Italy. Their likenesses, drawn by "Ape" and "Spy," with three exceptions, will be recognised by those who are accustomed to see the men walking in Pall-mall or lounging at the clubs; but some of them are made cruelly ugly, and are dressed in such costumes as have not been worn in this generation. The short biographical notices, by "John Junior," have an affected air of knowing smartness, which proves that Vanity Fair is not, like Thackeray's Pall Mall Gazette, "written by gentlemen for gentlemen." This writer is often grossly impertinent; but his malicious insults are rather less offensive than his patronising commendations.

It was in 1786, under the title of "Gulliver Revived: or, the Vice of Lying Exposed," that an English version of The Adventures of Baron Munchausen was first published. The original of these fantastically boastful stories is stated by German scholars to be the old "Travels of the Finken-Ritter," composed in the sixteenth century; but a learned refugee from that country, Rudolf Raspe of Cassel, was the compiler of the narrative in its present form. The well-known German poet Bürger, in 1787, produced an edition with considerable improvements. These have been followed, to some extent, in the very complete and acceptable edition, with eight coloured illustrations, designed by A. Bichard, and rendered by the chromolithographic process, which Messrs. F. Warne and Co. have provided for the Christmas entertainment of juvenile readers. Boys of a lively temperament and quick fancy will be delighted with the narrative and the pictures, as the boys of our boyhood's time were pleased with the narrative by itself there being no such pictures then.

A charming Christmas gift for a little girl is the pretty box containing ten light volumes of Grimm's Fairy Library, published by Messrs. G. Routledge and Sons. Each volume has a coloured frontispiece and a good many small woodcuts, by E. H. Wehnert. The merits of this popular collection of German fairy tales, for which children are indebted to the Brothers Grimm, have been well appreciated by two past generations. Their spell is not yet broken; and this square case of amusing little books will keep many a young reader happy for hours together, and do no harm to the mind.

The art of the wood-engraver has been agreeably employed in Nature Pictures, consisting of thirty original illustrations of English rural scenery, drawn by Mr. J. H. Dell, and engraved by Mr. R. Paterson (publisher, F. Warne and Co.). Each picture is accompanied by two or three appropriate extracts from some of our favourite poets. It is a volume that will suit the taste of those quiet-loving minds to whom we referred last week, in noticing the illustrated edition of "Our Village."

Mr. Alfred Rimmer, whose volume entitled "Ancient Streets and Homesteads" gave us so much pleasure a year or two ago, has again used his skilful pen and pencil, in the same manner, to illustrate the topographical interest of a limited region. Pleasant Spots Around Oxford (Cassell, Petter, and Galpin) will gratify all those who care for what is truly English, such being the genuine characteristics of the midland country watered by the Isis, the Cherwell, and the Thame, which many of the University men, and perhaps many others, have frequently traversed in leisurely riverside rambles. The town and colleges of Oxford, except St. John's and Magdalen, New College and Merton, do not here occupy Mr. Rimmel's attention; but he leads us out, by Iffley Lock and Sandford Mill, to Abingdon, to Nuneham and Stanton Harcourt, to Dorchester and Radley; or up the river to Godstow and Woodstock, Blenheim Palace, and those "pleasant, old-fashioned" country towns, Bicester and Witney, of which we seldom get news in these days. These localities present quite enough that deserves notice to fulfil the promise of his titlepage.

A new edition of Dodd's Beauties of Shakspeare illustrated by Sir John Gilbert, R.A., is a publication the qualities of which are not now in need of being set forth by any particular commendation. Nor is it requisite to say much in favour of the Poetical Works of Robert Burns, edited, with an introductory biography and notes, by Mr. Charles Kent, and furnished with illustrations: this volume is neatly got up, and published by Routledge. The reprints of sterling works of our national literature will long continue to form part of the business that comes to hand at this season. Messrs. Routledge also supply an edition of St. Pierre's well-known sentimental romance, Paul and Virginia, which has quite as many English as French readers, and which is here illustrated by a large number of engravings. Their Picture Natural History, by the Rev. J. G. Wood, is a work of the most instructive character, and the author's capacity has been abundantly proved. The same enterprising firm also present us with a set of beautiful illustrations of Longfellow's mystic ballad, Excelsior! They represent the successive incidents of the aspiring hero's Alpine ascent, with the Convent of Mount St. Bernard; the designs are by several American artists, and engraved by Mr. A. V. S. Anthony. Uniform with the "Excelsior" is a sweet little poem called Baby May, by Mr. T. B. Aldrich, with its touching little pictures and bursts of song, which should be a comfort to all who have loved and lost, or who fear they may yet lose, such another nursery darling.

Our clever and amusing family conjuror, Professor Hoffmann, has again been at work, for Messrs. Routledge and their multitude of customers, and has artfully concocted a new book of Drawing-Room Amusements, or what may be called Evening Party Entertainments, of which he is the greatest literary expositor and tutor. Feats of seeming magic, card and coin tricks, here find their proper place; but the volume is chiefly devoted to instructions for playing a great variety of sociable games; those which he calls "games of action," such as blind-man's buff, hide-and-seek, or hunt the slipper; games of mental exertion, like "cross questions and crooked answers," or "what is my thought like?" forfeits, tableaux vivants, acted charades, riddles, and other contrivances for making harmless fun. It is a most useful book for young people who are now looking forward to the Christmas parties which we hope they will heartily enjoy.

The Right Hon. E. Knatchbull-Hugessen, M.P., late an Under-Secretary of State, is an indefatigable author of fresh stories for the diversion of boys and girls, and has not failed again to make his annual appearance in the juvenile book market, under the auspices of Routledge and Son. Uncle Joe's Stories, with six illustrations by Ernest Griset, comprise Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen's latest inventions in the interesting region of marvellous adventure; and Uncle Joe himself is a man of wonderful experiences among North American Indians, able to do more than hold a candle to Captain Mayne Reid. "Zac's Bride" is a fascinating little romance; and so is "Ophelia;" while "The Crones of Mersham" is a regular stiff old-fashioned English witch story, the scene being laid in Kent, near the right hon. gentleman's country seat at Smeeth, not far from Ashford. His rustic neighbours had better look out.

The sixth and concluding volume of Old and New London, published by Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, should ere this have obtained from us the due acknowledgment, but that time and space have been much encroached upon by recent pressing affairs. It will be remembered that this important work of metropolitan topography and local history was commenced under the editorship of the late Mr. G. W. Thornbury, whose task has been completed by Mr. Edward Walford. The last-named gentleman, an equally competent editor, took it up with the third volume, which was devoted, and the fourth as well, to "the western suburbs," including Westminster. The fifth volume shifted its ground to the northern suburbs of London; and now we have the southern—namely, the Borough of Southwark, Bermondsey, and Rotherhithe, with Deptford, Greenwich, Blackheath, Lee, Lewisham, Charlton, and Eltham, in one direction; Newington, Walworth, Camberwell, Peckham, and Dulwich in another; Kennington and Stockwell, Brixton and Clapham, Sydenham, Norwood, and Streatham along their respective lines of road; again, nearer the centre, St. George's-fields, Blackfriars-road, Bethlehem, Lambeth, and Vauxhall; and, farther to the south-west, Wandsworth and Putney, returning by Fulham, Hammersmith, and Chiswick, thus presenting a wide panoramic view of the notable sites and buildings, with their diverse associations of persons and events in successive ages, all round the south portion of this vast metropolis. We hope to find leisure for an attentive examination of the work; and we expect occasionally to seek the information which it seems well calculated to afford, as a book of reference, freely testifying our obligations to the researches of its able editor. The illustrations, of which there is a great abundance, both invite and assist the reading of its text.

This is a suitable occasion for noticing the yearly volumes of several valuable publications by Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin. Science for All is edited by Dr. Robert Brown, who has also edited, for that firm, an interesting geographical miscellany, Countries of the World, with a variety of illustrative engravings. The popular scientific essays, composing the first-named publication, are original contributions from men of high special attainments, such as Professors Alleyne Nicholson, P. Martin Duncan, and A. Leith Adams, Mr. R. A. Proctor, Dr. R. J. Mann, and Dr. Andrew Wilson. They treat of physics, astronomy, geology, chemistry, vegetable and animal physiology, and other branches of the knowledge of nature, in a style which presents not much difficulty to an ordinary thoughtful reader. Cassell's Natural History, edited by Professor P. Martin Duncan, with the assistance of Dr. J. Muire and Mr. W. S. Dallas, likewise appears from an inspection of its first volume to be a work of substantial merit, as an introduction to the study of zoology. The newly-completed volume of Professor Henry Morley's Library of English Literature, compiled for the same publishers, consists of a series of critical and historical notices, with extracted passages of English Plays, from the oldest "mystery plays" of the Middle Ages, down to Mr. Tennyson's "Harold" and "Queen Mary." Even though we had never a Shakspeare, this is a splendid array of the poetical and dramatic creations of genius in our national literature, and it is well to have them so brought under review. The Magazine of Art, mainly occupied with instructive commentary upon works of true excellence in painting, sculpture, and the most important decorative arts, will be acceptable to many who desire guidance upon these subjects of discriminating taste. It is adorned with a sufficient number of serviceable illustrations.

A treatise on Art-Embroidery, by M. S. Lockwood and F. Glaister, is published by Messrs. Marcus Ward and Co. M. de Laborde claims for the ancient art of embroidery the supremacy over painting itself in the first centuries of our era; and recognises the serious rivalry maintained by it to the close of the fifteenth century. "I know of no greater service," he adds, "that could be rendered to the arts than to write a history of embroidery; it would be not so much a complement as the introduction to, and the necessary accompaniment of, a genuine history of painting." But there is little to indicate any such importance in the subject in the book before us. And to turn from M. Jacquemart's chapter on "Embroidery" to these pages is a descent indeed. It is true that this nicely got-up quarto claims only to be a "Treatise on the Revived Practice of Decorative Needlework;" yet with a Royal School of Art-Needlework recently established the public might reasonably have expected something more important. Nor, when we reflect upon what the famous English church embroidery, "Opus Anglicum," must have been, or upon what church embroidery and lace were in later centuries in Italy and elsewhere, are we prepared to find these most important branches of art-needlework slurred over and dismissed with a reference to "more exhaustive treatises." However, taken simply for what it is—to wit, scarcely a "treatise," but an introduction to the mysteries of crewel, tent, satin, chain, herring-bone, and other stitches or points; appliqué, French-knot, and so forth, with hints on materials, methods, design, and colour—the book will be useful to beginners; and it is, furthermore, written with clearness and taste. Nevertheless, there are some points to which we should take exception. For example, the statement — which, however, is afterwards qualified—that the colours chosen must not be in contrast, but in harmony, is contradicted by much of the practice of the great schools of decoration. The principle that all colours should be either brighter or darker than the ground would sacrifice the charm of mystery, and violate the principle in painting of "finding and losing." "Colours from vegetable dyes" should not be preferred on account of their durability; on the contrary, they are nearly all fugitive; it is the colours or pigments from natural earths that are durable. The illustrative designs, by Mr. Thomas Crane, printed in colours, have only the merit of unpretentiousness.

The Holbein Society's last publication (in continuation of its series of facsimile reprints) consists of a portion of the first edition of Caxton's Golden Legend, reproduced from an incomplete copy in the Manchester Free Library; together with facsimiles of several pages of the edition of the Dutch version, or "Passionael," printed at Antwerp by Heinrick Eckert van Homberch in 1505. The woodcut illustrations to Caxton's edition are interesting as probably by an English hand, though bearing, as will be seen, a close resemblance to contemporary Dutch illustrations. The woodcut of the Assembly of the Saints, which serves as frontispiece to the work, is the largest that Caxton is known to have used. Generally, the cuts are superior to those of the "Parvus Chato" and "The Mirrour of the World;" those, however, as Caxton's first attempts at book-illustration by means of wood-engraving, must ever be regarded with more peculiar interest. The reprints edited and accompanied by a very useful introduction from the pen of the Society's editor, Mr. Alfred Aspland. The whole history of the "Legenda Aurea" is given, from its compilation by Jacobus de Voragine, Archbishop of Genoa, late in the thirteenth century, down to the time of Caxton. There is also a narration of the commencement, two centuries subsequently, by Bollandus, the Belgian Jesuit, under the title "Acta Sanctorum," of a systematic Hagiology, or history of the twenty thousand acknowledged saints in their order in the calendar—a scheme which has been advanced from time to time, and which is said to be still prosecuted by the Belgian Jesuits. Sixty volumes have been required to reach the date of Oct. 28; and it is computed that it will require at least a century longer to reach the last day of December. Caxton's introduction into the Golden Legend of a large portion of the Bible (including the whole of the Pentateuch and a great part of the Gospels), although unavowed by him, on account of his fear of the Inquisition, and although accompanied by much priestly gloss, is thought by Mr. Henry Stevens to have materially aided in preparing the way for the Reformation, by creating a demand among the people for the Scriptures in a purer form.

Mr. W. H. Lascelles, of Bunhill-row, has issued a series of twenty-eight Sketches for Cottages and Other Buildings, from sketches and notes by Mr. Norman Shaw, R.A., which may be warmly recommended to country builders. The sketches are designed to be carried out in Mr. Lascelles' "Patent Cement Slab System," which offers several advantages besides its cheapness. The sketches comprise a "But and Ben," or two-roomed Scotch cottage, various other cottages with increased accommodation, an entrance lodge, a shooting-box or bungalow, villa and seaside residences, a small mission-church and school-chapel, workmen's village hall and club, billiard and smoking room, boat-house, stable, cottage hospital, almshouses, and shops for village street. The architect's sense of the picturesque, and his affection for olden precedents, are conspicuous in these designs. We can only complain that his predilections occasionally (as in the low-browed rooms of some of these sketches) lead him to forget the modern requirements of comfort and hygiene.

There has been very severe weather in Scotland, the snow in some parts having been three feet in depth, and railway traffic having been much impeded.

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The season is to close this (Saturday) evening. "Oberon" was given on Thursday week for the second time since its revival (on the previous Saturday), and was announced again for Wednesday morning and for the closing night. During the past week Signor Bonetti appeared as Giorgio Germont, in "La Traviata," and was well received. Last Wednesday evening was devoted to the benefit of Mdlle. Marimon; Thursday to that of Madame Trebelli; and Friday (yesterday) to that of Madame Pappenheim.

The series of performances has been very successful, the public having largely appreciated the advantages of lower prices, earlier hours, and freedom from the usual restrictions as to evening dress. The reproduction of Bizet's "Carmen," with Madame Trebelli's first assumption of the principal character; the revival of Weber's "Oberon," after an interval of eight years; and the successful début of Mdlle. Ambre, have given a special interest to Mr. Mapleson's winter season. A word is due to Signor Li Calsi for his unwearied fulfilment of the duties of conductor, an onerous office, with nightly performances and occasional matinées in addition.

MADAME VIARD-LOUIS'S CONCERTS.

The second of the new series of these excellent concerts at St. James's Hall took place on Tuesday evening, when the selection began with a fine performance of Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," which was followed by one of the novelties of the evening, a characteristic and effective "Rondo Scherzoso" for orchestra, entitled "The Brooklet," composed by F. Conder (Mendelssohn's scholar).

A prominent feature in the programme was the late Herman Goetz's orchestral symphony in F major This is the production of the composer of the opera "The Taming of the Shrew," recently brought out at Drury-Lane Theatre, and noticed by us. The symphony consists of four divisions—"Allegro Moderato," "Intermezzo" (allegretto), "Adagio ma non troppo lento," and Finale ("Allegro con fuoco"). The symphony is intended to be illustrative of a motto from Schiller—"In des Herzens heilig stille Raume musst du fliehen aus des Lebens Drang!" There is much ingenious writing in each of the movements, the instrumentation being throughout very skilful. The portions that pleased most were the "Intermezzo" and the "Adagio," particularly the latter, which is full of beauty. We shall probably have an opportunity of speaking further of the work on a future hearing.

The remainder of the orchestral selection at Tuesday's concert consisted of Boccherini's "Minuet," for strings (encored), the charming ballet music from Cherubini's last opera, "Ali Baba," and the imposing March from Berlioz's "Les Troyens."

Madame Viard-Louis played Mozart's concerto in D minor (with elaborate new Cadenza, composed by Dr. G. A. Macfarren), and was much applauded after her performance. In consequence of a recent accident, the lady was unable to play a second time, as announced, and was replaced by Miss Bessie Richards, who gave Chopin's "Scherzo" in B flat minor with fine style and execution.

Another apology and substitution were made, on account of the illness of Madame Pappenheim, instead of whom Miss Merivale appeared, and sang, with much effect, Gounod's aria "Jerusalem," and "Vado ben spesso," by Salvator Rosa, both of which were well accompanied by Mr. H. Leipold.

The orchestral playing in each piece was of the same special excellence as heretofore; Mr. H. Weist-Hill having again conducted with rare ability.

At this week's Monday Popular Concert (the last evening performance of the year) Mdlle. Janotha was again the pianist, as on the preceding Monday, the quartet part having also been as before. The vocalist in the former instance was Miss de Fonblanque; on the latter occasion, Miss Clara Merivale; Mr. Zerbini having then replaced Sir J. Benedict as conductor. The last afternoon concert of the year takes place this day (Saturday). The evening concerts will be resumed on Jan. 6; the afternoon performances on the following Saturday.

The last concert of the Crystal Palace for the present year took place on Saturday last, when the programme derived special importance from having included Beethoven's ninth and last (the "Choral") symphony—that gigantic work which includes, as its final portion, a setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy." The three great orchestral divisions preceding this were finely played on Saturday, and the vocal portion was generally well rendered, considering its extreme difficulty. Miss Emma Thursby, Mdlle. Redeker, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley having been the solo vocalists, the choral part having been sung by the Crystal Palace choir. The symphony was preceded by Sir J. Benedict's effective overture to Heinrich von Kleist's drama, "Das Kathchen von Heilbronn;" the dance of nymphs and reapers from Mr. A. Sullivan's "Tempest" music; and vocal solos contributed by Miss Thursby, Mdlle. Redeker, and Mr. Santley. Handel's Dead March in "Saul" was played before the concert in respect to the memory of the late Princess Alice. The Saturday afternoon performances will be resumed on Feb. 8.

Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," an English adaptation of his Biblical opera, "Mosé in Egitto," was given by the Sacred Harmonic Society yesterday (Friday) week, for the second time. Of the genius and beauty of the music (bright and melodious rather than religious in style) we spoke in reference to its first production in oratorio form by the Society in May last, when six of the principal solo vocalists were the same as in last week's performance; these being Madame L Sherrington, Miss Julia Elton, Mdlle. Enequist, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Bridson; Mr. B. Lane having replaced Mr. W. Wells in some of the concerted music. A special feature on this occasion was the fine singing of Mr. Santley, for the first time, in the music belonging to the character of Moses; another specialty having been Mr. Lloyd's excellent delivery—as on the previous occasion—of the music of Amenophis. As before, many of the pieces, concerted and solo, produced a marked impression: and the performance proved so attractive that it is proposed to repeat it on some morning in January.

Yesterday (Friday) evening the Sacred Harmonic Society's forty-seventh annual performance of "The Messiah" took place at Exeter Hall, the solo singers named having been Madame Blanche Cole, Miss Enriquez, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lewis Thomas.—The same oratorio is to be given by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society on Thursday next.

Madame Sainton Dolby gave a concert at Steinway Hall on Tuesday, at which the vocal music was performed by pupils studying in her Vocal Academy.

The last of Mr. John Boosey's London Ballad Concerts for the present year took place on Wednesday, when attractions of the usual popular and varied nature were provided.

Mr. W. Carter's concert at the Royal Albert Hall on Thursday evening consisted of a selection of airs and choruses from oratorios and other sacred pieces; Mesdames Edith Wynne and Antoinette Sterling and Mr. Vernon Rigby having been among the solo singers announced.

THEATRES.

In preparation for the new season the Strand management have provided for their patrons a new musical extravaganza. On Saturday this was produced, under the title of "The Desperate Adventures of the Baby; or, A Wandering Heir," by Messrs. C. H. Ross and A. G. Freer. It was preceded, however, by the farce "On and Off," and the late Bayle Bernard's comic drama, "His Last Legs." It is needless to say that these two pieces were in all respects satisfactorily performed. In the latter the cast was strengthened by the fact that Mr. W. H. Vernon sustained the eccentric part of O'Callaghan, the man of genius on his last legs; and that Mr. H. J. Turner impersonated Mr. Rivers. The new extravaganza is from the French, and no attempt is made to alter the manners or locality of the action. Indeed, one chief attraction of the adaptation consists of the Parisian sketches of scenery taken on the spot by Mr. H. P. Hall, and the Parisian costumes supplied by M. Faustin and M. and Madame Alias. The spirit of the composition is farcical, and the fun evolved simply extravagant; but it is well enough adapted to the season and the company. It is in five scenes. The first consists of the Dentist's Emporium in the Boulevard Sebastopol, where the loss of the Baby, owing to the flirtations of the nurse, throws a christening party into a terrible consternation. We are next treated with a panoramic view of the Seine, from Notre Dame to the Exhibition. Subsequent scenes represent the Champs Elysées, with the Place de la Concorde and the Arc de Triomphe; the Trocadéro during the Exhibition, and several Moorish café and panoramic views. Through these various scenes the pursuit for the recovery of the baby, and some lost love-letters written by a young Viscount to a romantic widow, is continued, until both the baby and the correspondence are found and restored to their owners. Of the performers, the prominent rôle is assigned to M. Marius, who, as the Rajar Real Jam, represents an exaggerated Othello; and he is ably supported by Miss Violet Cameron, as the Comtesse de la Houppe, both as an actress and a vocalist—showing herself, in fact, a refined artist in both. The delinquent nurse, Dodlinette, is effectively sustained by Miss Lottie Venne. Throughout, the prevailing drollery is promoted by the best efforts of the actors, and will doubtless be appreciated by the public.

A trifling vaudeville by Frank Desprez and Alfred Cellier, called "After All," has been produced at the Opéra Comique. The theatre will be closed after the 24th inst. for repairs, and not reopened until Feb. 1, 1879.

Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's entertainment has received an addition fitted for the Christmas season. Mr. Alfred Law is the author of a new play entitled "Enchantment," which is likely to find acceptance with holiday seekers. It is qualified as a musical fairy tale, and is well suited for a drawing-room entertainment. The fable of Circe is here in spirit utilised and modernised for the gratification of juvenile fancy; and there can be no doubt that at this season the little drama of "Enchantment" will meet with popular support.

PANTOMIMES.

Mr. E. L. Blanchard will supply the pantomime for DRURY LANE, under the title of "Cinderella; or, Harlequin and the Fairy Slipper." There will, as usual, be a double harlequinade, supported by the Lauri family and others. COVENT GARDEN, under the management of Messrs. Gatti, takes for its subject "Jack and the Bean-stalk." The harlequinade will be supported by Messrs. Payne, Vokes, and others. At the GAIETY the Princess's pantomime of 1859, rewritten by Mr. H. J. Byron, will be produced, called "Jack the Giant-Killer." A novel ballet, with peculiar effects, will be introduced, in which Miss Ænea will sustain the leading rôle. At the GLOBE morning performances of a juvenile opera and a series of pantomimic ballets will be given, supported by eight prime ballerine and six mimi—ages ranging from eight to fifteen. At the STANDARD the pantomime of "Robin Hood and his Merry Men" will be performed, including the spectacles of the Trysting Tree, Sherwood Forest, a ballet of foresters and their maidens, a representation of the Isle of Cyprus, a pageant, illustrating the conquest of Cyprus by Richard Cœur de Lion, in 1195; and the marriage of Richard and Queen Berengaria. The piece at the ALHAMBRA represents "The Goose with the Golden Eggs," and is produced to-day. At the AQUARIUM the pantomime is entitled "Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp," written by the Brothers Grinn. At the SURREY Mr. Mackay has provided "The House that Jack Built;" at SANGER'S AMPHITHEATRE Mr. H. Spry supplies the familiar story of "Cinder Ella;" and at the VICTORIA Mr. Frank Hall presents us with "Tom Tiddler; or, Harlequin Jack in the Box who Deals Nasty Knocks, and Doubleheady Daddy the Demon." The GRECIAN produces the twenty-second joint production of Messrs. George Conquest and H. Spry, called "Harlequin Hokee-Pokee, the Fiend of the Fungus Forest; or, The Six Links of the Demon's Chain." Mr. Conquest's impersonation of a Chinese is expected to be especially good. Mr. F. Marchant supplies the BRITANNIA with "The Magic Mule; or, The Ass's Skin, the Princess to Win." The PARK theatre, now under the management of the Messrs. Douglass, will open on Boxing Night with "The Forty Thieves." "Little Red Riding Hood" will be produced at the PAVILION; and "Sindbad the Sailor" at the ALBION, Poplar. The ELEPHANT AND CASTLE theatre opens on Boxing Night with "The Babes in the Wood." At the HOLBORN AMPHITHEATRE Mr. Hamilton's "Excursion Across the Continent" will be continued. The equestrian novelty at HENGLER'S CIRQUE is entitled "Bonnie Prince Charley;" and at the MARYLEBONE we have "Jack the Giant-Killer; or, Harlequin Mary, Mary, Quite Contrary."

The pantomime at the ALEXANDRA PALACE, written by G. R. O'Halloran, is "Dick Whittington," the parts of the hero and his sweetheart being played by Miss Lilian Cavalier and Miss Susie Vaughan. Madame San Martino-Campobello and Mr. Edmund Rosenthal (both eminent on the opera stage) take leading parts in the opening scenes. The famous Girards, Pongo redivivus, and the Rowella troupe are specially engaged. The scenery is painted by W. Emden. After the transformation-scene, entitled "A Christmas Card," the next scene in importance is of a shipwreck, which is so constructed that the vessel with all hands will sink bodily beneath the waves. The ballets are arranged by Mr. John Lauri; the principal danseuse is Mdlle. Lana. Besides the pantomime there will be each day the "Little Folks'" Doll Show, Holden's Marionettes, Wieland's Circus, Zæo, the wonderful Girl Gymnast, military band, organ, &c. At the CRYSTAL PALACE "Robinson Crusoe" will be the attraction. At the AGRICULTURAL HALL the Mohawks will return, and open with a new programme. The MUSIC-HALLS promise new ballets and new programmes.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

"Chappell's Musical Magazine" (Chappell and Co., New Bond-street). The Christmas number of this cheap serial contains nine pieces of dance music for the pianoforte in the several forms of quadrille, waltz, galop, and polka. That these are suitable to the intended purposes was a matter of course in a publication that has so long maintained a special character in this respect (the present number being the 119th). The names of the composers who have contributed to it are Charles D'Albert, E. Waldteufel, F. Godfrey, A. G. Crowe, and H. Louis.

The Contralto Album (Boosey and Co.). This volume is one of the extensive series of "Royal Editions" published by the eminent house in Regent-street. It contains fifty choice songs for a mezzo-soprano or contralto voice (in the original keys), selected mostly from celebrated operas, each song having Italian and English words. Some of the pieces are taken from works that have long been ignored in stage performance, but yet contain airs that are worthy of preservation. Accordingly, we find in this interesting collection some charming solos from shelved operas by Handel, Bononcini, Gluck, Pacini, Winter, Mercadante, Vaccaj, and Donizetti. The volume is well edited by Mr. Josiah Pittman, and forms an interesting and valuable répertoire for vocalists of the class specified. The book is well adapted for a Christmas or New-Year's gift.

Christmas Carols, New and Old (Novello, Ewer, and Co.), is the third series of a cheap collection of pieces appropriate to the present season. The words have been selected from various sources, some traditional, others taken from poets of the past and present periods. This portion of the work has been edited by the Rev. H. R. Bramley, Dr. J. Stainer being the editor of the music, which consists of ancient melodies and some supplied by living composers. This third division of the work contains twenty-six carols.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co. have also issued—among their cheap octavo editions—the fine "Stabat Mater" of Astorga, a celebrated Sicilian composer of the seventeenth and early part of the eighteenth century. "The Stabat Mater" is one of his finest works, and has been pronounced by Hauptmann (a high authority) to be superior to Pergolesi's. The same firm has also published an effective pianoforte arrangement of M. Gounod's "Marche Solennelle," a fine orchestral piece, in which the stately solemnity of the march is charmingly contrasted by the grace of the trio.

"A Second Set of Sixty Voluntaries, arranged for the Harmonium by J. W. Elliott" (Novello, Ewer, and Co), will be found serviceable to amateurs of that instrument.

Ashdown and Parry's fourth "Album of Dance Music." This is a publication (from the well-known firm in Hanover-square) similar in size, price, and purpose to that noticed above. The contents consists of two waltzes, three sets of quadrilles, a galop, a polka, a schottische, a polka mazurka, and a country dance. The contributors are Messrs. G. Coote, jun., Marriott, W. C. Levey, C. Godfrey, and E. M. Lott.

AUTOGRAPHIC TELEGRAPHY.

Autographic telegraphy, or the process of transmitting messages in the actual handwriting of the sender, has occasionally during the past thirty years constituted the special study of scientific minds. So long since as 1850 Mr. F. C. Bakewell invented a copying telegraph by means of which autographic telegraphy was effected, and this was probably the first time it was effectually accomplished. In this instance the message was written by the sender with a gummy ink or varnish on metallic paper or tinfoil, and this writing was by the aid of mechanism used to actuate electric currents in such a way as to produce a record at the distant station by the chemical decomposition of a solution with which the receiving paper was damped. Both the written message and the paper were fixed around cylinders of similar form and dimensions, one being placed in the transmitting and the other in the recording instrument, and the cylinders were caused to revolve with corresponding velocities. Each time the gummy and, consequently, raised lines of the writing were crossed by a pointer under which the metallic paper was traversed in the transmitter, a mark corresponding in position was made on the prepared paper at the receiving end. It therefore followed that the sum of all the marks reproduced the writing itself. Mr. Bakewell successfully reproduced the writing in white on a blue ground, but the process failed to become one of public utility owing to the extreme slowness with which the apparatus worked and the difficulty that was experienced in maintaining uniform and synchronous motion in the instruments. In 1856 the Abbé Caselli, in Italy, endeavoured to solve the problem of autographic telegraphy in a similar manner. His apparatus was exhibited in England, and it was used practically between Paris and Marseilles and Paris and Lyons. Plans, drawings, and autograph sketches were faithfully reproduced at distant places, but it was found that the apparatus had not only the defects of Bakewell's, but it was very costly and complicated. Two other subsequent workers in this direction were M. Meyer and M. Lenoir, who tried to accomplish the same results with ordinary ink. They, however, pursued their investigations quite independently of and unknown to each other. We have recently been afforded the opportunity of examining the latest example of this class of apparatus at the General Post Office, where it has been submitted to the authorities for trial. This is the invention of M. d'Arlincourt, of Paris, and its general principles are similar to those which govern Bakewell's system. The distinguishing feature in d'Arlincourt's apparatus, however, is the introduction a is a box containing wheelwork, driven by two mainsprings, which give motion to the metallic roller b. The train of wheelwork is governed by the vibrating spring c, in the same manner as the type-printing instrument of Professor Hughes. In addition to this vibrating spring, a similar one, d, is fixed next to it, in the same standard, but is not in direct communication with the wheelwork. It receives its motion from the spring c, simply by the vibrations communicated by the latter, through the standard on which the springs are fixed. These springs are so adjusted, at each end of the wire, that their speeds are tolerably alike. The tinfoil paper for transmitting, or the prepared chemical paper for receiving, is fixed on the roller b. The metallic steel style in each case moves longitudinally and slowly along the cylinder by means of a screw, to which the standard holding the style is fixed. The roller b, at the sending station, stops automatically at each revolution, and is restarted by the roller at the receiving station at the proper time. By this means absolute synchronism is obtained, and there can be no accumulation of error. e consists of permanent and electro magnets; it forms a rapid relay by the line current, and it relays a current of sufficient intensity to discolour the chemically prepared paper. f shows the mechanical arrangement for the adjustment of the style in the proper place on the roller. g, end of same, showing its under side.

of an extremely ingenious synchronous movement, by means of which the speed of travel of the cylinders is rendered uniform, both in the transmitting and the recording machine. The message to be sent, which may be either in the ordinary hand or shorthand, is written with a thick gummy ink upon a strip of metallic-faced paper about 12 inches long and 2½ in deep, which is wrapped around the cylinder of the transmitting instrument. A strip of white paper chemically prepared and of similar dimensions is placed on the cylinder of the recording apparatus, and the instruments are placed in electrical connection and started. The raised writing, actuating the electric current, causes a reproduction of the original message in facsimile on the paper in the recording instrument, which may be hundreds of miles away from the other. Upon the occasion of our visit the two instruments, although in the same room, were practically placed 200 miles apart. The writing can be reproduced in either blue, brown, red, or black, according to the chemical preparation of the paper, but always on a white ground, and a number of copies can be taken from one original. In the same way, sketches, plans, or drawings may be faithfully transmitted; some sketches were, in fact, accurately reproduced on the occasion of our visit. Although the apparatus is perfect in its action, it still has one drawback, which was common to its predecessors—that of slowness of reproduction. The time occupied in revolving the cylinder a sufficient number of times to allow the pointer to traverse the whole surface of the paper in seven minutes, and this rate of speed is far below that required and attained in practice for commercial purposes. The Post Office authorities, to whom we are indebted for our inspection, do not, therefore, see their way to utilise M. d'Arlincourt's ingenious invention at present. It is however, being worked in France in fortresses and for similar military purposes, for which, in some special cases, it is exceedingly well adapted.

We present an Illustration of the apparatus constructed by M. d'Arlincourt, which may easily be understood by reference to the foot-notes and to the above general description. The Engravings on another page represent several writings and drawings which were actually transmitted, through the apparatus, from one instrument to the other, and which could, as we are told, have been transmitted, by the same means, a distance of two hundred miles. One of these supposed messages was supplied by a member of the Chinese Legation in Paris, who visited the exhibition of M. d'Arlincourt's invention. It consists of three perpendicular lines of Chinese handwriting. The second article consigned to the Autograph Telegraph is a little sketch of a girl selling cups of cocoa at the Paris International Exhibition The other drawings, probably by the hand of a French military engineer, who may have come among other visitors to M. d'Arlincourt, are such as might be made to give serviceable information during a siege, of the position of the parallel lines of intrenchments, and of the siege-gun and mortar batteries engaged in the attack of the fortress. These matters are signified by the written words, with alphabetical references, which appear on the drawing. The remaining sketches afford an exterior view, and an internal transverse section, of a gun-turret erected in some land fortress, the construction of which it is desirable to explain by a telegraphic message, to some persons at a long distance, perhaps in a foreign country. It is imagined that a spy in time of war, if not a newspaper Special Correspondent, might possibly avail himself of the Automatic Telegraph to send plans or sketches of military preparations. We should much prefer to see this ingenious contrivance applied to peaceful and innocent purposes, whenever it is made ready for practical use.

OBITUARY.

THE GRAND DUCHESS OF HESSE.

Her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess of Hesse, Princess Alice of Great Britain and Ireland, died at Darmstadt on the 14th inst., deeply deplored. In the appropriate words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in proposing an address of condolence to her Majesty, "Apart from her Royal birth and exalted station, the Princess Alice had qualities which would command our admiration. Whether as the daughter, ministering by the death-bed of her father, as the sister exerting herself as the skilful nurse of her brother, or as the tender mother, who might be said to have sacrificed her life in the affectionate care of her children, or whether we recall the time when she came forward to alleviate the sufferings of the sick and wounded in her adopted country, we recognise in her that combination of warmth of heart, soundness of judgment, and practical energy, which go to make up the perfection of womanhood." The Grand Duchess, in former times our own "Princess Alice," was born April 25, 1843, the third child of her Majesty, was married at Osborne, July 1, 1862, to H.R.H. WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Jan. 2, 1877) of Mr. Richard Thornton West, of Streatham Hall, near Exeter, who died on Nov. 29 last, has been proved by his widow, Mrs. Sarah West, and his brothers-in-law, Richard John Bowerman, of 4, Gray's-inn-square, and Thomas Palmer Eames, of Cotley, near Chard, the acting executors, the personal estate being sworn under £1,000,000. The testator leaves to his wife all his plate, furniture, horses, carriages, wines, pictures, &c., absolutely, with a present legacy of £4000; for her life his estate called "Streatham Hall," with all the lands belonging thereto, and £10,000 per annum, subject to reduction in the event of her marrying again, and also the additional yearly sum of £3000 for the maintenance and education of each of his children. After the decease or second marriage of his widow, the testator devises the Streatham Hall estate to his son Richard Bowerman West absolutely. To his nephew, Robert Thornton, he bequeaths a legacy of £3000; to his sister-in-law, Mrs. Elizabeth Eames, and her children, £3000; to his two executors, Richard John Bowerman and Thomas Palmer Eames, legacies of £3000 each, unless they refuse to act; to each of his god-children (eight in number) he leaves £1000; to his friends, John Browne and John S. Neall, Richard M. Jones, and Francis W. Arkcoll, £500 each; to all his domestic servants, gardeners and labourers employed on the estate, sums varying from £10 to £200. By the will of the late Mr. Frederick Gye, the Royal Italian Opera-House, amongst other property, has been left entirely to his family; and they have decided to carry on the Royal Italian Opera as usual. Mr. Ernest Gye, who has for some years been associated with his father in the Opera, will, with Mr Herbert Gye, undertake the management. The season of 1879 will commence in April, and Madame Patti, Madame Albani, and all the great artists of the establishment are engaged and will appear.

THE SUNBURY WALL DECORATION.

THE SUNBURY WALL DECORATION.

THE SUNBURY WALL DECORATION is in Ornamental Relief, like wood-carving. It is waterproof, and impermeable to moisture or damp. It is singularly indestructible, and the first cost is the last. It can be washed, or even scrubbed, with soap and water. It will not absorb infection. It is therefore highly sanitary. It has a warm and comfortable appearance. It can be adapted by architects to any style of building. It is suitable for Drawing-Rooms, Dining-Rooms, Morning-Rooms, Billiard-Rooms, Halls, Theatres and Concert-Rooms, Churches and Chapels, Steam-Boats, and Rail way Carriages. It is applicable for Dados, Panels, Cornices Friezes, Borders, Door-Panels, Cabinet-Panels, Folding Screens.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

THE BUILDER.—For the internal decoration of houses its warm and comfortable appearance makes it peculiarly applicable.

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—We need not hesitate to say that Muralis is destined to play a very important part in the present revival of the arts of wall embellishment.

THE BUILDING NEWS.—The clearness and precision of the ornamental on leaves no ling to be desired.

THE COURT CIRCULAR.—It is obvious that Muralis has a great future before it, and that it will, at no distant date, obtain a wide popularity.

WHITEHALL REVIEW.—No words of mine could convey an accurate idea of its utility and beauty.

COURT JOURNAL.—One advantage, too, is, it is quite proof against indentation.

SIR G. DUNCAN GIBB, Bart., M.D.,
Physician to the Westminster Hospital.
"The value of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL as a therapeutic agent in a number of diseases, chiefly of an exhaustive character, has been admitted by the world of medicine; but, in addition, I have found it a remedy of great power in the treatment of many Affections of the Throat and Larynx, especially in Consumption of the latter, where it will sustain life when everything else fails."

DR. SINCLAIR COGHILL,
Physician Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor.
"I have convinced myself that in Tubercular and the various forms of Strumous Disease, Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL possesses greater therapeutic efficacy than any other Cod-Liver Oil with which I am acquainted. It was especially noted in a large number of cases in which the patients preferred they had never been able to retain or digest other Cod-Liver Oil, that Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL was not only tolerated, but taken readily, and with marked benefit."

LENNOX BROWNE, Esq., F.R.C.S.E.,

"The action of Dr. de Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil has proved, in my own experience, particularly valuable, not only in those diseases for which it was originally employed, but also in many cases of weakness of the Singing and Speaking Voice, dependent on Bronchial or Laryngeal Irritation, and in all forms of Strumous Enlargement of Glands, and Discharges from the Ear."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1878.

Another Christmas Day gone! Another year close upon its decease. Rigorous winter around us; distress everywhere prevailing; commercial depression, such as we have seldom seen in this country, and to the end of which we cannot yet see, making itself felt amongst a large section of the trading classes; manufacturing industry, to a fearful extent, paralysed; labour unemployed; destitution rapidly on the increase; all the springs of prosperity so low as to threaten exhaustion;—such is the gloomy position upon which we take our stand to glance back at the general character of the year which in a few days will have completed its course. It has been a year marked by a succession of surprises, of anxieties, of unrest. But a year which there is some reasonable ground for believing has carried us forward to a somewhat brighter region of hope.

The meteorology of 1878 has not deviated so far from traditional precedents as to awaken surprise. Its spring time was mild and genial, closing, however, with a long season of wet. Its Summer was chequered, but predominantly fine. Its Autumn was, for the most part, cheery and crisp. Its Winter is such as we see. In the North very severe; in the South (apart from dense fogs) "frosty but kindly." We had a magnificent hay harvest. We matured and gathered into the garner a fair average crop of wheat. Bread has been cheap. In the metropolis meat has been dear. But, taking the year through, the run of its weather has been favourable rather than otherwise.

So much, we apprehend, cannot be said of the business of 1878. At the commencement of the year the coal and iron trades in South Wales were already involved in gloom and were menaced by darker prospects. These were gradually realised, and were naturally cast upon the same trades in other parts of the kingdom, and, by refraction, upon other trades, a constantly deepening shade. Bank failures, at Glasgow, Edinburgh, Bristol, and Rochdale, have aggravated the severity of the advancing commercial crisis. Things look a little more quiet just at present—a panic, perhaps, may by prudence be staved off; but it is impossible not to feel that, as far as regards commercial affairs, we are passing through a dangerous period, and, like Alpine tourists, must observe the utmost caution lest we bring down an avalanche upon our heads.

The political character of the year has been unusually exciting, not to say stormy. There have been no great measures affecting, either prejudicially or otherwise, home politics. Parliament, which met for "the despatch of business" three weeks before the usual time, and sat till the middle of August, or thereabouts, gave us a Cattle Plague Bill, an Intermediate Education (Ireland) Bill, and a Sunday Closing (Ireland) Bill, but not much else to speak of. It was absorbed in Foreign Policy. Its energies as well as its sympathies were fully preoccupied by the turn of affairs in South-Eastern Europe, by the Berlin Conference and its results, and by the unexpected outbreak of an Afghan War. The fall of Plevna, somewhat before the termination of last year; the remarkable winter campaign which followed it; the crossing of the Balkans by the Russians; the destruction and dispersion of the Turkish armies South of that range of mountains; the rapid advance of Muscovite troops first to Adrianople, afterwards to within a few miles of Constantinople and Gallipoli, alarmed the English people and roused in them a bellicose spirit which the Preliminary Treaty of San Stefano between Russia and Turkey did not help to soothe. A Vote of Credit for six millions sterling gave her Majesty's Government something like a carte-blanche to act as their discretion might warrant. The dispatch of the Mediterranean Fleet though the Dardanelles to the vicinity of Constantinople, the calling out of the Army Reserves and of those of the Militia for permanent service, the ordering of 8000 Native Indian Troops to Malta, and the tone generally held by the friends of the Government, as against Russia, while they postponed from week to week the assembling of a Congress at Berlin, supplied fertile topics of heated discussion in both Houses of Parliament. At length, however, Russia and England having agreed upon the concessions they were disposed to make to one another, the Congress met. We all know the result. The peace of Europe was thereby preserved. Several things occurred during the deliberations of the Plenipotentiaries to challenge criticism—some, to provoke condemnation. But the people of the United Kingdom rejoiced so sincerely in the assurance given by the Berlin Treaty that it secured them from the peril of a general European War, as to dispose them to condone any minor defects or even palpable faults. It was not quite so with the Anglo-Turkish Convention, the existence and stipulations of which were brought to light a few days before the Berlin Treaty was signed. Still, it did not disturb, even though it might not serve to strengthen, immediate prospects of tranquillity in Europe. Parliament broke up with a full impression that little was to be apprehended as to the future relations of the Great Powers one to another. Unhappily, the political disease which had been general broke out locally, and was transferred from Europe to Asia, from Turkey to the North-west Frontier of India. We are now at war with the Ruler of Afghanistan. The country, through Parliament, has given its assent to the policy which precipitated it. We have also a war in South Africa, which will, no doubt, involve us both in increased trouble and expense. The political proceedings during the year, of which we give this most cursory résumé, can only be fairly judged of some time hence. They may be the commencement of a more settled period, or, on the other hand, they may be fraught with dangers peculiar to themselves. Perhaps it lies beyond the range of human wisdom to determine how far 1878 has contributed to the peace of the world, or how far it may have helped to stir up the war spirit which may hereafter overwhelm all human interests.

The Obituary of the year comprises the names of so many persons eminent in Science, Art, Literature, and Ecclesiastical position that we dare not venture upon a selection which would necessarily exclude a large number richly deserving respectful remembrance, and which, therefore, would assume an appearance of invidiousness. Our glance will be limited to what we may term the summit of social and political life. Foremost amongst Royal personages during the year Death has claimed for his own Princess Alice, the Grand Duchess of Hesse-Darmstadt, and the beloved daughter of our Queen. She will not soon be forgotten by the English people. Victor Emmanuel, King of Italy, Pope Pius IX., and the young Queen of Spain, but a few months after her marriage, have gone to their account. Two attempts have been made upon the life of the Emperor of Germany, the second of which inflicted months of suffering upon the venerated Monarch. Assassination, indeed, appears to have been one of the malignant tendencies of 1878. Alfonso of Spain narrowly escaped, and Humbert of Italy was murderously assaulted, and saved, perhaps, only by the loyalty and presence of mind of his Prime Minister, who received a serious wound in defence of his Sovereign. Of the casualties of the year we need hardly speak, but the appalling loss of life resulting from the collision of the Bywell Castle and the Princess Alice steam-ships off Woolwich, and from the explosion of the Abercarne coal-mine (with some others that might be recalled to recollection), render it unfitting to conclude even this scanty summary of events without a word of recognition. The anxieties, privations, miseries, and bereavements of the expiring twelvemonth, as well as its hopes, achievements, and triumphs, are now mostly over. The record of them will come to an end within two or three days, in anticipation of which we heartily wish our readers "A HAPPY NEW YEAR."

The Princess of Wales and the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, with their four children, who had been on a visit to her Majesty, left the castle the previous day. PRINCESS LOUISE AND THE MARQUIS OF LORNE IN CANADA.

The sad event which has plunged the Court into mourning this Christmas has naturally caused some of the ceremonies incident to the arrival of the new Viceroy and Princess Louise in Canada to be postponed for some weeks. But we have at hand abundant proof of the heartiness with which the Marquis of Lorne and Princess Louise have been welcomed by all classes to their new home. Continuing the series of Sketches from our Special Artist, Mr. Melton Prior, we this week illustrate the popular progress of her Royal Highness and the noble Marquis from Halifax to Montreal, and show how the firing of feux de joie gave variety to the customary formula of presenting addresses of welcome at the various stages of their journey. The particulars of each sketch being printed underneath the cluster of Illustrations on page 608, the Engravings call for no further remark, save that it ever affords us pleasure to testify to the cordial loyalty and attachment felt in the Dominion—indeed, throughout the Empire—towards the Queen and the Royal family.

CHRISTMAS DAY IN LONDON.

Sermons special to the occasion were preached on Christmas Day in all the London churches, which, notwithstanding the extremely inclement weather, were largely attended.

Christmas fare on a very liberal scale was supplied to the inmates of the metropolitan workhouses, infirmaries, and asylums, those institutions being seasonably decorated.

In various parts of London, in accordance with the annual custom, Christmas dinners were provided for large numbers of poor children, who were supplied with substantial food and plum pudding. These treats are principally given in the poorer districts of the Central and Eastern divisions of London. At the Golden-lane Mission the children were, as usual, clothed in addition to being fed. Short services, or simple encouraging addresses formed in most of the places a part of the proceedings, the whole of which the little people seemed to enjoy very much.

The Lord Mayor, at his own expense, provided a Christmas dinner for the inmates—about 400 in all—of her Majesty's prisons of Newgate and Holloway.

At the Asylum for the Houseless Poor, which is situated in Banner-street, St. Luke's, and gives nightly shelter and bread during the winter months to the houseless poor, nearly 200 needy persons were entertained to a substantial Christmas repast, which was thoroughly enjoyed.

It occurred to her Majesty's printers to do a very graceful act, which gave pleasure on the morning of Christmas Day to many suffering children in the London hospitals. Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode ascertained from the authorities the names of the little ones who were prisoners in their wards on that day, and, having addressed to each of them a Christmas card, sent it direct through the post. We may be well assured that many a wan little face weary with suffering brightened with a gleam of pleasure when these unexpected but welcome letters arrived.

The Corporation of Trinity House has given £20 to the funds of the St. Andrew's Waterside Church Mission.

A window has been placed in the south transept of Hereford Cathedral to the memory of the Rev. John Goss, M.A.

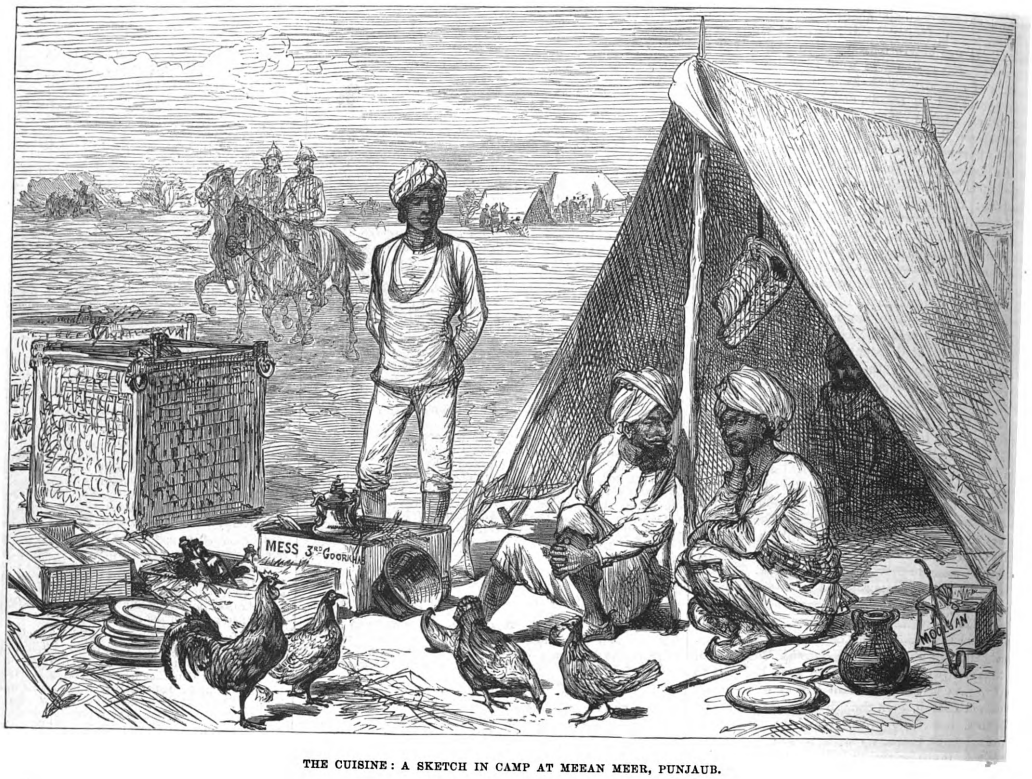
The Mercers' Company has given a hundred guineas to the National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church.

Yesterday week the peal of ten bells which formerly belonged to the demolished church of St. Dionis, Fenchurch-street, and which have been removed to All Hallows, Lombard-street, were rededicated, and rung for the first time in their new tower.

A special sermon, having reference to the death of the Princess Alice, was preached last Sunday morning by Dean Stanley at Westminster Abbey before a numerous congregation. The preacher pointed out the universality and identity of human suffering and affection, and how the creation and growth of high offices brought before the world common things and feelings in a concentrated personal and yet public form.

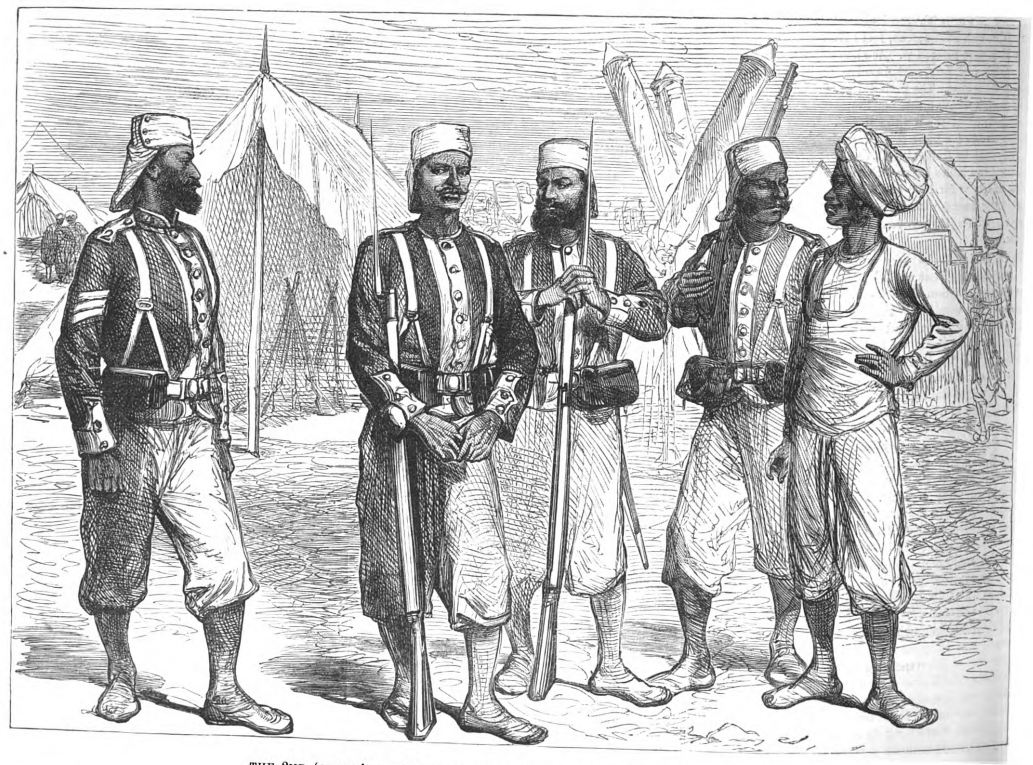
The Governors of the Sons of the Clergy Corporation met on Saturday last at the Corporation House, Bloomsbury-place, in order to distribute Christmas benefactions to Curates and other clergymen, their widows and families. Eighty-three clergymen received grants amounting in the aggregate to £1392, and the Governors also gave away £500 among fifty-three clergy widows, aged single daughters, and children.

St. George's Church, near Bristol, was destroyed early on Sunday morning by fire, which was caused by the over-heating of gas-stoves. Only the registers and the communion plate were saved. The peal of bells was destroyed, and the vicarage was slightly damaged. The church had recently been restored, and the loss is estimated at £6000. A wedding took place in the ruined porch in the morning.



The Incorporated Church Building Society held its usual monthly meeting on the 19th inst., at 7, Whitehall. Grants of money were made in aid of the following objects:—Building new churches at Hammersmith, St. Simon, Middlesex; Stillington, near Stockton-on-Tees, and Stockton-on-Tees, St. Peter; rebuilding on a new site the church at Wribbenhall, near Bewdley, Worcester; enlarging or otherwise improving the accommodation in the churches at Bosley, St. Mary, near Congleton; Cannock, Stafford; Crasswall, near Abergavenny; New Hampton, St. James's, Middlesex; Houghton Regis, near Dunstable; West Putford, North Devon; and Silksworth, near Sunderland. Grants were also made from the Mission Buildings Fund towards building mission churches at Brimington-common, near Chesterfield; Cremorne-gardens, in the parish of St. John's, Chelsea, Middlesex; Highfield, near Keighley, and New Somerby, near Grantham. During the past year grants amounting to £14,820 have been made towards the erection of thirty-six new churches (thirty-one of which are entirely free and unappropriated), the rebuilding of twenty-three, and the enlarging or otherwise improving the accommodation in ninety-nine existing churches. The carrying out of the above works called forth from the promoters of them the sum of £425,336. The committee have also granted the sum of £742 towards building twenty-nine school or mission churches.

The New River Company is sinking a deep well at Turnford, near Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, in search of the water of the lower greensand, and has reached a depth of 900 ft. The drill is of steel, in the form of a ring or shallow cylinder, 23 in. in diameter and 9 in. deep. On its edge are forty-eight opaque diamonds set in holders.



We have been requested to publish appeals for assistance to missions, schools, and numerous other charities; but have not space at disposal for a tenth of the appeals sent—they fill columns in the daily papers. We can only request our readers to make inquiries in their own neighbourhoods—not overlooking modest poverty, that shrinks from obtruding itself on public notice—and they are sure to find ample scope for their benevolence.—There is at this time great distress throughout the country. In sending a donation of £200 from the Queen to the Bishop of London, as president of the Metropolitan Visiting and Relief Association, General Ponsonby writes:—"The Queen, notwithstanding the deep sorrow which has fallen upon her, has noticed your appeal on behalf of the suffering poor of London, and has commanded me to send the inclosed cheque as her Majesty's contribution for alleviating distress in the metropolis." The Duchess of Edinburgh has sent £5 to the Leicester-square Soup-kitchen and Refuge. Mr. H. W. Ripley, M.P., has presented £500 in aid of the relief of the distress in the Bowling Ward at Bradford, Bowling being the township with which he is intimately connected by trade and property. At Chester and many other towns Poor Relief Committees are sitting constantly for the relief of the starving poor.—The Chesterfield board of guardians have been informed by one of their parish surgeons that many outdoor paupers are the owners of dogs, which "are fed from the tables, whilst the members of the family are actually being deprived of food." The board resolved to give no relief to any person who kept a dog. A correspondent of the Times sends the following recipe for a hundred gallons of soup:—"Take bullocks' heads or legs (heads cheapest), 1 cwt., stew well in separate boiler if you can; onions, half a bushel, carrots, turnips, &c.; three quarters of a bushel of split lentils or peas; a pailful of rice, ditto of flour, to thicken. This will make a substantial soup.—M. Hippolyte P. Delanoy, an artist in Paris, has sent to the Lord Mayor a painting, with a request that it may be sold and the proceeds given to some object of benevolence in London, at his discretion. The picture is to be seen at the Mansion House.

THE AFGHAN WAR.

THE ATTACK ON ALI MUSJID.

Simultaneously with the good news that the Ameer Shere Ali had fled from Cabul, that Yakoob Khan, his son, had been liberated from prison, and that General Sir Samuel Browne had marched into Jellalabad, we received from our Special Artist, Mr. William Simpson, his first sketches of actual warfare in the present campaign. With these sketches of the attack on Ali Musjid Mr. Simpson sent the following hurriedly-pencilled note, which will give some idea of the risks run and hardships endured by the Special representatives of the Press in the fulfilment of their duty:—

Ali Musjid, Nov. 22, 1878.

I write this to be ready with the first chance of going into Peshawur. I here send you the sketches cut out of my book. I have been all yesterday out in the thick of it, and my tent is not yet up. I have had to work on the ground with the wind blowing in strong gusts; so it is all very rough. Inclosed are large sketches of the 81st Regiment, who fired the first shot. I came into this to-day with the General, and two of the sketches inclosed were made while reconnoitring the place to see if it was evacuated. Slept last night à la belle étoile, but have got one of the enemy's tents for the night. Do not know when my own will come up.

Yours faithfully, WM. SIMPSON.

A sketch-map sent by Mr. Simpson to elucidate the plan of attack on Ali Musjid is engraved on page 619; and this plan, with the Illustration forming our Special Supplement, will afford our readers a pretty clear notion of General Sir Samuel Browne's rapid success, if we add a few extracts from the vigorous description of the advance given in Mr. Archibald Forbes's letter in the Daily News of Monday last. Premising that the General had on the evening of Nov. 20, and in the small hours of the following morning, dispatched the 2nd Brigade, under Colonel Tytler, and the 1st Brigade, under General Herbert Macpherson, away to the north-west, to Lashora, with orders to march thence and bring a flanking fire to bear on the defences of Ali Musjid, we follow the main advance of the 3rd and 4th Brigades from Jumrood in the early morning of Thursday, Nov. 21. Mr. Forbes tells us that "the march began when the broad daylight had illuminated the mouth of the Pass and the intervening region. There is a little clear space among the boulders flanking the road from Jumrood Fort and the mouth of the Pass. Immediately in our front was the village of Jum, and its adjacent shrine overhung with acacia-trees, and between the village and the shrine passed the narrow roadway. The General, with his Staff, sat here on horseback to watch the march-past of the advance guard. As the wing of the 14th Sikhs that led the advance strode past with a long, swinging stride, the sunlight broke out and lit up with a golden glory the brown gully and grey crags of Saikai and Rhotas. Behind the Sikhs marched a wing of the 81st Queen's; then came two companies of native sappers, with their mules laden with tools; and then followed them Manderson's fine troop of horse artillery (I.C.). This completed the advance guard, which was under the personal command of Colonel Appleyard, the soldierly Brigadier of the 3rd Brigade.

"At length (continues Mr. Forbes) the door of the Shadi Bhugiar Pass was reached and penetrated, the General leading the way. He pushed his pony up the steep isolated knoll that stands in its throat and, from beside the old tower on its summit scanned the scene in front. All that was seen of interest was the red-coated picquet on the peak in advance, quietly watching us. Upon the top of Rhotas, on our right, had been visible all along another picquet, whose camp fire had during the night glowed up against the dark sky. Behind there was a nasty grip, leading down into the level bed of the nullah. In view of the possibility of getting as soon as possible a long shot at the Afghan picquet, two of Manderson's horse artillery guns had been ordered forward under Captain Walsh. These were handsomely stayed down the grip with guy-ropes, and came along the bottom at a hard gallop in the true horse artillery style. Just where Mackeson's road leaves the bed of the hollow we had a nearer view of the enemy's picquet up on the peak of Koti Givat in our front, but it was still out of range of the guns. . . . . The skirmishers crowned a low ridge, from the top of which the Afghan picquet was visible, distant, perhaps, a thousand paces. It had deployed, and the men had sent their horses to the rear, behind cover. At ten o'clock our Sikhs and the 81st detachment opened fire against the straggling party of the Afghans. There was some response—nothing to speak of; and the Afghan people quickly fell back, when the bugles sounded 'Cease firing,' and the skirmishing advance was continued.

"At the top of this ridge the view of Ali Musjid first opened up to us. It stands on a precipitous isolated crag, everywhere naturally more or less scarped. Its summit either is level by nature or has been levelled by art, and on this summit is built the fort, covering entirely the flat surface. Roughly it is a square, with circular bastions at each corner, and one large one in the centre of its front looking down the Pass, and there is a prolongation of the curtain down to a detached square tower on the slope of the crag opposite the Khyber glacis. It is built of rough stones, uncemented, and partly faced with mud, and as a fortification has no pretensions, although its natural strength is very great. The Afghan engineer, whoever he was, had a very fair notion of constructing a defensive system with the means at his disposal. A great hill rises immediately behind Ali Musjid fort, its face almost precipitous. In its front rise three isolated peaks; one—being the one to the proper left—is that on which the fort is built. . . ."

Our skirmishers had little difficulty in dislodging the Afghans from the Shagai Ridge; but the cool daring of one Afghan horseman, who rode slowly in front of a ruined tower amid a perfect shower of bullets, excited the admiration of our troops. Swarming down into the valley, and crossing the stream, our skirmishers next occupied the deserted village of Lala Chena. Then "Walsh's two guns came up; and, while we waited here for the 40-pounders, they were ordered to open fire on the fort, the range being about 2500 yards. Their practice did not at first sight seem very successful. Their shells for the most part failed to reach the fort, striking and exploding downward on the steep scarp in front of it. Their fire was, however, only pour passer le temps, till the 40-pounders should come up, and a messenger sent to the rear brought back word that they could scarcely be in position till an hour should have elapsed. It was at twelve o'clock that, according to the General's expectation, Macpherson's co-operation might be anticipated from the top of the precipice of Rhotas to our right of Ali Musjid, and the big guns would thus arrive just in time effectively to accentuate the combination. Meanwhile a wing of the 14th Sikhs was sent forward to our right front, to feel their way over the successive ridges projecting from about the base of Rhotas and constituting its lower features. In reply to the first shot fired by Walsh, a shell was fired from Ali Musjid that burst high in the air; but the second shot fired from the fort passed close over the heads of the Staff on the bluff, and fell among some Sikhs a hundred yards behind. It was a blind shell; had it exploded it would have done some damage. As it was, it was exhumed and became the property of Colonel Waterfield, the Commissioner of Peshawur. Henceforth, in Walsh's fire, the shooting from the guns of Ali Musjid was admirable: the range had evidently been correctly ascertained beforehand, and every shot fell close to us as we lay behind the knolls of the bluff. At twelve the first 40-pounder came into action a little way in our rear, and Magennis's 9-pounders also threw in an occasional shell. Our fire was directed at all three of the enemy's main positions, but chiefly at Ali Musjid, and the dilapidated condition of that fort when we occupied it next morning proved that the fire had been much more efficient than we had imagined."

There being no sign of Macpherson as the afternoon of the 21st wore on, it was resolved to attack with the 3rd and 4th Brigades. "Appleyard took his 3rd Brigade on to the heights on the left of the Khyber Valley, with intent to press forward and assail the right flank of the enemy's position by a turning movement. The 4th Brigade, with which General Browne remained, moved forward over the rocky ridges, direct in our front, confronting Ali Musjid, and having the potentiality of working round upon its left." But, as it was thought a direct infantry assault on Ali Musjid would lead to an unnecessary sacrifice of life, it was resolved to abandon the attack for the day. "Lord William Beresford, one of Sir Sam's aides, was intrusted with the arduous and dangerous duty of descending from our height on the right bank, crossing the valley swept by the artillery and infantry fire of the Afghans, and ascending to the eminence on the left bank, to inform Appleyard of the resolution to desist from further action. Lord William successfully carried out the duty and Appleyard halted. But a portion of his brigade was far in advance. Detachments of the 14th Sikhs and 27th Native Infantry had pressed on, and in the grey of the twilight were fighting their way up the steep grassy slope on the peak above, which was the enemy's right flank position. In vain did the bugle sound the recall; its strains were borne unavailingly down the wind. The Afghans, behind their breastworks of stone, fought every step of the ascent, while the artillery of their left enfiladed the advance of our men as they struggled onwards and upwards. The end was disaster relieved by devoted bravery. A young officer of the 27th, by name Maclean, had rushed on with a handful into a spot where he found himself in deadly trouble. He called back for assistance with urgent vehemence to his support, commanded by Major Birch, in command of the 27th. That officer would not hear in vain the entreaty of his subordinate. He rushed forward, only to fall, shot dead in the effort. Those to whose succour he advanced fell back, and the gallant Major's body remained abandoned out to the front. One of his young officers—a Lieutenant, of whom everyone speaks well, Fitzgerald by name—would not have it that his chief's body should be left there to the mercy of barbarians. He called on the men of his own command to follow him to its rescue, but they hung back. In angry despair, he called for fifteen volunteers from an adjacent detachment of the 14th Sikhs, and the appeal was nobly responded to. Fitzgerald and his Sikhs sallied out. He was twice wounded ere he reached Birch's body, but he raised it, and was aiding in its removal when a third shot killed him. Most of the gallant Sikhs fell around him. They had to be left where they fell; the Afghan fire was no more to be faced. But the bodies were found yesterday morning unharmed, and at sundown yesterday Birch and his gallant subaltern found a soldier's grave under a tree close by the head-quarter camp at the foot of Ali Musjid, the whole head-quarter staff paying by their presence fitting honour to valiant comrades who had fallen gloriously with their faces to the foe."

Among our other Engravings illustrating the Afghan campaign will be found a two-page drawing showing that they are no mole-hills which the artillery have to surmount in those mountainous regions. The Guides, who figure on our front page, were of good service to General Sir Sam. Browne in his advance through the Khyber Pass. Colonel Jenkins commands them. The sympathetic pen of Mr. Forbes does justice to their prowess in these words:—"The services of this Punjaub frontier force, of which the Guides may be called the corps d'élite, are scarcely known at all to the mass of stay-at-home Britons. I wonder no soldier of the force who could use a pen as well as a sword has ever undertaken the task of writing the chronicles of the Guides. The number of their hill campaigns has been legion—and no bloodless campaigns either. Deeds of valour have been done by them, officers and men, that under circumstances of greater publicity would have earned not a few Victoria Crosses. But wounds are more abundant trophies of hard fighting among the Guides than are decorations or brevets. . . . It was an unexpected pleasure to find out here among the officers of the Guides, under the shadow of the mountains of the Khyber, an old comrade of the Franco-German war, in Captain Wigram Battye, one of five brothers whose names are throughout the Indian service a synonym for bravery, modesty, and lovableness of character."

We are indebted to the courtesy of two officers for the remainder of our sketches. Lieutenant Charles Pulley, of the 3rd Goorkhas, who had previously obliged us with a series of characteristic drawings, furnished us with the sketches from the Meean Meer Camp reproduced on page 600; and Lieutenant Martin, R.E., sent us the quaint sketch of General Roberts leaving Kohat for the front. Lieutenant Martin writes in explanation of his sketch that, "General Roberts, who has remained till the last to make final arrangements, left Kohat this morning to drive the sixty miles into Thull in what is known in these parts as a Murree cart. A kind of low dog-cart, this is, with a pair, or sometimes three, sorry tats, or ponies, abreast; sometimes these have some blood in them, and, when once they have stopped jibbing from the first rubs of the breast harness on their galled shoulders and withers, they will settle down into a good gallop and keep it up over the villainous tracks they have to cross for the whole of their five miles' stage. The driver is a picturesque-looking Sikh generally, with flowing turban, black beard, leather thonged whip, gaiters, and battered bugle, with which he warns the carts and camels off the road."

The reported flight of the Ameer Shere Ali from Cabul was confirmed by two telegrams received on Monday from the Viceroy. Yakoob Khan has been released from prison, and left at Cabul. Shere Ali is said to have lost nearly all authority at Cabul, and his soldiers were deserting. A Daily News' telegram states that Shere Ali is said to be journeying towards Balkh with the retiring Russian Mission.

Jellalabad, the Afghan stronghold rendered remarkable by General Sir Robert Sale's prolonged defence of the place against Akbar Khan, was entered without opposition by General Sir Samuel Browne on Friday, Dec. 20. The Daily News' correspondent telegraphs that General Browne passed through Jellalabad at the head of a column of troops, with bands playing. He then encamped on the south side of the place. The correspondent adds that Major Cavaguari received on the same day an important communication from the Ameer, the contents of which had not been made public. According to Russian news received at Berlin, the Ameer, mistrusting his sons and courtiers, fled to Balkh for the purpose of raising an army among the Turcoman tribes, and the members of the Russian Legation return directly to Turkestan. But it is announced from St. Petersburg that no official confirmation has been received there of the departure for Balkh of the Ameer with the Russian Mission.

Captain Powell, of the 5th Goorkhas, who was wounded in the recent skirmish with the Mangals, has died of his wounds. The Standard correspondent with General Roberts's force telegraphs that it has been decided that nothing can be done against the Mangals this season. The hill tribes about Kuram are giving a good deal of trouble, and the telegraph wires are frequently cut. A Times' telegram states that Wali Mahomed has arrived at Khushi, sixteen miles to the south-west of the Shutargardan Pass, with eleven regiments of infantry and four of cavalry, which are supposed to come from Balkh. It is not supposed, however, that Wali Mahomed will venture to cross Shutargardan at this season.

Yet another telegram from the Daily News' Special Correspondent at Dakka states that the expedition against the Zukkur Khels met with a good deal of firing from the hill-men, and that our loss was one man killed and three wounded. The columns of Colonel Doran and Colonel Tytler advanced along opposite sides of the valley, burning the villages and blowing up the towers, and then returned to Dakka and Ali Musjid.

The Special of the Daily Telegraph at Quetta sent home word on the 23rd inst. that:—

"Replying to the orders of Shere Ali, his father-in-law, Mir Afzul, who commands at Candahar, has plainly told him that, without foreign aid, any opposition to the British forces would be futile, and that he could not even defend the Khojeck Pass.

"It is impossible to exaggerate the loyal and willing assistance rendered throughout by the Khan of Khelat. His heir, with a small body of men, may possibly accompany General Stewart. The advance of the British troops continues unopposed, and they are in excellent health."

M. Gambetta took the chair on Monday at a lecture in Paris on behalf of some district free and lay schools, and made two speeches, in one of which he spoke of the political prospects of the coming year. At the Grand Hôtel on Tuesday a dinner was given to him by the Commercial Travellers. More than 500 persons sat down to dinner. M. Gambetta, in replying to the toast of his health, made a speech. Ambitious designs were imputed to him, but he desired no better recompense than the esteem of his countrymen. He predicted that the Republicans would have a majority of twenty-five votes in the Senate after the elections of Jan. 5.

The manifesto of the United Branches of the Left of the Senate has been issued.

ITALY.

Yesterday week Signor Depretis presented the members of the new Cabinet to the Chamber of Deputies. He declared that the Ministry would maintain public order with the aid of the existing laws without displaying weakness or having recourse to arbitrary measures. He also stated that the Government would proceed with the bills of the late Ministry, with regard to the Electoral Law, the Grist Tax, and the construction of railways. In the Chamber of Deputies on Saturday a letter from Signor Farini, the President of the House, was read, resigning his office. The Chamber, however, unanimously refused to accept his resignation. A bill presented by the Minister of Finance sanctioning the provisional exercise of the Budget for two months was approved. The Senate voted two twelfths of the Budget as a provisional measure, and adjourned till Jan. 14.

One hundred students of the Institute of Engineers at St. Petersburg assembled on the 19th inst. before the house of the Russian Minister of Public Works for the purpose of presenting a petition. Three of them were summoned to the presence of the Minister, who explained to them the illegality of the step they were taking, whereupon the students immediately dispersed, without making any disturbance.

Official denial has been given to a statement circulated in the German newspapers that the Emperor William, on the occasion of his resuming the duties of Government, had received and replied to a congratulatory letter from the Pope.

The German Emperor has conferred orders and decorations upon the principal officers of the late Exhibition at Paris.

Prince Bismarck has written a long letter to the Federal Council, in which he sets forth his views upon financial reform. He advocates a return to the Prussian Custom House system, and contends that it is necessary to tax all imports, except such raw materials as Germany does not produce, in order to develop commercial prosperity at home.

The Prussian Diet has adjourned until Jan. 8.

Mr. Bayard Taylor, the United States Minister to Germany, died at Berlin, somewhat suddenly, on the 19th inst. Mr. Taylor was in his fifty-fourth year, and for the greater part of his life was well known as an author and a member of the staff of the New York Tribune. He entered the diplomatic service of his country in 1862 as Secretary of Legation at St. Petersburg, and in 1863 became Chargé-d'Affaires at the same capital. In 1864 he returned to America and resumed his literary pursuits, and was appointed Minister to Germany not very long ago. Mr. Taylor was a great traveller, and as late as 1874 paid a visit to Iceland on the occasion of its centennial anniversary. His funeral took place at Berlin on Sunday afternoon. All the foreign Ambassadors, various members of the Government, and many persons connected with art, literature, and science, attended the service. The Emperor and the Crown Prince both sent their Aides-de-Camp to represent them. Herr Berthold Auerbach gave an address, and the funeral service was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Thompson, chaplain to the American Legation. The Berlin correspondent of the Morning Post says that the German Government has addressed a letter of condolence to the United States Legation expressing profound regret at the loss of Mr. Bayard Taylor.

DENMARK.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

It is stated that the Emperor will return to Vienna on Jan. 2, and the sittings of the Reichsrath are to be resumed in a fortnight from that date.

The Lower House of the Hungarian Diet on the 19th inst. adopted by 179 votes to 125 the Government bill to issue forty million florins of Gold Rentes for the purpose of redeeming Treasury Bonds. After Herr Tisza had made a speech in support of the proposal, the House further passed, by a very large majority, the bill relative to the levying of recruits in 1879.

The Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath adopted last Saturday the motion for prolonging the present army law, as well as a proposal that a new bill on the subject should be introduced next session, and a resolution recommending the Government to take steps for facilitating a future reduction in the military expenditure. The bill fixing the number of recruits to be levied in 1879, the commercial treaty with Germany, and a bill making preparatory arrangements for a treaty of commerce with Italy were also adopted.

The Economical Committee of the Reichsrath has accepted, almost with unanimity, the treaty of commerce with Germany.

ROUMANIA.

After a prolonged discussion, both Chambers of the Legislature on the 19th inst. voted the respective Addresses in reply to the Speech from the Throne. In the Senate the majority in favour of the Government was 37 votes against 10, and in the Chamber of Deputies the Address was passed with only two dissentients.

AMERICA.

A Message has been sent by President Hayes to the United States Senate, in which, replying to an inquiry, he says that it is most important that the rapidly increasing export trade should not be allowed to suffer for want of the means of communication with foreign countries. He at the same time incloses a memorandum from Mr. Evarts urging the necessity of increased postal facilities with Central and South America.

Congress has adjourned for the Christmas recess, re-assembling on Jan. 7, the Senate having previously ratified the treaty of commerce with Japan.

CANADA.

The elections in Manitoba have resulted in favour of the Government.

The Government has determined to complete the Canada Pacific Railway between Lake Superior and the city of Winnipeg with the utmost speed, so as to prevent the permanent diversion of the north-west traffic through the American lines.

Official correspondence, it is stated, will begin in January between the Governments of Newfoundland and Canada with reference to the admission of the former province into the Dominion.

THE CAPE COLONIES.

A telegram of Cape news to the 3rd inst. has been received. Cetewayo has not yet replied to the message sent to him by Sir Bartle Frere. The military preparations on the part of the British authorities continue. The chief, Gassibone, and his two sons have been captured, and the two latter will be tried for the murder of Mr. Francis Thompson at Kurrumann.

It is believed that the new elections to the Legislative Council have resulted in the return of the majority for the Government.

The Company of Saddlers has given £10 in aid of the Royal Albert Orphan Asylum.

It was announced at the final meeting of the year of the Victoria (Philosophical) Institute that 141 members had joined during the year, of whom forty-one reside in the colonies.

The electric light was experimentally used at the London-Bridge terminus of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway last Saturday afternoon and evening for lighting the open space between the main line and Crystal Palace line booking-offices and the platform barriers.

The anniversary festival of the Commercial Travellers' Schools was held on the 19th inst. at the Freemasons' Tavern, with Mr. Colman, M.P., in the chair. It was stated that more than a thousand children had been educated in these schools, which have three hundred scholars at present. Upwards of £2000 was contributed in the room.

Mr. Baron Pollock having reserved judgment in the action brought by Sir Rowland Hill and others against the Metropolitan Asylums District Board, whose smallpox hospital at Hampstead the jury declared to be a nuisance, the arguments in the case were heard last Saturday, and judgment was postponed to the January sittings.

In the Chancery Division yesterday week a compulsory order was made by Vice-Chancellor Malins to wind up the West of England Bank. The investigation into the affairs of the Bank showed the debts to be £3,300,000; and the assets being sufficient within £304,000 to meet the liabilities other than legal expenses, the creditors, his Lordship said, would no doubt be paid in full, an adequate number of shareholders being sufficiently solvent to meet all the claims that might be made against them.

The wardmotes for the election of Common Councilmen for the City of London were held last Saturday. For the most part the retiring members were re-elected; but in seven wards polls have become necessary by the nomination of one or two more than the number of vacancies. Resolutions of condolence with the Queen were passed at several of the meetings; in two wards objection was made to the use of asphalte pavements in the City; the construction of a new bridge was approved by one ward; and the completion of the Inner Circle Railway was also the subject of some discussion.

The trial of the action for libel brought by Mr. Wybrow Robertson against Mr. H. Labouchere for an alleged libel in Truth was brought to a close yesterday week. The Lord Chief Justice, in summing up, said the question the jury had to decide was whether the defendant had or had not failed to justify his publication of the statement that the plaintiff had been dismissed for dishonesty. The jury found for the defendant; and said, in answer to the Judge, that they considered that the charge of dishonesty against Mr. Robertson was proved. On the application of Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, the Lord Chief Justice consented to stay execution, in order to allow a point of law to be argued.

Estimates were submitted at the meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works yesterday week showing that the expenditure for the ensuing year will amount to £1,053,283. This is a considerable increase upon the present year, and will require a rate of a small fraction under sixpence in the pound, which is an increase of one penny upon the present rate. It was stated that since the Board had come into existence the population of the metropolis had increased by 1,300,000, that the number of houses had increased by 150,000, that 600 miles of streets had been constructed, that the assessment had more than doubled itself, and that upwards of twenty millions sterling had been expended in improvements, six millions of which had been repaid.

The liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank were engaged last Monday in receiving payment of the first instalment of the call which has been made upon the shareholders—viz., of £250 per £100 stock. A few had already sent in their amounts, but the great majority of the proprietors only paid on Monday. Some time will elapse before it is known how much this first payment has yielded.

Private theatricals, without costly scenes or costumes, and with a proper selection of the subject performed, are not an unprofitable diversion at this festive season. A book of "Plays for Young People," including songs and choruses, has been composed by the Rev. J. Barnby, late Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. These seem to be modelled on the popular Fairy Extravaganzas of Mr. J. R. Planché, and they are not unworthy of that class of dramatic literature. The music is adapted and arranged by Mr. T. Rogers, of New College, Oxford, Precentor of Durham. Messrs. S. Tinsley and Co. are the publishers of this acceptable volume.

The quantity of fresh meat landed at Liverpool last week from the United States and Canada was again very large. Four steamers arrived in the Mersey having on board 5777 quarters of beef, 1352 carcases of mutton, and 449 dead pigs. The steamers conveying live stock were five in number, their consignment amounting to 576 head of oxen, 748 sheep, and 42 pigs. A very large quantity of poultry arrived from Canada during the week, intended for the Christmas markets. The Caspian of the Allan line brought about 4000 turkeys, geese, and ducks, and the Dominion Line steamer Mississippi, 1600 turkeys and geese.

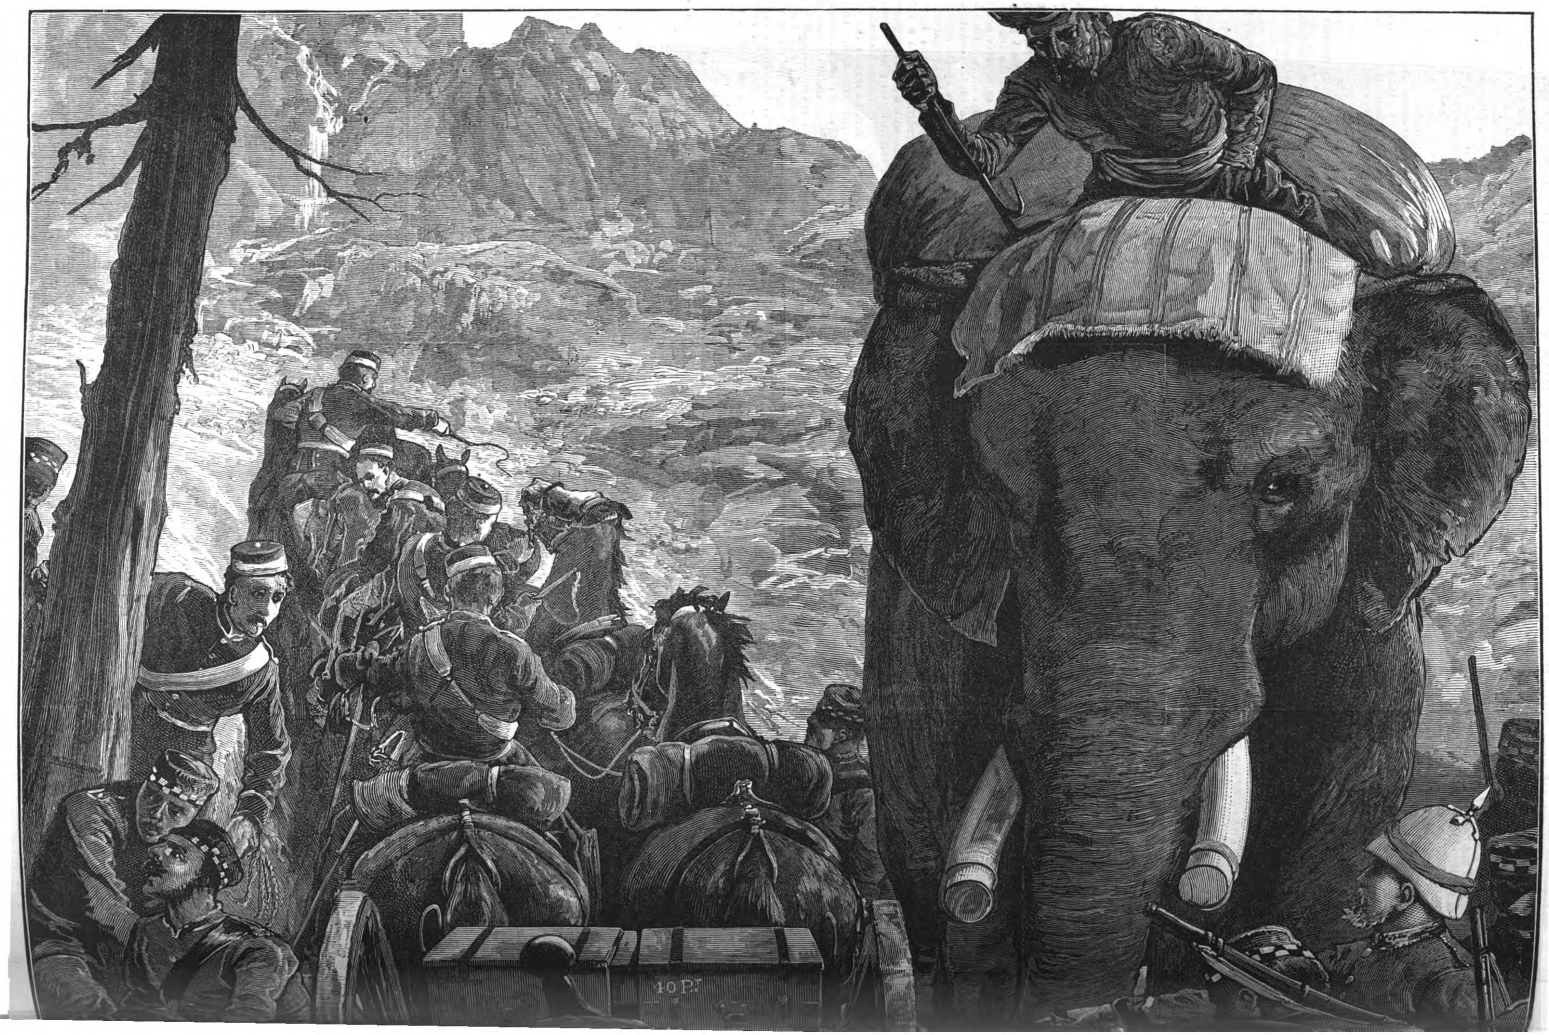
The principal events in the Volunteer world last week consisted of prize distributions. On Saturday the annual winter inspection and presentation of prizes to the 3rd Middlesex Artillery took place at Westminster Hall; the 26th Middlesex (Customs and Docks) had their prizes presented to them, in the great hall of the Cannon-street Hotel, by Mrs. Kennard, the wife of the commanding officer; and those of the 29th Middlesex were given by Lord Enfield, their honorary Colonel, in the St. Pancras Vestry Hall. There was a very large gathering at the Townhall, Stratford, on Wednesday week, to witness the distribution of prizes to the members of the 3rd Essex Artillery. Alderman Sir Thomas White presided, and Lady White distributed the prizes. The annual prize distribution of the 1st Sussex took place on Monday night, in the Corn Exchange, Brighton—Lieutenant-General Shute, M.P., the honorary Colonel of the corps, presiding.

COUNTRY CAROL SELLERS AND SINGERS.

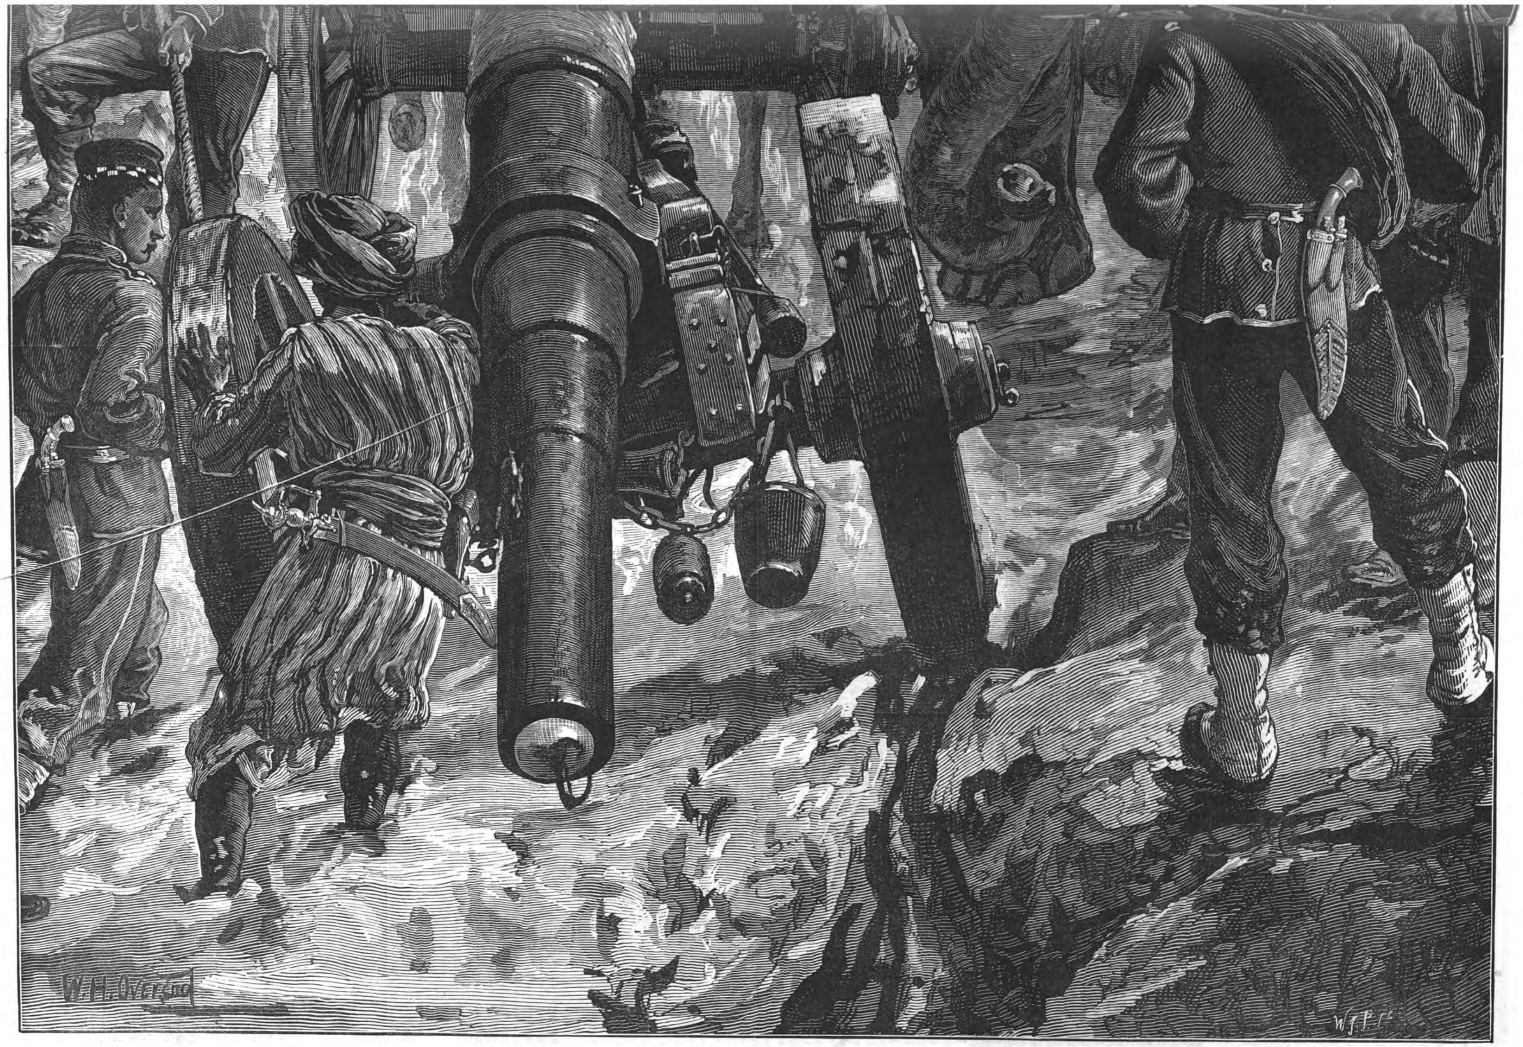
For a month or so before Christmas one of the signs of the approaching season is seen, in sequestered villages and hamlets, in the shape of a vender of carols, rudely printed and still more rudely illustrated on flimsy-looking broad sheets. To a rural population, this peripatetic carol-seller is the harbinger of Christmas, just as much as the carolling lark heralds the Spring and the swallow the Summer. And this wandering Autolycus is not only a carol-seller, but he is also a carol-singer; and, therefore, he is doubly welcome, especially to rustic hearers, like Mopsa, who dearly "love a ballad in print," even if it be sung "to a very doleful tune," which, in the majority of instances, is usually the case with the wandering carol-singer's collection.

In our modern Arcadia the shepherd's pipe is no longer the oaten reed; nor is it the "one short pipe" that Beattie put into the mouth of that Edwin who "was no vulgar boy," such as was the urchin of Margate, who lives for us in the Ingoldsby legend; nor does the modern rustic Strephon address his Chloe in alternate verse, and with "rudest minstrelsy." It is only on rare occasions that he betrays himself into song, unless when fuddled with the nauseous mixture, slandering the name of beer, with which the village public-house drugs him. As a curly-headed ploughboy Hodge may whistle as he follows his team over the upturned tilth; but ordinarily he is no singer. Christmas, however, is one of those exceptional seasons when he bursts into song. He is a very Robin Redbreast in this particular, that his song sounds all the more inspiriting from its being so cheerily piped in the cold and wintry weather.

But, if Hodge bursts into unaccustomed song at Christmas, his vocal efforts are not made solely with a reference to his own pleasure, nor does he carol from mere exuberance of feeling and from harmony with the season. Hodge is compelled, by the force of circumstances, to be a severely practical man, and to care more for bread and bacon than for Shakspeare and the musical glasses. The one will feed himself and family more or less fully and satisfactorily; the other would only set his poor wits a wool-gathering. And so Hodge becomes, for the brief Christmas season, a professional performer, and sings for money, not, like the Christmas Robin, "in profuse strains of unpremeditated art," but, by dint of careful study, much painstaking, and private practice. For, anything that he can earn at Christmas will be an extra indeed, and doubly welcome as helping to provide for his family something in the shape of Christmas cheer—although that comforting phrase, so suggestive of turkey, roast beef, and plum-pudding, may mean to him nothing more than a scrag end of mutton, a lump of boiled pork, a pot of beer from the public, and a big suet dumpling in which a few raisins are playing at hide-and-seek. But it is with the brilliant prospect of this family festivity before him, and with the fond hope of gleaning one or two shillings'-worth of coppers out of the bounteous monetary harvest of Christmas, that Hodge is induced to look out for the appearance of the country carol-seller, as keenly and expectantly as the opera-frequenter anticipates the début of some new Swedish nightingale or Terra-del-Fuego cantatrice.



He comes at last—the last minstrel for the year—an unwashed individual, with a battered hat and muddy garments, and with a general appearance of sleeping under hay-stacks and living on gin-and-water—or, perhaps, gin without the water. But he has his bundle of carols with him, and he can sing them to certain tunes, although with a husky voice and indifferent intonation. There they are, however, printed on fly-sheets after the old fashion, on wretched paper and with miserable type, from the presses of Pitt, or Batchelor, of Moorfields, or the redoubtable Jemmy Catnach, of Monmouth-court, Dudley-street; and they seem to bring with them a flavour of St. Giles's and the Seven Dials, which will be improved by ventilation in the pure country air. Each carol-sheet is headed by a bleared woodcut, which is presumed to have some reference to the verses underneath, but of those style of art it is so pre-Catnachian that the subject is as obscure as a buried treasure, or a mephitic "nocturno." But the vender knows the tastes of his hearers, and is well aware that if he offered them a spick-and-span new carol, tastefully printed and illustrated on a clean white sheet, they would turn away from it, and reject it as not being the genuine article. And so he brings them the easily-recognised coarse and flimsy broadsheets, and they welcome them as old friends and Christmas acquaintances. After all, there is much virtue in early associations, more especially at Christmas; and Hodge may be credited with the desire to stand in the old paths.



Great is the choice that is offered to him. He can have "God rest you, merry gentlemen, Let nothing you dismay;" or, "I saw three ships come sailing by;" or, "When Christ was born of Mary free;" or, "Behold the grace appears;" or, "As I sat on a sunny bank;" or, "The first good joy our Mary had;" or, "Christians, awake! salute the happy morn." Or he can pick and choose among these—"Come, all you faithful Christians;" "Lullaby, my baby, what meanest thou to cry?" "When Joseph was an old man, an old man was he;" "As it fell upon a day, when Dives made a feast;" "A Virgin most pure, as the prophets did tell;" "A glorious star from heaven appeared;" "While shepherds watched their flocks by night;" "Ye faithful triumphant, enter into Bethlehem;" "It is the day, the holy day, on which our Lord was born;" "Come Christians all, behold the Lamb;" "High let us swell our tuneful notes;" "On Christmas night all Christians sing;" "Now, thrice welcome Christmas, that brings us good cheer;" or the always popular "Hark! the herald angels sing." The choice of tunes is as great as the choice of carols; and any quaintness of words or roughness of metre is smoothed and mellowed to the hearers by time and long familiar usage. Anything new-fangled in the way of tunes is avoided, and "Hymns Ancient and Modern," and "Moody and Sankey" are but sparingly laid hands upon to supply the melodies for these country-sung carols.

Hodge gives a copper for the broadsheet; listens attentively to its tune as it is hoarsely bawled in gin-inspired strains; and—perhaps greatly assisted thereto by a sharp little child blessed with a good ear—catches something near enough to the melody to pass muster when sung out in the cold, in the village street or before the farmer's door, on a Christmas night. Up to the time of its public performance his spare moments are industriously given to mastering the words of the song and in da capo repetitions of its tune. In cowsheds and stables, with his team, or among those "beasts of the stall" to which the theme of the carol is not inappropriate, he hums it over and over to himself, and works it out more elaborately in his own cottage, with the help of his little Lizzie and Johnny, before the mother puts them to bed, there to dream of the coming joys of that season when the herald angels sang Peace on earth.

CUTHBERT BEDE.

There was a considerable fall of snow in London on Sunday. In Scotland several railway lines have been blocked by the drifted snow. Ice accidents are reported from Warwickshire and Enniskillen, causing the loss of six lives.

ON THE ROAD TO ALI MUSJID.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

I am not going to join in the general chorus of doleful complaint concerning the inclemency of the weather; nor, on the other hand, do I partake to any marked extent in the enthusiasm of the optimists who talk about "A regular old-fashioned Christmas, Sir! Fine bracing, invigorating weather!" The enjoyment of Christmas when there is a hard frost, when the snow lies thick on the roads, and the temperature is bitterly cold, depends very much upon our material circumstances. With twenty thousand a year and nothing to do for it, a gentleman need not feel the cold to any appreciable extent. With nothing a year but what he earns by day labour, and that labour not in demand; with the victuals out and the brokers in, and the teapot full of nothing but pawnbrokers' duplicates, Christmas and bitterly cold weather somehow fail to come in agreeable association.

Meanwhile the streets are either in a perilously slippery or a disgracefully sloppy condition. In the city of St. Peterburg, the capital of that "semi-barbaric" country, Russia, where the winter begins in mid-November, and does not always end with March, you may walk or drive about the streets without difficulty and without discomfort. You should wear a fur schoub if you be rich enough; or, should you be poor, a touloupe or sheepskin coat, with the leathern side out and the woolly side in, will serve your turn as effectually as a similar material served Mr. Bryan O'Lynn in the ballad. That gentleman found a sheepskin "mighty convanient." In St. Peterburg the foot-pavement on the streets is carefully scraped and sanded twice a day throughout the winter. The cab-horses do not fall down, because the horses are properly shod. In London there is a little perfunctory scraping of doorsteps on a frosty morning; but the trottoir not immediately in front of private dwelling-houses is left to take care of itself; and the icy waste is speedily taken possession of by gangs of roughs and street boys, who make long slides and "keep the pot boiling" thereupon, to the peril of the lives and limbs of elderly and infirm foot-passengers. If one of the sliding roughs be remonstrated with, he launches a torrent of foul abuse at the remonstrant, or if there be a heap of snow lying handy, constructs a snowball (possibly with a stone in the middle) and hurls it at the stranger's head.

Mem.: Snowballing in a picture is a very pretty pastime indeed. In one of Wilhelm von Kaulbach's noble illustrations to Goethe there is an admirable representation of a skating-scene, in which a pretty girl is playfully pelting one of the male skaters, a pensive youth of aristocratic mien, with snowballs. Now, I am not young, nor is my mien aristocratic; but I am pensive; I am purblind, and I am "shaky on my pins," or unsteady on my legs. I do not care about being snowballed in the public streets either by pretty girls or by ugly roughs. Yet, I suppose that we have all thrown snowballs, more or less, in our time. I remember well that when I first went as a small boy to school in France I availed myself of the first snowy morning in the playground to fashion the biggest snowball my hands could mould and to "heave it" at a passing playmate. I saw no harm in the act. He did. Snowballing was not among the recognised diversions of that particular school, and I found that I had gotten myself into a terrible scrape. It was a "Star Chamber matter," almost. I was haled before the supreme authority of the school. I was accused of "conduite singe" and "conduite désordonnée." I was charged with having been guilty, sciemment et notoirement, of certain voies de fait envers un camarade; and M. le Proviseur was for sending me to the cachot, or black hole, for three days, on a bread-and-water diet, when the worthy mathematical professor, who had happened to have lived long in England, good-naturedly explained to the Chief that English boys were accustomed to throw snowballs almost so soon as they could throw anything. So I got off with fifty "mauvais points" and a hundred lines of Virgil to learn by heart. But it was a fearfully narrow escape. Is snowballing accounted a crime in English schools at the present day, I wonder?

Touching the cab horses. I asked a civil and intelligent cabby, the other day, why he did not get his horse's shoes roughed? "Why, Sir," he made answer, "it costs a shilling to get 'em roughed; and then to-morrow, p'raps, it 'll thaw; and then, bang goes another shilling to get 'em unroughed; and, more than that, there ain't enough farriers in London to rough all the horses, if the frost 's a heavy one." It seems to me that, after all, roughening the shoe is but a clumsy way of making horses sure-footed. A correspondent of the Times has pointed out that in Germany horseshoes are punctured with a hole at either end, into which, when the roads are slippery, a small iron spike is screwed. When the horse comes home to its stable the groom unscrews the spikes and screws in a couple of buttons or studs to prevent dirt getting into the orifices.

Amplifying this seasonable hint, Mr. Colam, of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, informs the public that there is an English horseshoe analogous to the German—one called the "Fleming" shoe, which can be made by any farrier, seeing that Mr. Fleming has generously waived all claims to patent rights or royalties in the invention. But we ought to have had such a safeguard against slipperiness long ago. Why, Cribb and Belcher, Tom Spring and Jem Ward, never fought in the old days of the Ring without "sparrow-bill" shoes, the soles of which were spiked or studded to prevent their wearers slipping down on the smooth sward.

Yet one more seasonable item. We have, it is pitiably obvious, a vast amount of utter destitution in our midst, destitution which we are all doing our best, according to our several means to alleviate. In particular, many kind-hearted people are busied with the pleasant task of regaling the poor, ragged, hungry children of the Great City with good hot, nourishing dinners. That truly benevolent clergyman and accomplished ornithologist, the Rev. F. O. Morris, has, however, pointed out that we have around us vast multitudes of destitute and hungry little creatures that, through the severity of the weather, are perishing from starvation. They are not, fortunately, ragged, since Providence has endowed them with beautiful suits of clothes made entirely of feathers; and they live in homes which they make for themselves, without hands, and for which they pay no rent; but just now they have nothing to eat. No worms. No berries. Who will compassionate the small birds? It is the easiest and most inexpensive thing possible to administer to the immediate needs of these tiny feathered folk. You may keep your money in your pocket and your cheque-book in your drawer. To relieve the misery of the birds you have only to bid the parlour-maid to be careful to scatter the crumbs from the tablecloth after each meal over the back garden. If you have no back garden, crumb your window-sill well; and when you go skating in the parks take a bag of crumbs with you and throw them into the frozen bushes of the plantations. Did you ever see the pigeons fed in St. Mark's Place, Venice? Did you ever stroll into the courtyard of the "Pigeon Mosque"—it is the Mosque of Bayazid, I think—at Stamboul while the birds are at dinner? Pious endowments have been founded to give the birds bread all the year round for ever.

Touching our feathered friends, here is a puzzle for the French Editor of the World; but, lest that Sage should not be an adept at guessing conundrums, I will append the solution. What, M. le Rédacteur Français, is the cheapest way of catching small birds? The recipe must be given in French. "Vous ouvrez votre fenêtre et vous jetez sur le seuil de la mie de pain. Les petits oiseaux viennent et le mangent. Le second jour vous ouvrez votre fenêtre, et vous jetez du froment. Les petits oiseaux viennent et le mangent. Le troisième jour vous ne jetez rien du tout. Les petits oiseaux viennent; et ils sont attrapés." But it would be both cruel and cowardly thus to "catch" little birds. Let us therefore follow the counsel of the Rev. F. O. Morris, and feed them with our waste crumbs.

Mem.: What is a "snaire?" I find this (to me) astonishing word used in the third line of an enigmatical copy of verses in French in the last number of the World. Has "snaire" anything to do with "the Hunting of the Snark;" or is it a misprint for "suaire," a winding-sheet? G. A. S.

NEW BOOKS.

BIOGRAPHICA.

Whosoever reads history, the newspapers, and the periodicals, especially those portions of them which relate to politics, must necessarily be familiar with the greater part of what is contained in the two volumes entitled The Public Life of the Earl of Beaconsfield, K.G., by Francis Hitchman (Chapman and Hall); but it is not everybody, even in these latter days, who can manage such a course of reading. To those who cannot, as well as to those who can, the two volumes may be recommended, to each group for a different reason; to the former as a new and interesting study, to the latter as a means of collation, so as to compare notes, to reconsider hastily formed conclusions, to correct downright mistakes. Those mistakes are for the most part, probably, connected with what can only by a stretch of meaning be included in the range of his "public life;" mistakes, in fact, concerning his school-days, if he ever had any, concerning the pecuniary circumstances of his early life, concerning the extent to which he was tarred with the attorney's brush, and so on—affairs which are generally considered to belong to the private side of a man's life, unless, indeed, the life of a boy at a public school is to be taken as public in the sense in which the term is applied to the soldier's, the sailor's, the politician's, and many other careers. The author announces, with an air of satisfaction not likely to be shared by his readers, that the "illustrious subject" of his book "has been in no way consulted or concerned in its preparation," and that his "personal relations with him have been confined to a formal presentation some six years ago." This announcement is, of course, sufficient to remove any apprehensions of collusion; but, after all, a gentleman, even a nobleman, is himself the best authority on many points connected with his own life, and it is an advantage for his biographer to have consulted him as to matters of fact relating to his birth, parentage, education, and the rest of it. However, the author, by diligent research, has been led to conclude that the present Lord Beaconsfield is, what nobody has ever denied, "by descent a Jew," of the stock of the Sephardim; that he was born, as is not so generally admitted, on Dec. 21, 1804; that he was baptised, though the date has often been disputed, on July 31, 1817, in the parish church of St. Andrew, Holborn; that "no public school can boast of numbering him amongst her sons," and "no University can claim the honour of being his Alma Mater;" that, "if he were ever at school, the name of his schoolmaster has been forgotten," and that "he seems to have been brought up in his father's library, and to have been in a great measure left to educate himself;" that he was never "a copying clerk in a lawyer's office," and that he was never even articled, though he made a brief trial of existence at an attorney's in Old Jewry, where, however, he did not write, for all the statements to the contrary, his first novel; that certainly he "has risen from the ranks," though he was never "a poor man in any sense of the term;" that he was never a journalist, to the extent, at any rate, of being "a constant contributor to the daily and weekly press;" that his "Vivian Grey," which may be regarded as his first serious bid for fame, "made its appearance in two instalments—the first, of three slim volumes, being published in 1826, the second, of two volumes, in 1827," that he "took the town by storm" thereby, and that, being at that time a "lion" in London society, he "seems to have been guilty of some little foppery in dress and manner;" that, "as is evident" from his book, he had already travelled when, in 1829, he set out to explore "the mystic East;" that, after his return from his travels, in 1832, he was a contributor for several years to Lady Blessington's "Annuals;" and that from that date he commenced his course of active politics by standing for High Wycombe and suffering his first defeat. Henceforth the biography is for the most part a compilation, a careful and laborious compilation, from all manner of published documents, equally open to anybody else, but unlikely to tempt anybody else to undertake a similar operation for the satisfaction of personal interest. To the compiler, therefore, many thanks are due for the trouble he has taken in weaving together into a connected narrative scattered pieces of information and all that tends to throw light upon the various phases of a great career, with the addition, be it gratefully observed, of an index, even if he appear now and then to spin out his work with unnecessary detail, tedious analysis, unprofitable criticism of newspapers' criticism. The spirit of the biography is that of hero-worship, of an unbounded admiration which political opponents are pretty sure to describe as almost fulsome adulation. That Lord Beaconsfield has suffered from abuse and detraction is not to be denied; but "hard words break no bones," and we ought all of us by this time to have learnt the lesson taught by the eminent Frenchman, who said of a political foe, "he calls me scoundrel, miscreant, a wretch unworthy to live; what he means is that we hold different opinions." Perhaps, when we have thoroughly learnt and digested that lesson, our public speakers and writers may exhibit more moderation in their language, if only because they are aware that no importance whatever will be attached to their "wild and hurling words," and that they will fall under suspicion of untrustworthiness for the very reason that they "protest too much." Between a "master of invective" and a "master of Billingsgate" the shade of difference is often almost imperceptible.

Memory recalls in a hazy way the achievements of a wonderful man, as soon as the eye is cast upon the two volumes entitled William Cobbett: A Biography, by Edward Smith (Sampson Low and Co.), a man who, though of very humble origin, came to be a power in the State, and to wield a personal influence, through the press, such as in any country but England might have cost him not only his liberty but his head. His biography carries us back a long way. He was born at Farnham, Surrey, on March 9, 1762, and he died on June 18, 1835. His grandfather was a day labourer on a farm, his father, having improved his condition, was a small farmer, and he himself, the third of four sons, arrived, when old enough, "at the honour of joining the reapers in harvest, driving the team, and holding the plough." But he was destined to shine in another field, for which at the outset he seemed to be as little qualified as any human creature could be. When, at about eleven or twelve years of age, he took French leave of his home and set off one fine morning for Kew Gardens in search of gardener's work, he could just read well enough to be enchanted with that "Tale of a Tub" on which he spent his last threepence, at the expense of his grumbling stomach, and which, no doubt, sowed the first seeds of intellectual culture within him. When, at the age of twenty or twenty-one, having been previously "spoiled for a farmer" by a glimpse of the sea and the thoughts awakened thereby at Portsmouth, he fairly ran away from home for good, emphatically and literally for good, and became quill-driver to an attorney in London, he "could write a good plain hand," but he was still all abroad as to grammar and orthography. And this was his condition of education when, after a short spell of quill-driving, he "took the King's shilling" and "went for a soldier" to Nova Scotia. The state of the British private, as described by Cobbett, was at that time simply awful; but it was in all probability the making of Cobbett, though it would have been, and undoubtedly was, the ruin of many a man not so well constituted physically, mentally, and morally, and, let it be borne in mind, so thoroughly instructed in sound and honourable principles by his humble but excellent father. The very misery and starvation, and the want of occupation which drove his comrades to seek a solace in drink, when they could get it, and in all manner of dissolute and frivolous pastime, impelled him, with his sober, healthy, active habits, for activity is of the mind as well as of the body, to take refuge from hunger and idleness in hard, sustained uncompromising study. And so, when he left the army, after seven or eight years' service, having reached the grade of sergeant-major, he had a very considerable knowledge, not only of grammar, but of logic, rhetoric, and arithmetic; he could write something more than "a good plain hand," and he had made the acquaintance of French and fortification. And all this he had taught himself; the some time ploughboy had transformed himself into a comparatively learned man. After this, in 1792, feeling the influence of the Republican spirit which was abroad, he must needs go and see things for himself, first in France, with an oblique intention of improving himself in the French language, and then in the United States. It is not long, then, before the ex-ploughboy is actually teaching "the English language to French people in Philadelphia," and composing a grammar which was so successful as to be, after a while, "in general use all over Europe." He had not been long in the United States before his indignation was greatly kindled by attacks upon his country; and his indignation did not, like Juvenal's, "make verse," but it made prose flow from his pen, such prose as nobody who differed from him had any difficulty in understanding. And so he became a political writer. He also became, by force of circumstances in the first instance, his own publisher and bookseller. He was not without experience of the publishing business, therefore, when he returned to England, full of hatred for Republicanism, in 1800; and he was already favourably, or, at any rate, honourably known in his own country under his celebrated pseudonym of "Peter Porcupine." The ex-ploughboy was soon in the thick of newspaper writing and newspaper publishing, was hand and glove with Tories of the highest standing, had the ear of a vast audience, and in 1802 started the famous "Political Register." In 1803 he projected, it appears, the publication which has become identified with the name of Hansard. He had begun his course of political writing in England by lauding Mr. Pitt to the skies; he soon finds reason to change his tone, and to denounce the "heaven-born Minister." He showed himself strong in language, strong in measures, strong in the arm; he would probably have called himself a law-abiding man, but he inflicted prompt personal chastisement on occasion, when libellous charges seemed to render it excusable. He was in truth what is called a "masterful" creature, with such bodily health and thews and sinews as a bully would desire above all things, but with such mental force and capacity as a bully seldom or never possesses. In December, 1832, he was returned as member of Parliament for Oldham; and thus was fulfilled a desire which the ex-ploughboy had not cherished until late in life. His Parliamentary career was short and scarcely brilliant. When "the House assembled on the evening of June 19," 1835, "a whisper circulated upon the benches to the effect that the member for Oldham was dead." To class Cobbett as a politician is what few people would attempt to do; perhaps he should be put in a class by himself, and labelled nameless. As a man he was wonderful certainly, if he be not altogether admirable; and among his personal characteristics must be included enormous egotism and sublime self-assertion. The story of his life is well worth the trouble, if it be a trouble, of reading; but what, if any, reason there may be for telling, or retelling, it just now is not to be discovered from any statement in the two volumes devoted to the purpose, which two volumes, it must be thankfully recorded, have an index, as well as an appendix containing a "bibliographical list of William Cobbett's publications."

Popularity, in the widest sense of the term, can hardly be predicted for the Memoir of the Rev. Francis Hodgson, B.D., by his son, the Rev. James T. Hodgson, M.A. (Macmillan and Co.), but it may safely be affirmed that the two volumes will be read with extraordinary interest and delight among a comparatively, but by no means positively or superlatively, small circle. The author, for lack of "personal recollections or original letters," has "endeavoured to make the letters of friends, as far as possible, illustrative of the life and character of their correspondent," and to bring out certain phases of the period, social, political, or literary, "by indicating mutual opinions on matters of contemporary interest." He calls this "a novel mode of procedure," and considers it "liable to much adverse criticism:" but only an unreasonable being would object to a method which, to say nothing of dire necessity, results in an oblation of letters written by Lord Byron, by members of Lord Byron's family, and by all kinds of celebrities, especially of the scholarly order. That scholars should predominate is but natural, inasmuch as the subject of the memoir is that Rev. Mr. Hodgson, who was elected to the erroneously called Dr. Hodgson, who was elected to the Provostship of Eton, on May 5, 1840, and whose "best memorial of his work at Eton is to be found in the numerous improvements which by his resolute energy, his conciliatory kindness, and his consummate tact, he successfully inaugurated—improvements which gave an impetus to similar efforts, and formed a fitting conclusion to a life devoted from the first to the best interests of religion and literature." That life began on Nov. 16, 1781, at Croydon, where the father of Francis Hodgson was master of Archbishop Whitgift's school, and terminated at Eton just two days before the end of the year 1852. Provost Hodgson will go down to Etonian posterity with acclamation or execration, as the stern abolisher of "montem." To Eton he had gone as a boy in 1794; and in 1799 "he was elected to a scholarship at King's College, Cambridge, where he took the usual degrees, being excluded," we are told, "from public classical competition by the prejudicial restrictions then imposed upon Kingsmen." In 1808 we find him residing at Cambridge, as fellow and tutor of King's; in 1814 he married the first of his two wives, Miss Tayler, "a young lady of great beauty and refinement," who died in 1833; and in the interval between 1808 and 1814 he had cemented with Lord Byron that intimate friendship which, with its accessories, will be considered by the general reader, to whom, probably, Eton and Cambridge and scholars and scholarship will be matters of indifference, to invest the memoir with a singular charm. The cement of the friendship was undoubtedly Lord Byron's open-handed generosity at a pinch which it is not necessary to particularly specify here. Suffice it to say that Lord Byron laid his friend under so heavy a pecuniary obligation that the "reverence" of the latter could not well help being more tolerant than would otherwise have been expected towards the irreverence of the former. It is quite refreshing to read of such a transaction nowadays, when the good old fashion of opening one's purse to a friend, without any subsequent and consequent coolness on either side, is regarded very generally as incompatible with prevailing social conditions; and it is still more refreshing when we reflect that the friend who needed and obtained a helping hand lost neither self-respect nor the respect of others, as narrow-minded preachers of a sordid creed would have us believe such a man must do, but arrived at great honour and dignity in society, in the Church, and especially in the sphere of duties connected with the education of youth. In May, 1838, Mr. Hodgson married his second wife, daughter of Lord Denman, then Chief Justice of England; and in 1840, as has been already stated, he was elected Provost of Eton, where he left his mark in the shape of many notable reforms. He had some poetical pretensions, and he fulfilled Byron's prediction, "You will go on rhyming to the end of the chapter;" but whether he ever did more than "rhyme" is a question which it were bootless to discuss, and which, with the name and presence of Byron continually at hand to overshadow him, it would be almost impossible to discuss dispassionately. It might give some idea, however, of Mr. Hodgson's place in the poetical scale to state the following approximate proportion: as the better sort of Cambridge prize-poem is to "Childe Harold," so is Hodgson to Byron. And it must be remembered that the names of Tennyson, Macaulay, and other bright luminaries are among those of the heroes who have won prize poems. But all this is apart from the main interest of the two volumes, which will be read principally for the numerous, various, valuable letters. The writers of those letters may be discerned at once by a glance at the useful index.

A ROMANTIC WALK.

Illustrated, but, unfortunately, not provided with an index, On Foot in Spain: by J. S. Campion (Chapman and Hall), contains in one large volume a very pleasant, chatty, interesting, instructive account of a romantic walk undertaken by the author from the Bay of Biscay to the Mediterranean. An "unhackneyed route," and the experiences of a traveller "journeying in a different manner from any preceding him," are certainly attractions to which no reader ought to be insensible. It was close upon winter in 1876 when the author cast about for a country whither he might run from the English climate and customs, and, having read that "as a pedestrian tour for pleasure is a thing utterly unknown in Spain, walking is not to be thought of for a moment," was at once inspired by the demon of opposition with the happy thought and firm determination of actually doing what he was forbidden even to think of. He would fain have found a congenial friend; but, such an one not being discoverable, he went forth alone to seek his fortune. And though he met with nothing very astounding, he had adventures, and adventures of which it is very pleasant and amusing to read his account. He is a sportsman, and thereby hangs his first tale of adventure. For no sooner had he left Bayonne and San Sebastian, the limit of his travelling by rail, behind him, than he found some difficulty in recovering his trusty gun, of which he had been not unreasonably deprived at the frontier, and in obtaining a license to carry arms. He also discovered that he was in "the land of to-morrow," where an applicant for anything and everything—at any rate, if the application be made to an official—is always, apparently, put off with the courteous admonition, "Wait till to-morrow and go with God." So agreeable, however, did he, as his readers also will, find San Sebastian, that he stayed there much longer than he had intended; so long, indeed, from the 14th to the 30th of November, that he began to fear for his chances of reaching the Mediterranean. But at last he was off, with his dog Juan for sole companion, on foot and, in respect of human beings, alone, notwithstanding the ghastly warning he received from a Frenchman, who exhibited the scars of two ugly wounds as evidence of the treatment in store for the lonely traveller. The first place of importance which lay before him was Pamplona, and there he arrived early in December, having in the interval had some strange but, on the whole, by no means unpleasant experience. At Pamplona he made the acquaintance of an eccentric Lieutenant in the Spanish army, who conducted himself in an extraordinary manner described with much vivacity; and, soon after leaving Pamplona, where he remained a few days, he is vindicating the claims of Englishmen to consider themselves superior to all other men in athletics by "dancing down" his partner, the loveliest and lithest of her sex, in an improvised "jota" at the chief hotel of Tafalla. Anon we find ourselves in the author's company at Tudela, and not nearly so much disappointed with his description of it as he appears to have been with the place itself. He chooses this occasion for giving a pretty full account of the aforesaid "jota," or "national dance," which seems to be a sort of first cousin to the "cancan," and therefore not likely to make much way in circles frequented by Mrs. Grundy, or, indeed, in any circles where the proprieties are very carefully studied, however exhilarating it may be to a wild pedestrian traveller who has qualified for the roughest pastimes in the regions of Arizona. Having spent with the author a somewhat embarrassing time among the pretty girls of Tudela, whose beauty, free manners, and freer language are calculated to shock a particularly well-regulated mind, we are once more off on the tramp with him; and in due time, leaving the boundary of Navarra behind us, are informed that we are in Aragon. We now have rather a bad time of it, what with two score of labouring men whose outward resemblance to one's ideal of the "forty thieves" probably does them injustice, what with an ill-tempered mistress of a café, what with inability to obtain bed and board, and what with the importunate friendliness of a generous but drunken and vermiuiferous "cabalero," until we arrive at Alagon. Here again we watch the author as he dances a "jota," the Aragonese "jota," which differs from that of Navarra, both in other respects and in a total absence of "flagrant improprieties." It is just possible, however, that the author's experience of the "jota" as danced in Navarra was obtained under exceptional circumstances. Zaragoza next claims our attention; and we are as pleased as the author declares himself to have been with the greater part of what he saw there. Early on the morning of Jan. 26, 1877, our author "walked forth from Zaragoza, bound for Lerida across Los Monegros, a tract of country which" he "had been solemnly warned against attempting to traverse on foot or alone." But a wilful man must have his way; and in this case the wilfulness resulted in nothing much worse than imminent peril of drowning in the Ebro, savage people, penetrating alkaline dust, roads hard as iron, bad quarters, scanty fare, hot sun, and long marches. At last he reaches Lerida, and is once more in clover. We obtain just a glimpse of the way in which the Carnival is kept at Lerida; we are taken to a masked ball, we are entertained with much delightful gossip about the old place and its inhabitants and its neighbourhood, and then we are marched off to Mollrusa, whence, after a night's rest, we move forward to Tarrage and to Cervera. It is not long before we sight Montserrat, as we pursue our way; and after a while we put up at "the considerable town of Igualada." Hereabouts, we learn, on the authority of a certain priest, that Queen Victoria "has for some time been reconciled to Mother Church," but that the fact is not generally known, because "there are reasons of state for great discretions." We next follow the author into a monastic institution, that of Montserrat to wit, where he was admitted as an inmate to remain for three days; and with him we ascend the mountain and share his feelings as he gazes forth and sees the glimmer of the Mediterranean, the limit of his wanderings. On Thursday, Feb. 22, 1877, the author delivered into the proper hands his votive offering to "The Pearl of Catalunia," "Jewel of the Mountain," and "Queen of Montserrat," &c., slung his gun and haversack, and, going "at a rattling pace," had struck before noon "the high road from Igualada to Barcelona." At Barcelona the author detains us, but very agreeably, for an unusually long time, introduces us to different persons, places, and things, and shows us what sort of a reception is accorded to King Alfonso. At Barcelona, too, the author changes his travel-stained costume and puts on the appearance of a civilised being who desires to exhibit himself clothed and in his right mind: at Barcelona he bids adieu to the dog which had been his faithful comrade; at Barcelona he takes the "through ticket to Perpignan, viâ rail and diligence;" and at Perpignan, after five months', or nearly five months', romantic rambling, he arrived in due course. There we may take leave of him, with many thanks for his book, with a murmur of regret at the absence of both map and index, with the distinct assertion that the tale of his experience will upset many an accepted idea about Spain and the Spanish, with the remark that his want of complete grammatical command over a certain English verb and a certain English relative scarcely interferes at all with the favourable impression made by his narrative, any more than the occasional tone of fastness and flippancy interferes with the general enjoyment of his sprightly, genial, straightforward style, and with such a hope of meeting him again before long as may be aptly expressed in the words with which his trip has made him especially familiar: "Go with God, and return to-morrow."

IN TYROL.

Anything more grotesquely and ludicrously profane, as many good Christians count profanity, than the earliest portions of Goddings with a Primitive People, by W. A. Baillie Grohman (Remington and Co.), it would be difficult to conceive; but the author of the two volumes would, no doubt, repudiate with indignation any intention of irreverence, and would plead that he simply states facts which came under his notice, and which he deeply regrets to be obliged to record; at the same time that he would be among the first to improve off the face of the earth, and especially off the face of Tyrol, the ignorance, the superstition, the miscalled religion, to which such regrettable occurrences are, as he and others may think, to be attributed. But, of course, when an author undertakes to describe a dramatic entertainment in which Divine personages, too awful, almost, to be mentioned by name, are introduced upon the stage and subjected to much such treatment as the clown in a pantomime bestows with a red-hot poker upon pantaloon or another, the most fearful profanity is an inevitable consequence. So much it was necessary to say to prepare the reverent class of readers against the shock to be encountered in the description, with which the first of the two volumes opens, of "The Paradise Play," akin to that "Ober Ammergau Passion Play," of which everybody has probably heard too much, though its performance at the Westminster Aquarium was not permitted to advance beyond the phase of a mere proposition. Having dealt with the "Paradise Play" and its curious if not very edifying associations, the author proceeds to sketch, for the information and amusement as well as instruction of his readers, certain "Alpine characters," such as "the village priest" and "the village schoolmaster," to say nothing of "the antiquarian in Tyrol" and of "the mountain belle." Mention of the "belle" naturally suggests weddings; and, accordingly, we have quite a noticeable number of chapters devoted to the subject of "weddings here and there in the Alps." We are then treated to a chapter concerning "a Tyrolese 'kirchtag' and rifle-match," the "kirchtag" being "the grand fete day of the year in the secluded valleys in Tyrol." After this there is a chapter in which we pay "a visit to a Tyrolese peasant watering-place;" and then comes the concluding chapter, in which we are taken for "an Alpine walk." The author is, or should be, well known already as one who writes with knowledge, as well as in a bright, forcible, picturesque style, and with the sympathies of the sportsmen added to the qualifications of a generally keen and observant spectator, about Tyrol and the Tyrolese, for he has before now given the public a taste of his quality in a very charming and readable book. He assures us that it is a mistake to consider all Alpine subjects written out; that whoever uses such language can only justify it by confining it to mere "surface matter;" and that not one, but many volumes, were still to be written when he began his present work, if full justice were to be done to his favourite mountain-land. His two volumes will unquestionably go a long way to establish the truth of his statement, for he has collected together, and has presented in a very attractive manner, a quantity of material which he has woven into the form of a pleasant and interesting narrative, conspicuous for novelty and freshness. And long residence in the land about which he has written invests him with a character of unusual trustworthiness; there is little or no hearsay, little but knowledge obtained at first hand, to be met with in his account. However, in the "chapter on watering-places in Tyrol" there is a romantic tale which, though it has "found its way into several books," may not be generally familiar. It is a tale about the "man of blood and iron," the redoubtable Prince von Bismarck. There is in the Ulten valley in South Tyrol a small peasant's watering-place, called Mitterbad. Thither, as the story goes, young Bismarck, "then in the first prime of youthful manhood," went for the first time in 1841, and fell a victim to the charms of Josepha Holzner, daughter of the man who then owned the bathing establishment. The visit to Mitterbad was renewed from year to year, and the flirtation was continued. At last the "man of blood and iron" actually proposed to the lovely "washerwoman," as a "junker" might have called her, and—was refused, not by Josepha, it appears, but by her uncompromising father, who, as "a stanch Catholic peasant" was amazed beyond description at the thought of uniting his daughter with a heretic, stormed and swore, and once for all declined the honour." The "man of blood and iron" might well have adopted strong measures, but we are told that he simply "left Mitterbad the next morning," and Josepha, several years afterwards, married the mysterious personage known to sentimental song-writers and novelists under the general name of Another. We need not proceed to consider the questions suggested by the author as likely to arise from a perusal of "this simple little love story;" we may rest content with referring the reader to the author's own pages.

THE SOLAR ECLIPSE OF 1878.

(From the "Illustrated London Almanack.")

The Solar Eclipse of July 29, 1878, was observed by an array of instrumental appliances, and under conditions such as had been seen at no previous eclipse. It was regarded as the return of that of July 18, 1860, when the Moon's shadow crossed the northerly parts of the American continent, and, sweeping over the Atlantic Ocean, passed across Spain and Africa.

At La Junta, shortly after two o'clock on July 29, 1878, as the Moon cut into the solar disc, the light rapidly waned, and a peculiar yellow colour, gradually changing to a dark neutral tint, overspread the landscape. The cloudless sky became of a leaden hue, and a few minutes before totality Venus and Mercury were plainly visible; immediately afterwards a streak of yellow light seemed to open out along the northern horizon, and the dark shadow travelled across the plain. A few seconds before the Moon's disc completely covered over the Sun, the corona shone out distinctly at 5h. 35m. 20s. (10h. 30m. 27s. Greenwich mean time). From the commencement to the end of the totality not a trace of Leverrier's long-looked-for planet was detected; but for several seconds after totality the corona stood out clear and distinct, and slowly faded away. The duration of the totality was 168 seconds, three seconds shorter than the computed time. A fine series of photographs were obtained, in each of which was shown an amount of detail and structure of the corona far beyond anything previously seen. In two of the prominences there was a well-defined "filamentous" development, and it was noticed that, with the increased exposure of plates, an extension of the corona took place, as noticed by Schuster in the Siam eclipse. The outlying portions of the prominences were found to extend between three and four diameters away from the Sun. The western extension exhibiting more of the "filamentous structure." The rose-coloured prominences, usually the most striking objects in a total eclipse, were not seen by any of the La Junta observers. With a Nichol's prism and a thick quartz plate radial polarisation was distinctly observed, the polarisation near the limb of the Moon was about 10 per cent, decreasing outwards. Photographic evidence of polarisation was obtained by exposing gelatine-bromide prepared plates in a Ross symmetrical lens camera of five-inch focus and 0·5 effective aperture, at the back of which was a double-image prism. The plate was exposed about eighty seconds.

At West Las Animas (latitude 38° 04′ and longitude 9h. 02m. 48 sec., west Greenwich) spectroscopic observations of the eclipse were made, and the well-known green line 1474 of Kirchoff's scale was seen in the continuous spectrum. Line and spectrum, however, disappeared at all points at a height of about eight minutes of arc from the Sun's limb. The violet parts of the spectrum were remarkably vivid, and it was possible to see far into the ultra violet much further than with ordinary sunlight. Spectroscopic examination of the corona showed a strong continuous spectrum, reaching nearly to the calcium line H, and up to a height of 0·3 of the Sun's diameter no weakening of the spectrum was visible. On examining the green part of the spectrum indications of two lines were observed, but no measurements could be made.

A large number of general observations were made, such as the wonderful transparency of the Colorado atmosphere, the effect produced on animals, on the colours of objects, their visibility, &c., whilst the darkness was far from being so great as was anticipated, although the decrease of temperature, as indicated by Edison's tasimeter, was considerable.

The Leeds Mercury says:—We are able to contradict on the best authority the report that Mr. Gladstone has actually decided to become a candidate for Midlothian at the next general election. He has been requested to contest the constituency, but has given no final answer.

There has been found in a house at Larkfield, near Maidstone, lately occupied by a woman known as "Becky Wise," an old stocking which contained about 500 sovereigns and twenty-three spade guineas, together with the deeds of some freehold house property at Brompton, and a quantity of small silver. No will disposing of the property has been found.

The usual Conference of Head Masters of Public Schools was held at Harrow on Friday and Saturday last week, under the presidency of Dr. Butler. They passed a vote of thanks to the Universities for their efforts to carry out the wishes of the conference in providing means for testing and certifying the efficiency of teachers. There was also a discussion on whether Greek might be made an optional subject for a degree at the Universities, about which there was a great difference of opinion.—Lord Houghton yesterday week distributed the prizes to the students at Goole Grammar School, and in his address referred with satisfaction to the establishment of board schools throughout the country, and expressed the hope that parents who could afford other means would send their children to middle-class or grammar schools.—On the same day Mr. W. S. Stanhope, M.P., distributed the prizes at the Doncaster Grammar School.—Dr. Temple, Bishop of Exeter, distributed the prizes to the boys attending the practising school attached to the Diocesan Training College, Exeter, on Monday; and on the same day Mr. Sheriff Bevan (in the unavoidable absence of the Lord Mayor) presided at the annual presentation of exhibitions and prizes to the pupils of the Haberdashers' (Hoxton) Schools. These schools were founded by Robert Aske, a member of the Haberdashers' Company, early in the seventeenth century, and at the present moment provide accommodation for 300 boys and 300 girls.

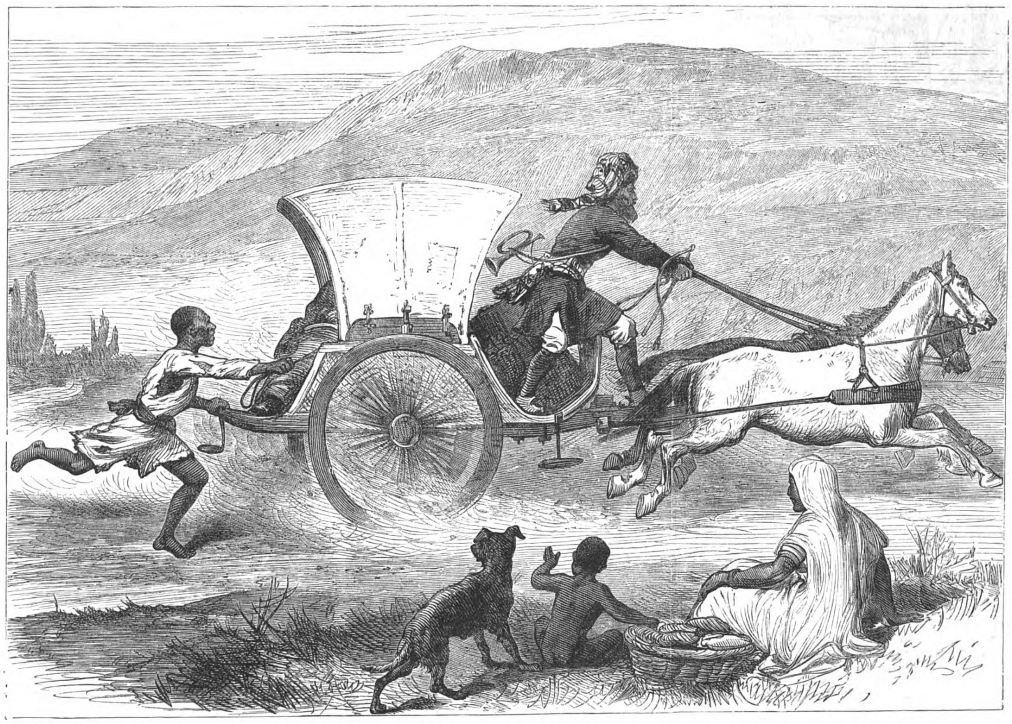
THE MARQUIS OF LORNE AND PRINCESS LOUISE IN CANADA: SKETCHES ON THE JOURNEY FROM HALIFAX TO MONTREAL, BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

MAJOR WHYTE-MELVILLE.

It is sadly noticeable how frequently distinguished horsemen meet their death from the most trivial accidents. George Ede, the most accomplished gentleman rider that ever weighed out, was killed at a fence that a schoolboy could have negotiated on his pony; Harry Grimshaw and George Stevens, who had "carried their lives in their hands" scores and scores of times, died from injuries received by being thrown out of gigs; and now Major Whyte-Melville, one of the most finished cross-country riders of the day, has been killed when galloping across a piece of ploughed land. His horse, probably distressed by the heavy state of the ground, came down, and the Major, falling heavily, dislocated his neck and died instantaneously. Major John George Whyte-Melville was born in 1821, and entered the Coldstream Guards in 1839. He became Captain in 1846, but retired from the Army about three years later. On the outbreak of the war with Russia, however, he joined the cavalry of the Turkish Contingent, and remained in that service until the declaration of peace in 1856. As a hunting man he was most catholic in his tastes, equally at home in the shires, with the wild deer on Exmoor, with Lord Wolverton's bloodhounds, or with the Baron's in the Vale of Aylesbury; and though by no means remarkable for expensive mounts, it was rarely indeed that he failed to hold his own in any country. But it is as a novel-writer that Whyte-Melville will be best remembered by thousands of his countrymen. "Digby Grand," which was, we believe, his earliest work, at once made him a reputation, and "Kate Coventry," "Market Harborough," "Satanella," "Katerfelto," and many other works, well sustained it. Few writers could boast of more versatility, for "The Gladiators," "Sarchedon," and others, which were written in a widely different style from those which we have previously mentioned, have also obtained great popularity. As the poet laureate of the hunting-field he stands quite alone, and his songs will not be forgotten nor unsung as long as there is a pack of hounds in England.



THE LATE MAJOR WHYTE-MELVILLE.

HENRY DAWSON.

This eminent landscape-painter died on Friday, the 13th inst. He was born at Hull, in 1811, but was taken to Nottingham when a year old, and, having resided there for thirty years, he always regarded himself and was regarded by the people of the town as a Nottingham man; hence the organisation of the remarkable exhibition of his works in the Art-Museum of Nottingham Castle last summer. He began life as a "twist hand" in a lace factory; but, the love of art manifesting itself, he devoted his spare time to painting, and adopted art as his profession in 1835. In 1844 he went to Liverpool, and in 1849 removed to Croydon, where he painted some of his finest works, including "The Wooden Walls of Old England," "The Rainbow," "The Rainbow at Sea," "The Pool from London Bridge," and "London at Sunrise." From Croydon Mr. Dawson went to Thorpe, where he painted the noble picture of "The Houses of Parliament." The last years of his life were spent at The Cedars, Chiswick, where he died, after a long and painful illness. Throughout his career, till a very few years back, the artist struggled on the borders of poverty through the lowness of the prices at which he was obliged to sell his pictures. At the Academy his works were either rejected, "skied," or "floored." That he was to some extent a follower of Turner, though not a servile one, was doubtless prejudicial to him with an institution that was not only unjust to Turner himself, but has scarcely recognised the great branch of art in which many Continental artists and critics think our school has (since the time of Reynolds) won its highest distinction. The closing of the Old British Institution, where Mr. Dawson's pictures were always well placed, was a serious blow to him; and so was the failure of a movement (through the death probably of his friend, John Philip) to redress the injustice of his exclusion from the Academic ranks. At length, in 1872 and '73, when the artist was past sixty, his pictures were for the first time placed on the line at the Academy; and almost concurrently the market prices of his works increased in a proportion which has had few parallels, except in the case of David Cox and Turner. He now received more to sign his early pictures than he had originally sold them for. As a single example of the rise in price, we may mention that "The Wooden Walls," which in 1852 was bought of the artist for £75, sold at Christie's in 1876 for £1400. Mr. Dawson will, we believe, rank in the history of our school but little, if at all, after Crome, Müller, Cox, and other of our long inadequately appreciated masters. He has left two sons who follow closely, perhaps too closely, the father's style.

BURKE'S PEERAGE AND BARONETAGE, 1879.

There is scarcely any annual publication which strikes us as more suitable or more acceptable for a Christmas present than a copy of this valuable work. A drawing-room is inadequately furnished without it, and the student's library cannot be considered complete unless the book is on the shelf. To official and legal men, and, indeed, to the public at large the information it contains is indispensable. As each year passes, we are enabled, on the receipt of Burke's Peerage, to make our annual retrospect of peerage and baronetical events. During the past twelve months we find that only two new creations have been made, Cranbrook and Norton, the former conferred on Lord Beaconsfield's stanch colleague, Mr. Gathorne Hardy, the latter on Sir Charles Bowyer Adderley, an ex-Minister who, in his time, has done the state good service. There has also been one promotion, and one justly deserved—that of the Lord Chancellor to the Earldom of Cairns. Historically, the Peerage is enriched by the restoration of the Scottish Earldom of Lindsay, and by the termination of the abeyance of the Baronies of Mowbray and Segrave in favour of Lord Stourton, the senior cohelr. During the same interval fourteen Peers have died, and two Peeresses in their own right—viz., the Duke of Cumberland (King of Hanover), the Marquis of Ailesbury, Earls Bathurst, Ravensworth, Leitrim, Russell, Ashburnham, Lauderdale, and Dysart; Viscount Southwell; Lords Middleton, Kinnaird, Dynevor, and Chelmsford; the Countess of Newburgh, and Baroness Gray. It is a strange coincidence that the number of deceased Peers in the year 1878 is precisely the same as in the previous year, 1877. Among these deaths occur those of Lords Russell and Chelmsford, and also that of the King of Hanover, an event which raises a curious point as to the precedence and position of his son, the present Duke of Cumberland. Sir Bernard, in his Preface, argues, and we think conclusively, that the title retains pre-eminence over all dukedoms not Royal. Whilst only sixteen Peers and two Peeresses in their own right have died, there have been no less than thirty-one deaths of Baronets. The more remarkable among these were the Hon. Sir Edward Cust, the distinguished soldier and writer; Sir William Stirling Maxwell of Keir and Pollok, still more eminent in literature; the Right Hon. Sir William Gibson Craig, Lord Clerk Registrar of Scotland; and Sir F. R. Goldsmid. One Baronetcy, that of East, has become extinct, and one new Baronetcy made, that of Buchanan. We find an interesting addition made this year for the first time—viz., an official list of the ladies decorated with the Royal order of Victoria and Albert, and with the Imperial order of the Crown of India.

THE AFGHAN WAR: WITH THE KHOORUM VALLEY FIELD FORCE.—GENERAL ROBERTS LEAVING KOHAT FOR THE FRONT.

CHRISTMAS ENTERTAINMENTS.

From the list we have already given of the Pantomimes we may observe that they are as numerous as ever; whether as entertaining, the public have had to decide. In the brief space of time that we have had to attempt an extended account of their contents, we can do little more than indicate their general character and such few details as can be collected of their specific subjects and treatment.

DRURY LANE.—The "Annual," as Mr. E. L. Blanchard delights to call his pantomime, at the national theatre, is entitled, as we have already informed our readers, "Cinderella; or Harlequin and the Fairy Slipper." The subject is old and frequently repeated, yet seems never to wear out. Mr. Blanchard adheres, as he always does, to the familiar story in all its leading incidents. It has pleased him on this occasion, however, to lay the scene on the borders of France and Germany. The action commences with a mountain pass and woody glen in the Black Forest by sunset, wherein the Princess Pumpernickel (Mr. Frederick Vokes) and the Prince Amabel (Miss Jessie Vokes) are amusing themselves with hunting the wild boar. The Fairy Iris, spirit of the rainbow, presents in a vision the face of Cinderella to the Prince, whom he resolves, as Sheridan Knowles would have said, "to win and wear." The famous slippers are the first objects of attention, as essential to the very motive of the drama, and these are especially made in the Glass Factory of the Basaltic Valley for the occasion. Next, Cinderella herself comes, as the modern Spiritualist would say, into manifestation, and we are induced to witness and sympathise with the sufferings which she receives from the cruelty of her elder sisters. These circumstances, and others relating to the famous invitation to the hall, and the various incidents recorded in the old fairy chronicles with which every child is acquainted, are all set forth in the action of the well-appointed scenes that compose the introduction to the usual harlequinade. The transformation scene is especially brilliant. It is called "The Assemblage of the Hours." The scenery by Mr. W. Beverley, is on an extensive scale, and comprises some singularly novel effects. Nor are the costumes neglected, which are, indeed, very elaborate, and designed, with the accessories, by the ingenious and fanciful artist M. Wilhelm; the dresses themselves are by Mrs. May. The properties and machinery are provided by Messrs. Hone and Tucker, and have the advantage of their extensive experience. The overture and music are composed and selected by Karl Meyder, a highly skilled and clever musician. Mr. John Cormack is, as usual, responsible for the ballets and general action. The performance is sustained and elevated by the splendid acting of Mr. Frederick Vokes and Miss Jessie Vokes, already mentioned; and these are greatly assisted by Fawden Vokes and by Miss Victoria Vokes, in the parts of the Baron's servant, Kobold, and Cinder-Ella. The wicked sisters, Pavonia and Vixena, are forcibly represented by Miss Julia Warden and Miss Hudspeth. Mr. Fred Evans and Mr. Charles Lauri are the clowns.

COVENT-GARDEN.—"Jack and the Beanstalk; or, Harlequin and the Seven Champions as We've Christened 'Em," has been written expressly for this theatre by Frank W. Green, with new and magnificent scenery by Julian Hicks, dresses designed by Alfred Thompson and executed by Auguste and Co. The ballets are arranged by M. Dewinne. The music is composed and arranged by M. Marlois. The pantomime is invented and produced by Charles Harris. The Model Dairy Farm of the Widow Simpson, Jack's mother (Mr. Herbert Campbell), who is suffering from impecuniosity, from which strait her son Jack (Miss Fannie Leslie) and her page, Thomas (Mr. G. H. Macdermott), are unable to suggest any outlet, opens the story; and they accordingly resolve to sell the cow, which the foolish boys unthinkingly exchange for a hatful of beans, which, thrown away by the dame, and taking root, grow to the skies. Jack climbs the beanstalk, and is followed by the dame, the page, and the dog Punch (Master Lauri). Jack next passes through Fairyland, where he receives a magic sword from the Fairy Queen (Miss Kate Paradise), and where we are treated to a ballet, with Mesdames Limido and Sidonie as principal dancers. Jack rescues the fair Princess Pansie (Miss Clara Jecks) from the Giant's castle, and, after a series of astounding adventures, is directed by Quicksilver to the Grand Palace of King Pippin (Mr. E. J. George), where a fête is held in honour of Jack. "On the road to the beanstalk" we are introduced to the "Seven Champions as We've Christened 'Em," all of whom aspire to the hand of the Princess, promised to him who shall slay the giant. Quicksilver presents Jack with a magic axe, with which to cut the beanstalk. The fall of the beanstalk shows the giant lying dead, having in his descent crushed the houses of the villagers. Here a general rejoicing takes place, the soldiers take possession of the body, and the hero Jack is congratulated by them and the populace upon his achievement. The Throne-Room of King Pippin then shows us the union of Jack and the Princess, and Thomas is united to the blushing Dame. We next pass to the grand Transformation of the Fairy Beanstalk, painted by Mr. Julian Hicks, which is on a scale of unusual splendour. The harlequinade gives us our old favourite Harry Payne as Clown, Misses Phillips and King as Columbine and Harlequina, Messrs. George Vokes and Tully Louis as Harlequin and Pantaloon. Messrs A. and S. Gatti in this, their first dramatic production at Covent-Garden Theatre, have spared neither trouble nor expense. The excellence of Mr. Hicks's scenery, the dresses of Auguste and Co., and the properties of Messrs. Labhart and Burdett need no comment.

GAIETY.—The pantomime at this house anticipated the customary night by being produced on Saturday, the 21st, and proves to be a revival of Mr. H. J. Byron's "Jack the Giant-killer," originally produced at the Princess's in 1859. It is needless to say that it has been entirely rewritten and immensely improved. The scenic accessories have been supplied by Mr. Banks, and are of remarkable excellence. Some of them are marvels of perspective—such as a corridor of columns and windows of wonderful depth, the illusion of which is perfect: and a mechanical set of the Glowworm's Dell in the Haunted Forest, introducing a transformation scene of dazzling beauty and endless developments, implying an expenditure not easily to be calculated. The ballet scenes are equally remarkable, particularly one in which Mdlle. Ænea performs a "flying dance," together with many other startling and graceful things, and must command admiration and patronage. Miss Jenny Hill, a little girl, sustains the part of Jack with exquisite vivacity, singing and dancing with admirable efficiency. At length "the Golden Gates of Progress" let in the harlequinade troupe, Mr. W. Warde as Harlequin, Miss C. Gilchrist and Miss L. Wilson as Columbines, Mr. W. Orkins as Clown, and Mr. Bishop and Mr. Hector as Pantaloon and Policeman. The merits of this Christmas drama and its performance must ensure it an extended and prolonged popularity.

ALHAMBRA.—Here we have a version of "La Poule aux Œufs d'Or," as translated from the French of MM. Dennery and Clairville, and of which, except the last act, a grand dress rehearsal has been already presented to a select public. The rising of the curtain reveals a picturesque view of a chalet and the ruins of a once handsome edifice, now converted into a fowl-house. This châlet, with its surroundings, has long been in the possession of Anselme, an old farmer. A village fête is taking place in the valley to celebrate the diamond wedding of Anselme and his wife, Marceline. While his sons, Polycarpe, Barnaby, Babolein, Urbain, and his adopted child, Florine, are enjoying themselves, Baylas, another son, takes it into his whimsical head to inspect the fowl-house which is so carefully watched over by his father, and ere long discovers a very, very old hen that has just laid a golden egg. He manages to secure the golden egg. His father learns that his secret has been discovered, and tells the history of the old hen, which is an enchanted one, having swallowed an evil geni, and is compelled to lay golden eggs in the hope that they may cause misery throughout the world. It is ordained that any person breaking one of these eggs may have any wish granted. King Gros Minet, with his daughter, Princess Fanfieluche, and suite, returning from hunting, the Princess's horse, taking fright, throws its Royal mistress, who is in a very great rage, and vows vengeance upon the villagers. Florine steps forward and confesses herself the unintentional delinquent, and is sent to prison. Urbain endeavours to rescue her from the retainers, and obtains a promise from Anselme to restore her through the agency of the Magic Eggs. Anselme is compelled to wander forth through the world, until by some means the spell is broken under which he suffers. One of the five baskets of eggs is a black one, which is filled with eggs that have been laid on a Friday. The five brothers come into the hen-house, and each takes a basket of eggs, Babolein choosing the black one. Polycarpe breaks one of the eggs, and wishes to become a mighty Emperor, in the hope of obtaining the hand of Princess Fanfieluche. Barnaby breaks another egg, and wishes to become a Grand Turk and make Fanfieluche his Sultana and head of his seraglio; and Babylas breaks one of his eggs, and wishes to be a second Alexander the Great; Babolein breaks an egg, and wishes to become King Perfume, but does not reign over the perfume he intended; whilst Urbain breaks one of his, and wishes that Florine were set at liberty. Such is the elaborate basis of this extravaganza plot. The working out of it would require more space than we can afford. There are two grand ballets and a scene in Hades—a procession and "Danse Infernal," in which the Girards appear. Anselme in the end reads his son a wholesome lesson, breaks the last egg, and wishes they may all return to their former mode of life, and at the same time determines as soon as he reaches his châlet that he will destroy the old hen and have no more golden eggs.

ROYAL AQUARIUM.—The new pantomime, by the Brothers Grinn, called "Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp; or, the Flying Palace and Big Ben of Westminster," is, indeed, altogether a splendid affair. Mr. Fawn, as an old widow, delights his audience with a catchword, owing its effect entirely to repetition, and Miss Kate Phillips, as an Eastern schoolboy, misbehaves herself to the entire satisfaction of the audience. Mr. Collette, as a masked demon, and a wicked magician, indulges in stage imitations as entertaining as they are exact; while Mr. Paul Martinetti as the dumb slave of Abanazar, delights us with some genuine pantomime action. The female element is remarkably strong in the cast of the action, and much fine scenery, by Mr. W. Perkins, illustrates the various incidents in a manner truly picturesque and brilliant.

SURREY.—"The House that Jack Built; or, Harlequin Dame Trot and the Little Old Woman that Lived in a Shoe" (written by Joseph Mackay), is the subject of the pantomime. We pass at once from the Haunt of the Hags and the Homestead of Jack's Parents to a Forest Glade, where Robin (Mdlle. Rosa Garibaldi) and Mopsa (Miss Madge Johnstone), having come out for a quiet stroll, are overtaken by an ominous storm, and the awful voice of the Giant Roarandbluster is heard. The Giant is killed. The Building of Jack's House, of course, forms a main incident of the action. This is seen going on busily until it is completed, and the hero is in a position to regard himself in the light of a man of substance, carrying out the old nursery legend about the malt, &c., faithfully. Prosperity reigns supreme, and the Prince's revels are conducted in good old English style, introducing mummers, St. George and the Seven Champions, morris-dancers, choral singers, and a new grand Ballet of Nations, terminating with a princely magnificent tableau, and a transformation scene representing A Dream of Love in Fairyland, designed and painted by Mr. Charles Brooke. In the harlequinade we have as Clown Wattie Hildyard, as Harlequin Mr. George Canning, as Pantaloon Mr. Albert De Voy, as Columbine Miss Kate Hamilton, and as Policeman X X X X Z Mr. F. Hinde.

NATIONAL STANDARD.—"Robin Hood; or, Harlequin the Merrie Men of Sherwood Forest" is the title of the Christmas pantomime by Mr. John Douglass. The story is thus told:—At the shop of Eustace de Smith, High Sheriff and butcher of Nottingham, we learn that Robin, the head man at the butcher's (Miss Milly Howes), has conceived an affection for his master's daughter. The master butcher has already promised her hand to the Knight Templar, the celebrated Sir Guy of Gisbourne (Mr. Frank Percival), who is very deaf. The knight arrives to dispute the claim of the butcher's apprentice, offers large bribes, and, of course, interests the papa on his behalf. The Sheriff proposes that day six months for a grand archery match, the Allcomers' prize to be his daughter's hand. Sir Guy is satisfied his own talent will succeed; Robin is crestfallen, but the Fairy assistance determines to invest Robin with superlative skill as a marksman, and casts a spell on Sir Guy, that everything he aims at shall be continually on the move. Robin leaves the house and flies to the forest. The Sheriff's fête-day arrives, with the procession for the shooting-match. But an uneasy feeling prevails, the fame of the great Robin Hood being now established. Robin wins the match. The Sheriff refuses the prize to Robin, who thereupon seizes Marian and bears her off with the assistance of his bold outlaws. The Sheriff, visiting the forest for a picnic with his friends, is robbed and maltreated; and a grand ballet of Merrie Men and Maid Marians takes place. King Richard now determines to proceed with the Crusades. A grand spectacular display follows, illustrating an event of peculiar significance at the present time—viz., the Conquest of Cyprus by Richard Cœur de Lion. The scene represents a dioramic view of Famugusta Bay from the heights overlooking the sea. The Crusaders, in gorgeous costumes and brilliant accoutrements, are supposed to have landed on the other side of the island, visiting Larnaca, and are seen descending the rocks by a rough circuitous passage, driving the wild inhabitants before them. Then follows a series of magnificent tableaux, pending the arrival of the King, and the elaborate and costly pageant terminates with an entirely original and unparallelled combination of colour and effect, representing the marriage of Richard I. and Queen Berengaria, with attendant festivities, as having historically taken place about 1192 in the island of Cyprus, now forming part of the British Empire. The whole of the magnificent scenery and the transformation-scene, representing the Hanging Bowers of Fairyland, are painted by Mr. Richard Douglass, assisted by Mr. John Neville.

ROYAL PARK.—The pantomime is founded on the popular Arabian Nights' story of Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves, which it literally follows. The Transformation Scene represents the Home of the Lilies and Mystic Geni of the Cave. The pantomimists are composed of the Artelli Troupe.

PAVILION.—The pantomime, entitled "Little Red Riding Hood and the Gob(b)lin' Wolf; or, Harlequin Jack in the Box," is founded on Mr. Frank W. Green's Christmas story of "Jack in the Box." The Grand Transformation Scene is designed and executed by R. M. Hyde, and the harlequinade is supported by the popular Alexander Family.

ALEXANDRA PALACE.—We have already given a summary of the pantomime of "Dick Whittington" in our last, and need not repeat it in extenso. In this version Dick Whittington is sent to the Court of Cabul, whose chief is at war with this country. A good scene is made of the deck of the Adventure and a section of its cabins. A squall arises, and the sailors ascribe its cause to the presence on board of the cat, and they attempt to throw him overboard. The storm rapidly increases, and the ship (by an ingenious mechanical arrangement) sinks bodily, with all hands, the last glimpse we get showing Dick and the cat clinging to a mast in the open sea. We reach at last the Court of the King of Cabul. Dick is brought before the King, and eventually earns his Majesty's gratitude and rewards by disposing of the hitherto uncontrollable rats by means of his cat. Dick returns to his native land rich with presents from Cabul and raised to high honours. Mr. Henry Emden's transformation scene is entitled "A Christmas Card."

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The pantomime is entitled "Robinson Crusoe," and written by Mr. Augustus Harris. We are at once introduced to Dame Perkins's Home, and to a dance of peasants. Robinson being advised to seek fortune abroad, and then return and claim Polly as his bride; Atkins, his rival, conspires with the captain of the ship to make away with Crusoe. Crusoe accordingly is interrupted in his loving farewell, and hurried away by the pirate crew. The next scene shows the ship in rough weather (all rocking and rolling). After a ballet on deck and a hornpipe, Crusoe is ill-treated by the Captain, and is in danger of his life. The waters rise over the ship, and the wicked Captain is gobbled up by the Octopus. Under the sea, the fishes visit the wreck and indulge in a grand ballet. We have next the usual scenes in Crusoe's Island. Then succeeds a Grand Indian Ballet. Ultimately, the King of Savages abdicates in favour of Atkins, and returns to the old country with Robinson. The ship, sailing up the Thames, arrives at the Tower Steps. The Presentation of the Freedom of the City by the Lord Mayor to Robinson and Friday leads to the Transformation (by W. Telbin), the subject of which is the Adoration of Venus. The general scenery is painted by Mr. F. Fenton.

SANGER'S.—The Christmas annual at this establishment is an old friend with a new face, the title being "Harlequin Cinder Ella and the Little Glass Slipper; or, The Kitchenmaid that was made a Princess," rewritten by the prolific pen of Mr. H. Spry, which opens with the Abode of Father Christmas (Mr. G. Bradfield), who, with the attendance of his accompanying friend Jollity (Mr. Hayes), deplores the present state of affairs and domestic bereavements, but endeavours to dispel depression by summoning the condiments of Christmas cheer in the forms of Sir Gander the Goose, Sir Gobble the Turkey, Sir Sirloin of Beef, Old Tom, and Pine-apple Rum; but, lo! the Christmas pudding is forgotten. In the progress of the plot Cinder Ella (Miss Beresford), bewailing her well-known trials and sufferings, seeks consolation in "forty winks," during which the Fairy Godmother (Miss Marlitt) appears to her in her dreams and reveals a vision of her future. Here a most charming effect is produced by a Lilliputian equipage approaching through the fireplace by the magic aid of Generosa. The prince and Cinder Ella are converted into Harlequin (Mr. Laurene) and Columbine (Miss Nellie Flora). The wicked baron is converted into Clown (the great Little Sandy), while Beauteous is transformed to Pantaloon (M. Pietro), when the fun of Harlequin and Clown commences. The pantomime terminates with a military display of the war in Afghanistan and passage of troops through the Khyber Pass.

ST. JAMES'S GRAND HALL.—The holiday amusements of the Moore and Burgess Minstrels, inaugurated on the 26th, present as usual a great variety of performances, which are designed to continue, morning and evening, until Jan. 13. We may mention that the hall has just been magnificently decorated and illuminated, and that an entirely new and beautiful proscenium and scenery have been painted by Mr. Richard Douglass. The holiday programme is of surpassing merit, and has been selected with great care and judgment.

HAMILTON'S.—The excellent pictorial and musical entertainment given by Mr. Harry H. Hamilton, who has become the lessee of the spacious edifice formerly known as the Holborn Amphitheatre, will be sure to secure that prominent place in the list of holiday amusements to which it is so deservedly entitled. It may be noted that, in what is called "A Panstereorama of Passing Events," the landing of the troops in Cyprus will be followed by Views of the Khyber Pass in Afghanistan, accompanied by appropriate dramatic and musical illustrations. Morning performances are given on Mondays and Saturdays.

ROYAL POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.—A change of lectures was inaugurated on Monday, the programme consisting of a musical promenade; a discourse by Mr. J. L. King on the Electric Light: its Production and Use; the clever illusion of the Zoocephalic troupe: Afghanistan, by Mr. T. C. Hepworth; and Notes on Noses, by Mr. J. W. Benn. To which may be added the customary diving-bell, and Mr. Oscar Hartwell's entertainment of "Raleigh's Queer Dream," entirely rewritten by Tikins Thudd, Esq. Other lectures and entertainments are also on the card.

THEATRES.

At the PRINCESS'S, owing to the failure of the mechanical drama lately produced, the management have judiciously revived Mr. Charles Reade's popular drama, entitled "Never Too Late to Mend," which, after thirteen years, will, doubtless, still be found effective. The cast is a powerful one, and embraces the strength of the company.

The manager of the GAIETY has addressed the public on the success of the reforms introduced by him on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of the opening of the Gaiety on Dec. 21, 1868. He has kept, he says, the theatre open for ten years, without closing it for more than ten weeks at night. Within the same period, he had also given 379 matinées, watch he had established on a new principle, that of presenting a different performance in the afternoon. He likewise congratulates himself, and deservedly so, on having abolished all ices, at the cost of £10,000.

We perceive that Mr. Irving at the LYCEUM is about to adopt the same policy, and to distribute gratuitously programmes and books. We have no doubt that the result will also prove to be profitable, and reward his liberality.

WALNUT-TREE HOUSE:

A GHOST STORY.

BY MRS. J. H. RIDDELL.

AUTHOR OF "GEORGE GRITH," "TOO MUCH ALONE," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

THE NEW OWNER.

Many years ago there stood at the corner of a street leading out of Upper Kennington-lane a great red brick mansion, which one very wet evening, in an autumn the leaves of which have been long dead and gone, looked more than ordinarily desolate and deserted.

There was not a sign of life about it. For seven years no one had been found to live in it; for seven years it had remained empty, while its owner wore out existence in fits of moody dejection or of wild frenzy in the mad-house close at hand; and now that owner was dead and buried and forgotten, and the new owner was returning to take possession. This new owner had written to his lawyers, or rather he had written to the lawyers of his late relative, begging them to request the person in charge of the house to have rooms prepared for his arrival; and, when the train drew into the station, he was met by one of Messrs. Timpson and Co.'s clerks, who, picking out Mr. Stainton, delivered to that gentleman a letter from the firm, and said he would wait to hear if there were any message in reply.

Mr. Stainton read the letter—looked at the blank fly-leaf—and then, turning back to the first words, read what his solicitors had to say all through once again.

"Humph," said the new owner, after he had finished. "I'll go and take a look at the place, anyhow. Is it far from here, do you know?" he asked, turning to the young man from Timpson's.

"No, Sir; not very far."

"Can you spare time to go over there with me?" inquired Mr. Stainton.

The young man believed that he could, adding, "If you want to go into the house we had better call for the key. It is at an estate agent's in the Westminster Bridge-road."

"I cannot say I have any great passion for hotels," remarked the new owner, as he took his seat in the cab.

"Indeed, Sir."

"No; either they don't suit me, or I don't suit them. I have led a wild sort of life; not much civilisation in the bush, or at the gold-fields, I can tell you. Then, I have not been well, and I can't stand noise and the trampling of feet. I had enough of that on board ship; and I used to lie awake at nights and think how pleasant it would be to have a big house all to myself, to do as I liked in."

"Yes, Sir," agreed the clerk.

"You see, I have been accustomed to roughing it, and I can get along very well for a night without servants."

"No doubt, Sir."

"I suppose the house is in substantial repair—roof tight, and all that sort of thing?"

"I can't say, I am sure, Sir."

"Well, if there is a dry corner where I can spread a rug, I shall sleep there to-night."

The clerk coughed. He looked out of the window, and then he looked at Messrs. Timpson's client.

"I do not think"—— he began apologetically, and then stopped.

"You don't think what?" asked the other.

"You'll excuse me, Sir, but I don't think—I really do not think, if I were you, I'd stay in that house to-night."

"Why not?"

"Well, it has not been slept in for nearly seven years, and it must be blue mouldy with damp; and if you have been ill, that is all the more reason you should not run such a risk. And, besides"——

"Besides"—— suggested Mr. Stainton; "Out with it! No doubt, that 'besides' holds the marrow of the argument."

"The house has stood empty for years, Sir, because—there is no use in making any secret of it—the place has a bad name."

"What sort of a bad name—unhealthy?"

"Oh, no!"

"Haunted?"

The clerk inclined his head. "You have hit it, Sir," he said.

"And that is the reason no one has lived there?"

"We have been quite unable to let the house on that account."

"The sooner it gets unhaunted, then, the better," retorted Mr. Stainton. "I shall certainly stop there to-night. You are not disposed to stay and keep me company, I suppose?"

With a little gesture of dismay the clerk drew back. Certainly, this was one of the most unconventional of clients. The young man from Timpson's did not at all know what to make of him.

"A rough sort of fellow," he said afterwards, when describing the new owner; "boorish; never mixed with good society, that sort of thing."

He did not in the least understand this rich man, who treated him as an equal, who objected to hotels, who did not mind taking up his abode in a house where not even a drunken charwoman could be induced to stop, and who calmly asked a stranger on whom he had never set eyes before—a clerk in the respectable office of Timpson and Co., a young fellow anxious to rise in the world, careful as to his associates, particular about the whiteness of his shirts and the set of his collar and the cut of his coats—to "rough" things with him in that dreadful old dungeon, where perhaps he might even be expected to light a fire.

Still, he did not wish to offend the new owner. Messrs. Timpson anticipated he would be a profitable client; and to that impartial firm the money of a boor would, he knew, seem as good as the money of a Count.

"I am very sorry," he stammered; "should only have felt too much honoured; but the fact is—previous engagement"——

Mr. Stainton laughed.

"I understand," he said. "Adventures are quite as much out of your line as ghosts. And now tell me about this apparition. Does the 'old man' walk?"

"Not that I ever heard of," answered the other.

"Is it, then, the miserable beggar who tried to do for himself?"

"It is not the late Mr. Stainton, I believe," said the young man, in a tone which mildly suggested that reference to a client of Timpson's as a "miserable beggar" might be considered bad taste.

"Then who on earth is it?" persisted Mr. Stainton.

"If you must know, Sir, it is a child—a child who has driven every tenant in succession out of the house."

The new owner burst into a hearty laugh—a laugh which gave serious offence to Timpson's clerk.

"That is too good a joke," said Mr. Stainton. "I do not know when I heard anything so delicious."

"It is a fact, whether it be delicious or not," retorted the young man, driven out of all his former propriety of voice and demeanour by the contemptuous ridicule this "digger" thought fit to cast on his story; "and I, for one, would not, after all I have heard about your house, pass a night in it—no, not if anybody offered me fifty pounds down."

"Make your mind easy, my friend," said the new owner, quietly. "I am not going to bid for your company. The child and I can manage, I'll be bound, to get on very comfortably by ourselves."

CHAPTER II.

THE CHILD.

It was later on in the same evening; Mr. Stainton had an hour previously taken possession of Walnut-Tree House, bidden Timpson's clerk good-evening, and, having ordered in wood and coals from the nearest greengrocer, he now stood by the front gate waiting the coming of the goods purchased.

As he waited, he looked up at the house, which in the uncertain light of the street lamps appeared gloomier and darker than had been the case even in the gathering twilight.

"It has an 'uncanny' look, certainly," he considered; but once I can get a good fire up I shall be all right. Now, I wonder when those coals are coming!"

As he turned once again towards the road, he beheld on its way the sack of fuel with which the nearest greengrocer said he thought he could—indeed, said he would—"oblige" him. A ton—half a ton—quarter of a ton, the greengrocer affirmed would be impossible until the next day; but a sack—yes—he would promise that. Bill should bring it round; and Bill was told to put his burden on the truck, and twelve bundles of wood, "and we'll make up the rest to-morrow," added Bill's master, with the air of one who has conferred a favour.

In the distance Mr. Stainton descried a very grimy Bill, and a very small boy, coming along with the truck leisurely, as though the load had been Herculean.

Through the rain he watched the pair advancing, and greeted Bill with a glad voice of welcome.

"So you've come at last; that's right. Better late than never. Bring them this way, I'll have this small lot shot in the kitchen for the night."

"Begging your pardon, Sir," answered Bill, "I don't think you will—that is to say, not by me. As I told our governor, I'll take 'em to the house as you've sold 'em to the house, but I won't set a foot inside it."

"Do you mean to say you are going to leave them out on the pavement," asked Mr. Stainton.

"Well, Sir, I don't mind taking them to the front door if it'll be a convenience."

"That will do. You are a brave lot of people in these parts I must say."

"As for that," retorted Bill, with sack on back and head bent forward, "I dare say we're as brave about here as where you come from."

"It is not impossible," retorted Mr. Stainton; "there are plenty of cowards over there too."

After he had shot his coals on the margin of the steps, Bill retreated from the door, which stood partly open, and when the boy who brought up the wood was again out with the truck, said, putting his knuckles to his eyebrows—

"Beg pardon, Sir, but I suppose you wouldn't give me a drop of beer. Very wet night, Sir."

"No, I would not," answered Mr. Stainton, very decidedly. "I shall have to shovel these coals into the house myself; and as for the night, it is as wet for me as it is for you."

Nevertheless, as Bill shuffled along the short drive—shuffling wearily—like a man who, having nearly finished one day's hard work, was looking forward to beginning another hard day in the morning, the new owner relented.

"Here," he said, picking out a sixpence to give him, "it isn't your fault, I suppose, that you believe in old women's tales."

"Thank you kindly, Sir," Bill answered; "I am sure I am extremely obliged; but if I was in your shoes I wouldn't stop in that house—you'll excuse me, Sir, meaning no offence—but I wouldn't; indeed I wouldn't."

"It seems to have got a good name, at any rate," thought Mr. Stainton, while retracing his steps to the banned tenement. "Let us see what effect a fire will have in routing the shadows."

He entered the house, and, striking a match, lighted some candles he had brought in with him from a neighbouring oil-shop.

After an inspection of the ground-floor rooms he decided to take up his quarters for the night in one which had evidently served as a library.

In the centre of the apartment there was the table covered with leather. Around the walls were bookcases. In one corner stood a bureau, where the man who for so many years had been dead even while living kept his letters and papers.

He ate his frugal supper, and then, pushing aside the table on which the remains of his repast were spread, began walking slowly up and down the room, thinking over the past and forming plans for the future. Buried in reflection, the fire began to die down without his noticing the fact; but a feeling of chilliness at length causing him instinctively to look towards the hearth, he threw wood into the grate, and, while the flames went blazing up the wide chimney, piled on coals as though he desired to set the house alight.

While he was so engaged there came a knock at the door of the room—a feeble, hesitating knock, which was repeated more than once before it attracted Mr. Stainton's attention.

When it did, being still busy with the fire, and forgetting he was alone in the house, he called out, "Come in."

Along the panels there stole a rustling sort of touch, as if someone were feeling uncertainly for the handle—a curious noise, as of a weak hand fumbling about the door in the dark; then, in similar manner, the person seeking admittance tried to turn the lock.

"Come in, can't you?" repeated Mr. Stainton; but even as he spoke he remembered he was, or ought to be, the sole occupant of the mansion. He was not alarmed, he was too much accustomed to solitude and danger for that; but he rose from his stooping position and instinctively seized his revolver, which he had chanced, while unpacking some of his effects, to place on the top of the bureau.

"Come in, whoever you are," he cried; but seeing the door still remained closed, though the intruder was evidently making futile efforts to open it, he strode half way across the room, and then stopped amazed.

For suddenly the door opened, and there entered shyly and timidly a little child—a child with the saddest face mortal ever beheld; a child with wistful eyes and long, ill-kept hair; a child poorly dressed, wasted and worn, and with the mournfullest expression on its countenance that face of child ever wore.

"What a hungry-looking little beggar," thought Mr. Stainton. "Well, young one, and what do you want here?" he added aloud.

The boy never answered, never took the slightest notice of his questioner, but simply walked slowly round the room, peering into all the corners, as if looking for something. Searching the embrasures of the windows, examining the recesses beside the fire-place, pausing on the hearth to glance under the library table, and finally, when the doorway was reached once more, turning round to survey the contents of the apartment with an eager and yet hopeless scrutiny.

"What is it you want, my boy?" asked Mr. Stainton, glancing as he spoke at the child's poor thin legs, and short, shabby frock, and shoes wellnigh worn out, and arms bare and lean and unbeautiful. "Is it anything I can get for you?"

Not a word—not a whisper: only for reply a glance of the wistful brown eyes.

"Where do you come from, and whom do you belong to?" persisted Mr. Stainton.

The child turned slowly away.

"Come, you shall not get off so easily as you seem to imagine," persisted the new owner, advancing towards his visitor. "You have no business to be here at all; and before you go you must tell me how you chance to be in this house, and what you expected to find in this room."

He was close to the doorway by this time, and the child stood on the threshold, with its back towards him. Mr. Stainton could see every detail of the boy's attire—his little plaid frock, the hooks which fastened it; the pinafore, soiled and crumpled, tied behind with strings broken and knotted; in one place the skirt had given from the bodice, and a piece of thin poor flannel showed that the child's under habiliments matched in shabbiness his exterior garments.

"Poor little chap," thought Mr. Stainton. "I wonder if he would like something to eat. Are you hungry, my lad?"

The child turned and looked at him earnestly, but answered never a word.

"I wonder if he is dumb," marvelled Mr. Stainton; and, seeing he was moving away, put out a hand to detain him. But the child eluded his touch, and flitted into the hall and up the wide staircase with swift noiseless feet.

Only waiting to snatch a candle from one of the sconces, Mr. Stainton pursued as fast as he could follow. Up the easy steps he ran at the top of his speed; but, fast as he went, the child went faster. (See Illustration.) Higher and higher he beheld the tiny creature mounting, then, still keeping the same distance between them, it turned when it reached the top story and trotted along a narrow corridor with rooms opening off to right and left. At the extreme end of this passage a door stood ajar. Through this the child passed, Mr. Stainton still following.

"I have run you to earth at last," he said, entering and closing the door. "Why, where has the boy gone?" he added, holding the candle above his head and gazing round the dingy garret in which he found himself.

The room was quite empty. He examined it closely, but could find no possible outlet save the door, and a skylight which had evidently not been opened for years. There was no furniture in the apartment, except a truckle bedstead, a rush-bottomed chair, and a rickety washstand. No wardrobe, or box, or press, where even a kitten might have lain concealed.

"It is very strange," muttered Mr. Stainton, as he turned away baffled. "Very strange!" he repeated, while he walked along the corridor. "I don't understand it at all," he decided, proceeding slowly down the topmost flight of stairs; but there all at once he stopped.

"IT IS THE CHILD!" he exclaimed aloud, and the sound of his own voice woke strange echoes through the silence of that desolate house. "IT IS THE CHILD!" and he descended the principal staircase very slowly, with bowed head, and his grave, worn face graver and more thoughtful than ever.

CHAPTER III.

SEARCHING FOR INFORMATION.

It was enough to make any man look grave; and as time went on the new owner of Walnut-Tree House found himself pondering continually as to what the mystery could be which attached to the child he had found in possession of his property, and who had already driven tenant after tenant out of the premises. Inclined at first to regard the clerk's story as a joke, and his own experience on the night of his arrival a delusion, it was impossible for him to continue incredulous when he found, even in broad daylight, that terrible child stealing down the staircase and entering the rooms, looking, looking—for something it never found.

At bed and at board he had company, or the expectation of it. No apartment in the building was secure from intrusion. It did not matter where he lay, it did not matter where he ate; between sleeping and waking, between breakfast and dinner, whenever the notion seized it, the child came gliding in, looking, looking, looking, and never finding; not lingering longer than was necessary to be certain the object of its search was absent, but wandering hither and thither, from garret to kitchen, from parlour to bed-chamber, in that quest which still seemed fresh as when first begun.

Mr. Stainton went to his solicitors as the most likely persons from whom to obtain information on the subject, and plunged at once into the matter.

"Who is the child supposed to be, Mr. Timpson?" he asked, making no secret that he had seen it.

"Well, that is really very difficult to say," answered Mr. Timpson.

"There was a child once, I suppose?—a real child—flesh and blood?"

Mr. Timpson took off his spectacles and wiped them.

"There were two; yes, certainly, in the time of Mr. Felix Stainton—a boy and a girl."

"In that house?"

"In that house. They survived him."

"And what became of them?"

"The girl was adopted by a relation of her father's, and the—boy—died."

"Oh! the boy died, did he? Do you happen to know what he died of?"

"No; I really do not. There was nothing wrong about the affair, however, if that is what you are thinking of. There never was a hint of that sort."

Mr. Stainton sat silent for a minute; then he said,

"Mr. Timpson, I cannot shake off the idea that somehow there has been foul play with regard to those children. Who were they?"

"Felix Stainton's grandchildren. His daughter made a low marriage, and he cast her adrift. After her death the two children were received at Walnut-Tree House on sufferance—fed and clothed, I believe, that was all; and when the old man died the heir-at-law permitted them to remain."

"Alfred Stainton?"

"Yes; the unhappy man who became insane. His uncle died intestate, and he consequently succeeded to everything but the personalty, which was very small, and of which these children had a share."

"There never was any suspicion, you say, of foul play on the part of the late owner?"

"Dear, dear! no; quite the contrary."

"Then you cannot throw the least light on the mystery?"

"Not the least; I wish I could."

For all that, Mr. Stainton carried away an impression Mr. Timpson knew more of the matter than he cared to tell.

"There is a mystery behind it all," he considered. "I must learn more about these children. Perhaps some of the local tradespeople may recollect them."

But the local tradespeople for the most part were new comers—or else had not supplied "the house."

"There is only one person I can think of, Sir," said one "family" butcher, "likely to be able to give you any information about the matter."

"And that is"——

"Mr. Hennings, at the Pedlar's Arms. He had some acquaintance with the old lady as was housekeeper both to Mr. Felix Stainton and the gentleman that went out of his mind." Following which advice, the new owner repaired to the Pedlar's Arms.

"Do I know Walnut-Tree House, Sir?" said Mr. Hennings, repeating his visitor's question. "Well, yes, rather. Why, you might as well ask me, do I know the Pedlar's Arms. As boy and man I can remember the old house for close on five-and-fifty years. I remember Mr. George Stainton; he used to wear a skull-cap and knee-breeches. There was an orchard then where Stainton-street is now, and his whole day was taken up in keeping the boys out of it. Many a time I have run from him."

"Did you ever see anything of the boy and girl who were there, after Mr. Alfred succeeded to the property—Felix Stainton's grandchildren, I mean?" asked the new owner, when a pause in Mr. Hennings' reminiscences enabled him to take his part in the conversation.

"Well, Sir, I may have seen the girl, but I can't bring it to my recollection: the boy I do remember, however. He came over here two or three times with Mrs. Toplis, who kept house for both Mr. Staintons, and I took notice of him, both because he looked so peaky and old-fashioned, and also on account of the talk about him."

"There was talk about him, then."

"Bless you, yes, Sir; as much talk while he was living as since he died. Everybody thought he ought to have been the heir. But if you want to hear all about him, Sir, Mrs. Toplis is the one to tell you. If you have a mind to give a shilling to a poor old lady who always did try to keep herself respectable, and who, I will say, paid her way honourable as long as she had a sixpence to pay it honourable with—you cannot do better than go and see Mrs. Toplis, who will talk to you for hours about the time she lived at Walnut-Tree House."

And, with this delicate hint that his minutes were more valuable than the days of Mrs. Toplis, Mr. Hennings would have closed the interview, but that his visitor asked where he should be able to find the housekeeper.

"A thousand pardons!" answered the publican, with an air; "forgetting the very cream and marrow of it, wasn't I? Mrs. Toplis, Sir, is to be found in Lambeth workhouse—and a pity, too."

Edgar Stainton turned away, heart-sick. Was this all wealth had done for his people and those connected with them?

CHAPTER IV.

BROTHER AND SISTER.

Mr Stainton had expected to find Mrs. Toplis a decrepid crone, bowed with age and racked with rheumatism, and it was therefore like a gleam of sunshine streaming across his path to behold a woman, elderly, certainly, but carrying her years with ease, ruddy cheeked, clear eyed, upright as a dart, who welcomed him with respectful enthusiasm.

"And so you are Mr. Edgar, the son of the dear old Captain," she said, after the first greetings and explanations were over, after she had wiped her eyes and uttered many ejaculations of astonishment and expressions of delight. "Eh! I remember him coming to the house just after he was married, and telling me about the dear lady his wife. I never heard a gentleman speak so proud; he never seemed tired of saying the words, 'My wife.'"

"She was a dear lady," answered the new owner.

"And so the house has come to you, Sir? Well, I wish you joy. I hope you may have peace, and health, and happiness, and prosperity in it. And I don't see why you should not—no, indeed, Sir."

Edgar Stainton sat silent for a minute, thinking how he should best approach his subject.

"Mrs. Toplis," at last he began, plunging into the very middle of the difficulty, "I want you to tell me all about it. I have come here on purpose to ask you what it all means."

The old woman covered her face with her hands, and he could see that she trembled violently.

"You need not be afraid to speak openly to me," he went on. "I am quite satisfied there was some great wrong done in the house, and I want to put it right, if it lies in my power to do so. I am a rich man. I was rich when the news of this inheritance reached me, and I would gladly give up the property to-morrow if I could only undo whatever may have been done amiss."

Mrs. Toplis shook her head.

"Ah! Sir; you can't do that," she said. "Money can't bring back the dead to life; and, if it could, I doubt if even you would prove as good a friend to the poor child sleeping in the churchyard yonder as his Maker did when He took him out of this troublesome world. It was just soul-rending to see the boy the last few months of his life. I can't bear to think of it, Sir! Often at night I wake in a fright, fancying I still hear the patter, patter of his poor little feet upon the stair."

"Do you know, it is a curious thing, but he doesn't frighten me," said Mr. Stainton; "that is, when I am in the house; although when I am away from it the recollection seems to dog every step I take."

"What?" cried Mrs. Toplis: "have you then seen him, too? There! what am I talking about? I hope, Sir, you will forgive my foolishness."

"I see him constantly," was the calm reply.

"I wonder what it means!—I wonder what it can mean!" exclaimed the housekeeper, wringing her hands in dire perplexity and dismay.

"I do not know," answered the new owner, philosophically; "but I want you to help me to find out. I suppose you remember the children coming there at first?"

"Well, Sir, well—They were poor Miss Mary's son and daughter. She ran away, you know, with a Mr. Fenton—made a very bad match; but I believe he was kind to her. When they were brought to us, a shivering little pair, my master was for sending them here. Ay, and he would have done it, too, if somebody had not said he could be made to pay for their keep. You never saw brother and sister so fond of one another—never. They were twins. But, Lor! he was more like a father to the little girl than aught else. He'd have kept an apple a month, rather than eat it unless she had half; and the same with all else. I think it was seeing that—watching the love they had, he for her and she for him, coming upon them unsuspected, with their little arms round one another's necks, made the old gentleman alter his mind about leaving the place to Mr. Alfred; for he said to me, one day, thoughtful like, pointing to them, 'Wonderful fond, Toplis!' and I answered, 'Yes, Sir; for all the world like the Babes in the Wood;' not thinking of how lonely that meant——

"Shortly afterwards he took to his bed; and while he was lying there, no doubt, better thoughts came to him, for he used to talk about his wife and Miss Mary, and the Captain, your father, Sir, and ask if the children were gone to bed, and such like—things he never used to mention before.

"So when he made the will Mr. Quinance drew out I was not surprised—no, not a bit. Though before that time he always spoke of Mr. Alfred as his heir, and treated him as such."

"That will never was found," suggested Mr. Stainton, anxious to get at another portion of the narrative.

"Never, Sir. We hunted for it high and low. Perhaps I wronged him, but I always thought Mr. Alfred knew what became of it. After the old gentleman's death the children were treated shameful—shameful. I don't mean beaten, or such like; but half-starved and neglected. He would not buy them proper clothes, and he would not suffer them to wear decent things if anybody else bought them. It was just the same with their food. I durstn't give them even a bit of bread-and-butter unless it was on the sly; and, indeed, there was not much to give in that house. He turned regular miser. Hoarding came into the family with Mrs. Lancelot Stainton, Mr. Alfred's great grandmother, and they went on from bad to worse, each one closer and nearer than the last, begging your pardon for saying so, Sir; but it is the truth."

"I fear so, Mrs. Toplis," agreed the man, who certainly was neither close nor near.

"Well, Sir, at last, when the little girl was about six years old, she fell sick, and we didn't think she would get over the illness. While she was about at her worst Mrs. May, her father's sister, chanced to be stopping up in London, and, as Mr. Alfred refused to let a doctor inside his doors, she made no more ado but wrapped the child up in blankets, sent for a cab, and carried her off to her own lodgings. Mr. Alfred made no objection to that. All he said as she went through the hall was,

"'If you take her now, remember, you must keep her.'

"'Very well,' she replied, 'I will keep her.'"

"And the boy? the boy?" cried Mr. Stainton, in an agony of impatience.

"I am coming to him, Sir, if you please. He just dwined away after his sister and he were parted, and died in December as she was taken in the July."

"What did he die of?"

"A broken heart, Sir. It seems a queer thing to say about a child; but if ever a heart was broken his was. At first he was always going about the house looking for her, but towards the end he used to go up to his room and stay there all by himself. At last I wrote to Mrs. May, but she was ill when the letter got to her, and when she did come up he was dead. My word, she talked to Mr. Alfred! I never heard any one person say so much to another. She declared he had first cheated the boy of his inheritance, and then starved him to death; but that was not true, the child broke his heart fretting after his sister."

"Yes; and when he was dead."

"Sir, I don't like to speak of it, but as true as I am sitting here, the night he was put in his coffin he came pattering down just as usual, looking, looking for his sister. I went straight up stairs, and, if I had not seen the little wasted body lying there still and quiet, I must have thought he had come back to life. We were never without him afterwards, never; that, and nothing else, drove Mr. Alfred mad. He used to think he was fighting the child and killing it. When the worst fits were on him he tried to trample it under foot or crush it up in a corner, and then he would sob and cry, and pray for it to be taken away. I have heard he recovered a little before he died, and said his uncle told him there was a will leaving all to the boy, but he never saw such a paper. Perhaps it was only talk, though, or that he was still raving."

CHAPTER V.

THE NEXT AFTERNOON.

Mr. Stainton was trying to work off some portion of his perplexities by pruning the grimy evergreens in front of Walnut-Tree House, and chopping away at the undergrowth of weeds and couch grass which had in the course of years matted together beneath the shrubs, when his attention was attracted to two ladies who stood outside the great iron gate looking up at the house.

"It seems to be occupied now," remarked the elder, turning to her companion. "I suppose the new owner is going to live here. It appears just as dingy as ever; but you do not remember it, Mary."

"I think I do," was the answer. "As I look the place grows familiar to me. I do recollect some of the rooms, I am sure, just like a dream, as I remember Georgie. What I would give to have a peep inside."

At this juncture the new owner emerged from amongst the bushes, and, opening the gate, asked if the ladies would like to look over the place.

The elder hesitated; whilst the younger whispered, "Oh, aunt, pray do!"

"Thank you," said Mrs. May to the stranger, whom she believed to be a gardener; "but perhaps Mr. Stainton might object."

"No. He wouldn't, I know," declared the new owner. "You can go through the house if you wish. There is no one in it. Noboby lives there except myself."

"Taking charge, I suppose?" suggested Mrs. May, blandly.

"Something of that sort," he answered.

"I do not think he is a caretaker," said the girl, as she and her relative passed into the old house together.

"What do you suppose he is, then?" asked her aunt.

"Mr. Stainton himself."

"Nonsense, child!" exclaimed Mrs. May, turning, nevertheless, to one of the windows, and casting a curious glance towards the new owner, who was now, his hands thrust deep in his pockets, walking idly up and down the drive.

After they had been all over the place, from hall to garret, with a peep into this room and a glance into that, Mrs. May found the man who puzzled her leaning against one of the pillars of the porch, waiting, apparently, for their reappearance.

"I am sure we are very much obliged to you," she began, with a certain hesitation in her manner.

"Pray do not mention it," he said.

"This young lady has sad associations connected with the house," Mrs. May proceeded, still doubtfully feeling her way.

He turned his eyes towards the girl for a moment, and, though her veil was down, saw she had been weeping.

"I surmised as much," he replied. "She is Miss Fenton, is she not?"

"Yes, certainly," was the answer; "and you are"——

"Edgar Stainton," said the new owner, holding out his hand.

"I am all alone here," he explained, after the first explanations were over. "But I can manage to give you a cup of tea. Pray do come in, and let me feel I am not entirely alone in England."

Only too well pleased, Mrs. May complied, and ten minutes later the three were sitting round a fire the blaze of which leapt and flickered upon the walls and over the ceiling, casting bright lights on the dingy mirrors and the dark oak shelves.

"It is all coming back to me now," said the girl softly, addressing her aunt. "Many an hour Georgie and I have sat on that hearth seeing pictures in the fire."

But she did not see something which was even then standing close beside her, and which the new owner had witnessed approach with a feeling of terror that precluded speech.

It was the child! The child searching about no longer for something it failed to find, but standing at the girl's side still and motionless, with its eyes fixed upon her face, and its poor, wasted figure nestling amongst the folds of her dress.

"Thank Heaven, she does not see it!" he thought, and drew his breath, relieved.

No; she did not see it—though its wan cheek touched her shoulder, though its thin hand rested on her arm, though through the long conversation which followed, it never moved from her side, nor turned its wistful eyes from her face.

When she went away—when she took her fresh young beauty out of the house her presence seemed to gladden and light up—the child followed her to the threshold; and then in an instant it vanished, and Mr. Stainton watched for its flitting up the staircase all in vain.

But later on in the evening, when he was sitting alone beside the fire, with his eyes bent on the glowing coals, and perhaps seeing pictures there, as Mary said she and her brother had done in their lonely childhood, he felt conscious, even without looking round, that the boy was there once again.

And when he fell to thinking of the long, long years during which the dead child had kept faithful and weary watch for his sister, searching through the empty rooms for one who never came, and then bethought him of the sister to whom her dead brother had become but the vaguest of memories, of the summers and winters during the course of which she had probably forgotten him altogether, he sighed deeply—he heard his sigh echoed behind him in the merest faintest whisper.

More, when he, thinking deeply about his newly found relative and trying to recall each feature in her face, each tone of her voice, found it impossible to dissociate the girl grown to womanhood from the child he had pictured to himself as wandering about the old house in company with her twin-brother, their arms twined together, their thoughts one, their sorrows one, their poor pleasures one—he felt a touch on his hand, and knew the boy was beside him, looking with wistful eyes into the firelight, too.

But when he turned he saw that sadness clouded those eyes no longer. She was found; the lost had come again to meet a living friend on the once desolate hearth, and up and down the wide desolate staircase those weary little feet pattered no more.

The quest was over, the search ended; into the darksome corners of that dreary house the child's glance peered no longer.

She was come! Through years he had kept faithful watch for her, but the waiting was ended now.

CHAPTER VI.

THE MISSING WILL.

Ere long there were changes in the old house. Once again Mrs. Toplis reigned there, but this time with servants under her—with maids she could scold and lads she could harass.

The larder was well plenished, the cellars sufficiently stocked; windows formerly closely shuttered now stood open to admit the air; and on the drive grass grew no longer—too many footsteps passed that way for weeds to flourish.

It was Christmas-time. The joints in the butchers' shops were gay with ribbons; the grocers' windows were tricked out to delight the eyes of the children, young and old, who passed along. In Mr. May's house up the Clapham-road all was excitement, for the whole of the family—father, mother, grown-up sons and daughters—girls still in short frocks and boys in round jackets—were going to spend Christmas Eve with their newly-found cousin, whom they had adopted as a relation with a unanimity as rare as charming.

Cousin Mary also was going—Cousin Mary had got a new dress for the occasion, and was having her hair done up in a specially effective manner by Crissie May, when the toilette proceedings were interrupted by half a dozen young voices announcing—

"A gentleman in the parlour wants to see you, Mary. Pa says you are to make haste and come down immediately."

Obediently Mary made haste as bidden and descended to the parlour, to find there the clerk from Timpson's, who met Mr. Stainton on his arrival in London.

His business was simple, but important. Once again he was the bearer of a letter from Timpson and Co., this time announcing to Miss Fenton that the will of Mr. Felix Stainton had been found, and that under it she was entitled to the interest of ten thousand pounds, secured upon the houses in Stainton-street.

"Oh! aunt, oh! uncle, how rich we shall be." cried the girl, running off to tell her cousins; but the uncle and aunt looked grave. They were wondering how this will might affect Edgar Stainton.

While they were still talking it over—after Timpson's young man had taken his departure, Mr. Edgar Stainton himself arrived.

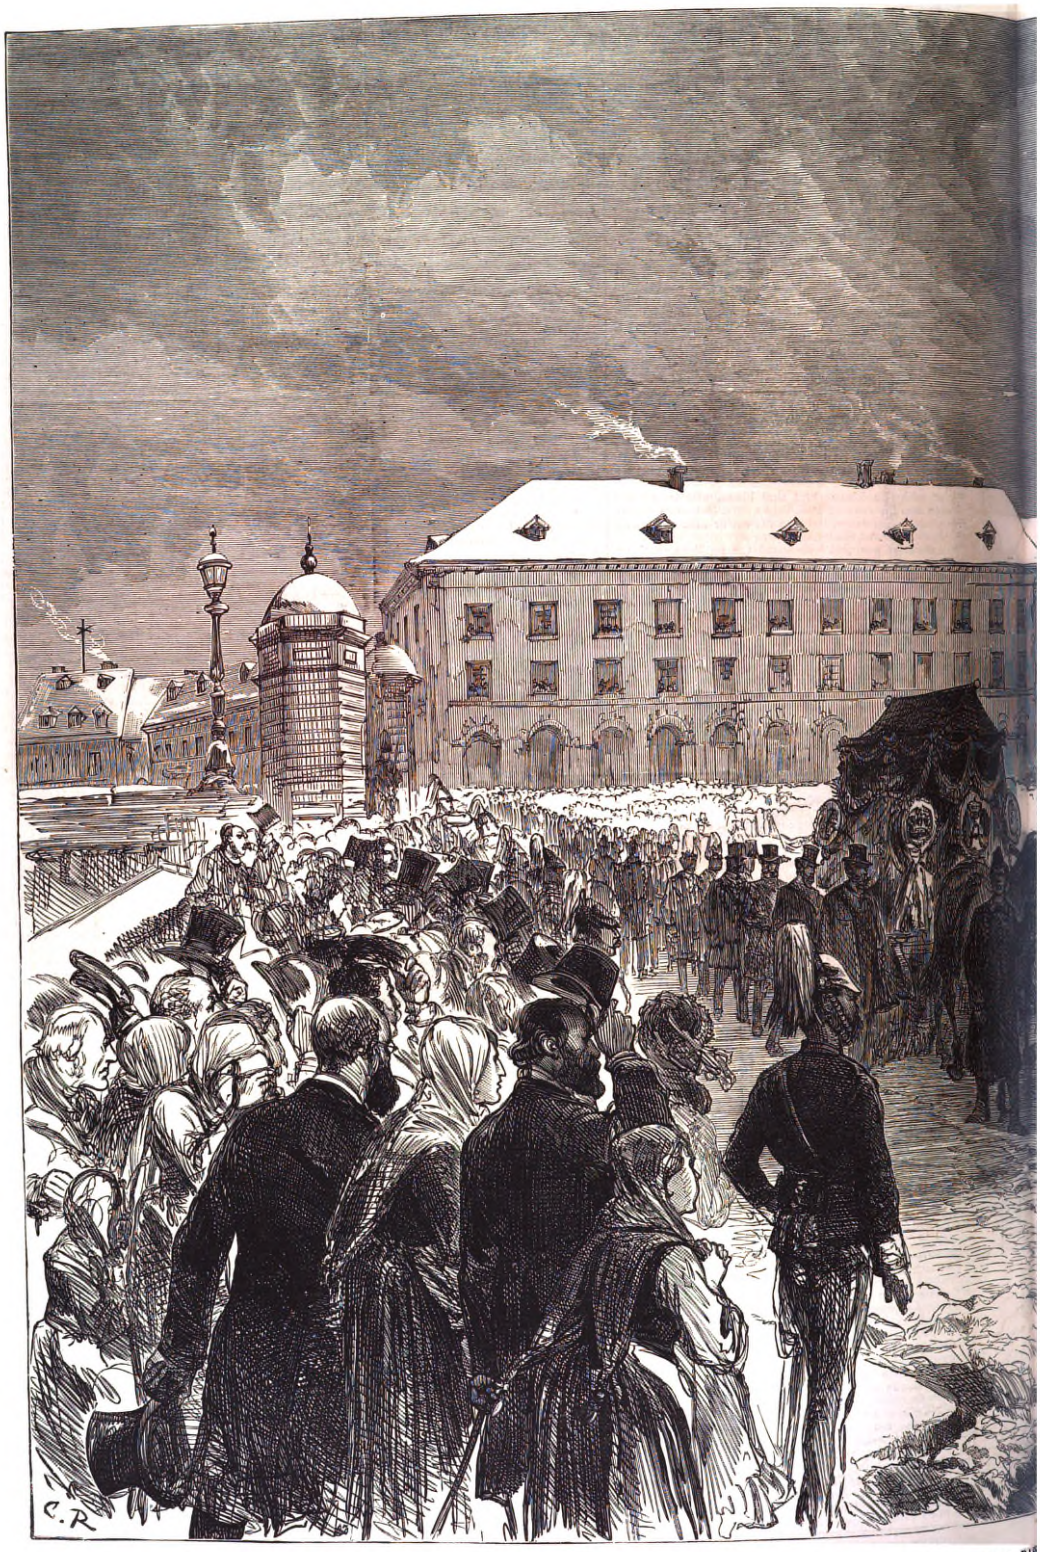
"That is all right!" he said, in answer to their questions. "I found the will in the room where Felix Stainton died. Walnut-Tree House and all the freeholds were left to the poor little chap who died, chargeable with Mary's ten thousand pounds, five hundred to Mrs. Toplis, and a few other legacies. Failing George, the property was to come to me. I have been to Quinance's successor, and found out that the old man and Alfred had a grievous quarrel, and that in consequence he determined to cut him off altogether. Where is Mary? I want to wish her joy."

Mary was in the little conservatory, searching for a rose to put in her pretty brown hair.

He went straight to her, and said,

"Mary, dear, you have had one Christmas gift to-night, and I want you to take another with it."

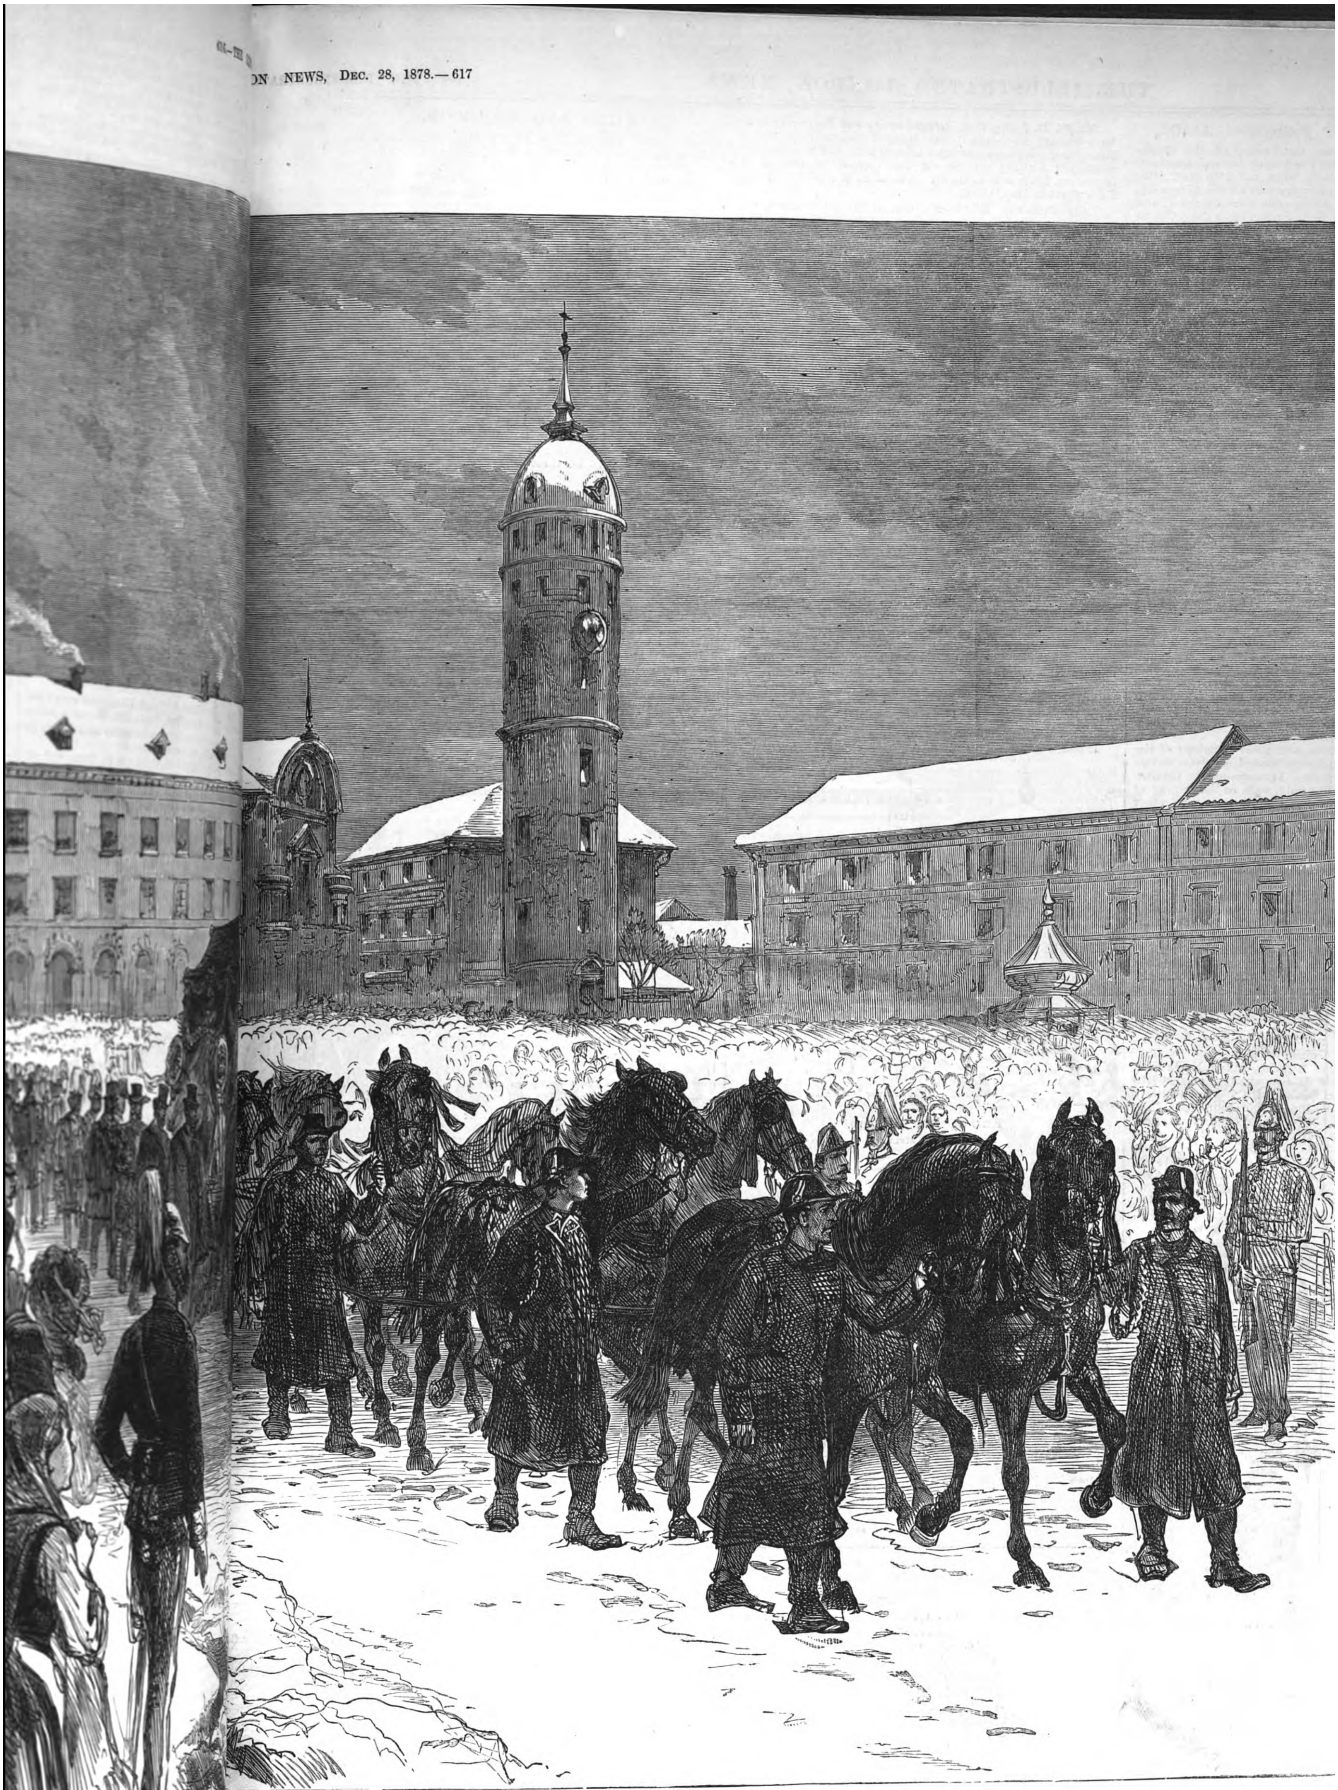
"What is it, Cousin Edgar?" she asked; but when she looked in his face she must have guessed his meaning, for she drooped her head, and began pulling her sweet rose to pieces.



He took the flower, and with it her fingers.

"Will you have me, dear?" he asked. "I am but a rough fellow; but I am true, and I love you dearly."

Somehow, she answered him as he wished, and they all spent a very happy evening in the old house.



Once, when he was standing close beside her in the familiar room, hand clasped in hand, Edgar Stainton saw the child looking at them.

There was no sorrow or yearning in his eyes as he gazed—only a great peace, a calm which seemed to fill and light them up with an exquisite beauty.

FUNERAL OF PRINCESS ALICE: THE PROCESSION PAS

FROM A SKETCH

ING THROUGH THE ERNEST LUDWIG PLATZ, DARMSTADT.

OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

AL OF PRINCESS ALICE: THE PRO

THE FUNERAL OF PRINCESS ALICE.

As recorded in our last issue, the funeral of the much-lamented Princess Alice (Grand Duchess of Hesse-Darmstadt) took place at Darmstadt on Wednesday, the 18th inst. Our present Number contains two Illustrations of the Ceremony, from sketches by our Special Artist—one showing the Prince of Wales and Prince Leopold placing wreaths on the coffin in the family mausoleum at Rosenhohe; the other the Funeral Procession passing through the Ernest Ludwig Platz. The chapel to which the body had been removed on the previous evening was thrown open in the morning to the public, and large numbers of persons visited the chapel and laid flowers around the catafalque. Between one and two o'clock those who were invited to the funeral service assembled in the chapel. Among these were the members of the diplomatic body in Darmstadt, the Ministers of the Grand Duke, and the members of the Diet. When these had assembled, some members of the Grand Ducal family, the Prince of Wales, Prince Leopold, Prince Christian, the Grand Dukes of Mecklenburg and Baden, and others, arrived at the church, and were conducted to the seats allotted to them. The service, which was performed according to the rites of the German Evangelical Communion, was read by the Grand Ducal Chaplain, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Silliloe, the resident English Chaplain in Darmstadt. At the close of the service a procession was formed, which accompanied the hearse to the family mausoleum at Rosenhohe. The streets through which the funeral procession passed were lined with spectators, who preserved a respectful silence as it moved by. On the arrival of the cortége at the Mausoleum the Prince of Wales, Prince Leopold, and Prince Christian, with the Marquis of Hertford, representing the Queen of England, were found to be awaiting it; and, whilst the bands performed sacred music, the coffin was removed into the little chapel, where a prayer was offered up by Court Chaplain Bender. The Prince of Wales accepted the expressions of sympathy and condolement offered by those by whom he was surrounded, simply acknowledging them by shaking hands. The niche in which the coffin was placed was covered with floral offerings. The ceremony concluded, the Grand Duke drove back direct to the Schloss, while the Prince of Wales and his party returned to the railway station.

A funeral service was held at Berlin at the exact time appointed for the burial ceremony at Darmstadt. The Crown Prince and Princess, several members of the Royal family, Lord and Lady Odo Russell, and the Staff of the British Embassy, with their wives, were present.

At the same time the Queen and those members of the Royal family who were in England attended a special service in the private chapel at Windsor. Throughout the country there were various signs of mourning, such as the ringing of muffled peals of bells, the firing of minute guns, and other observances.

All places of business in Ottawa, Canada, were closed on Wednesday afternoon, the 18th inst., as a mark of respect on the occasion of Princess Alice's funeral; and prayers were said last Sunday in all the churches in Montreal, Quebec, and Toronto.

It has been arranged by the British Societies of New York to call a meeting for Jan. 9 next, for the purpose of passing resolutions on the occasion of the death of Princess Alice.

Sunday last was to be observed as a day of mourning for the late Princess Alice throughout the Australian colonies.

In Alexandria the British residents held a public meeting, and adopted messages of condolence to the Queen and the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt.

The North British Railway Company have announced that from Jan. 1 they will abolish all third-class fares which at present exceed the Parliamentary rate of 1d. per mile, and charge no more than 1d. per mile for third-class tickets to or from any station on their system.

A few weeks ago we had to commend a series of Christmas and New-Year Cards, designed and printed by Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode. This, we believe, was their first venture in this way. They forestalled all their competitors, and equalled the best of them in gracefulness and variety of design. Now we have to congratulate this firm on the production of something more important than these elegant trifles—"The Empress of India Album," which has been successfully printed from designs by Mr. Albert H. Warren. Too frequently portrait albums of an expensive kind are lavishly overlaid with ornament, giving them a gaudy, gilt-gingerbread appearance. But here all is simply elegant, and the style of the binding, morocco embossed, is in harmony with the interior, and worthy of commendation.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Feb. 14, 1878) of Mr. Francis Crawshay, late of Bradbourn Hall, Sevenoaks, and of The Forest, Glamorgan, who died on the 6th ult., at No. 14, Eccleston-square Pimlico, was proved on the 12th inst. by Francis Richard Crawshay and Tudor Crawshay, the sons, and Mrs. Laura Crawshay, the widow, the executors, the personal estate being sworn under £70,000. The testator bequeaths to his wife £500, all the cash at his banker's, certain jewellery, horses and carriages, various wines and spirits, including some particular white rum, absolutely, and £1500 per annum for life; he also leaves her his house in Eccleston-square and the Bradbourn estate, with the furniture and farming stock, for life or widowhood. There are several bequests to his children and grandchildren of wines, spirits, and ales. Among the gifts to his children, who are already handsomely provided for by their grandfather's will, may be mentioned the Bradbourn estate to his son Francis Richard on the death or marriage again of Mrs. Crawshay; a certain part of the Forest estate is entailed on his son Tudor, conditionally on his setting up on the Tump in the ring of firtrees in the park, round the family stone, the Master Druid stones lying about in the said park; if there is any failure to carry into effect this condition, the estate is to go away from his said son and his family. There are also special gifts to his sons William and De Barri. The residue of all his property is to be divided between his three sons, Francis Richard, Tudor, and De Barri.

The will (dated June 5, 1877) with a codicil (dated July 9, 1878) of Mr. John Jesse Bulkeley, late of Linden-hill, Wargrave, Berks, who died on Oct. 16 last, was proved on the 6th inst. by Francis Beaumaris Bulkeley, the son, John William Rhodes and the Rev. Adam Henderson Fairbairn, the acting executors, the personal estate being sworn under £40,000. The testator bequeaths to his wife, Mrs. Sarah Mary Bulkeley, £500 and all his furniture, plate, pictures, household effects, horses and carriages; to his executors £30 each; and the residue of the personalty upon trust for his four children, Francis Beaumaris, Arthur Hugh, Constance Sarah Mary, and Cecilia Emilia, and his grandson, Charles Henry Bulkeley. His mansion house and estate at Linden-hill the testator devises to the use of his wife for life, with remainder to the use of his eldest son, Francis Beaumaris, for life, with remainder to his son, Henry Charles.

The will (dated Oct. 22, 1833) of Miss Mary Henderson, late of No. 10, Kensington Gardens-terrace, who died on the 2nd ult., was proved on the 29th ult. by William Henderson, the brother, the surviving executor, the personal estate in the United Kingdom being sworn under £45,000. The testatrix gives all her property to her said brother; the previous life interest given to her mother having lapsed by her death in the testatrix's lifetime.

The will (dated Dec. 10, 1870) with four codicils (dated Feb. 2, 1875, and June 9 and Nov. 14, 1877) of Mrs. Charlotte Anne Hodgson, formerly of No. 3, Broad Sanctuary, Westminster, and late of Oakside, Surbiton, who died on the 13th ult., was proved on the 28th ult. by the Rev. Charles Welland Edmonstone, the brother, and George Harris Hodgson, the surviving executors, the personal estate being sworn under £20,000. The testatrix bequeaths £100 to the Church Missionary Society, and £100 to the Sea Bathing Infirmary, Margate, of which her late husband was secretary.

The will (dated July 30, 1874) with a codicil (dated Jan. 22, 1877) of General Sir John Garvock, G.C.B., Colonel of the 10th Foot, late of No. 81, Queen's-gate, South Kensington, who died on the 10th ult., was proved on the 7th inst. by Dame Lydia Emma Blanche Garvock, the widow, the personal estate being sworn under £14,000.

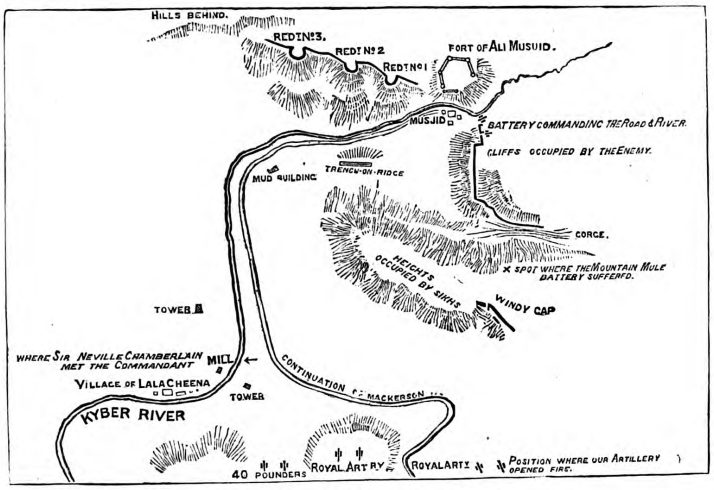
ART.

EXHIBITION OF ETCHINGS.



The marked revival of the art of etching within the last thirty years, which was initiated in France by several able artists, and has been led in Germany by Unger and others, reached this country at a more recent period. The most efficient pioneer of the art in England was Mr. Seymour Haden, and it has been subsequently advanced by the publication of Mr. Hamerton's comprehensive volume on "Etchers and Etching," and the art-periodical of which that genial writer is editor, called "The Portfolio." To further promote the movement Mr. Haden has lent a selection from his fine collection of etchings by the old masters to the Fine-Art Society, and they are now on view at the gallery in Bond-street. The selection comprises choice proofs and, sometimes, rare "states" by Rembrandt, Ostade, Vandyke, Claude, J. Both, K. Dujardin, Hollar, and other representative etchers, together with some examples of the "painter-engravers," Marc Antonio, A. Dürer, and B. Behnm, and the line-engravers, Agostino Caracci and Goltzius. The exhibition also includes eighty etchings by Mr. Seymour Haden himself. Most of these have already been reviewed in our columns, we therefore need only remark that we cannot make acquaintance with the whole again without being filled with renewed astonishment at finding that a surgeon in active practice should have found time to produce so extensive a series of pure etchings—in which there is no trace of inexperience except in the drawing of figures and hands, no resort to the expedients for representation more legitimately employed in engraving, but, on the contrary, a power of interpreting into black and white the most salient characteristics of a given scene with lifelike spirit and pregnant suggestiveness, yet—or, rather, because—with the smallest possible expenditure of means, which usually only comes with long professional practice. Mr. Haden has further written a pamphlet, entitled "About Etching," to illustrate the examples he has lent by the old masters, and in which he sets forth his own views of art and reasons for etching, and gives some tersely expressed significant hints touching the relations of etching to engraving, the inducements which led the old masters to adopt etching, the "states" of a plate, signature, dates, and printing.

Mr. Haden has, however, in his devotion to his favourite art, advanced in this pamphlet, as we think, a very exaggerated estimate of the value of etching, which estimate, as embodying many prevalent misconceptions, it is important to controvert. In his comparison of etching with engraving he is also at once self-contradictory and cruelly unjust to the whole body of engravers. It may safely be asserted—though it is saying much—that on no recent art-topic has so much fanciful nonsense been said and written by amateurs and amateur critics as on that of etching. What would be of authority for the public would be not the dicta of those whose experience is limited to one of the most elementary modes of artistic expression—which we hold etching to be—but the opinion of those who, as well as being familiar with that mode, have mastered the most advanced and complete methods of artistic realisation. Few painters would agree with Mr. Haden that etching is "the most difficult of the Arts." It is far easier to draw any line of etching than to hit many a subtle hue and tint. Of course, the etchings of a genius like Rembrandt are fascinating, and so would be a drawing in ink, sepia, chalk, or with the silver point from the same hands. It is a significant fact that artists who have failed in other branches of art have made very good etchers. Mr. Haden would have it appear that painting is inferior to etching because the painter can correct as he goes on, but not so the etcher. By so much, then, we say is etching inferior to painting: the very defects of the method are constantly lauded by its devotees as its greatest merits. Our author says again that etching "does not imply the loose treatment which belongs to the sketch." And in another place he resents the notion that an etcher should be supposed to be "merely sketching" when "he has learnt to select essentials and reject non-essentials, and to do this before nature." But, if this is not a correct definition of the very essence of sketching, we should like to know what is. The pamphlet contains many oracular texts which present one side of an art-truth in a plausible but delusive aspect, and are generally calculated to damage the unfortunate engravers. Thus, in making his confession of art-faith in French to M. Philippe Burty, Mr. Haden says, "Le premier jet émane de l'artiste, l'élaboration est la part de l'ouvrier." To which it may be replied that it often requires more tension of the artistic faculties, frequently more invention, and certainly more mature knowledge, to add the finishing touches to a work of art, than to conceive it in the first instance. "The man of feeling," we are told, "is one, the man of rules another." Yet Leonardo da Vinci, Albrecht Dürer, and even Michael Angelo were both. Again, the line of the etching point is "personal as the handwriting," but the line of the burin has "no identity"—meaning, we presume, no characteristic "individuality," or "identifiableness." But we fancy that the works of the great engravers might be (if unsigned) almost as easily discriminated as those of the etchers. Mr. Haden, no doubt, means that etching is a distinctly autographic art; which is true; but all art is more or less so. He will have it that engraving is a mere mechanical effort, whilst etching is brain impulsion; yet even the wood engraver, who, as Mr. Haden would say, is a copyist at second or third hand, often gives life and meaning to the intermediate drawing on the wood, and impresses his own personality on his work. Mr. Haden admits the merits of Dürer and Beham's, and to a certain extent of Marc Antonio's, work with the burin, but he seems to think that that instrument was no longer capable of yielding expression or any other original art quality after a demand arose for the most perfect reproductions possible at a reasonable rate of costly and no longer attainable masterpieces.

Artists adopted etching primarily and mainly because it enabled them to execute a design, which could be reproduced in many impressions, at a comparatively very small expenditure of time. But this important element of time is not sufficiently taken into account by many writers on etching; and the material advantages, and even the limitations of the art, are supposed by them to facilitate the record of art-impressions that are valuable in proportion to their indefiniteness. When, too, a tyro finds the etching point gliding so pleasantly through the wax coating of the etching plate, he is delighted with his own cleverness, forsooth; and when his scribbling is printed he is as much amazed as was the Bourgeois Gentilhomme when he learnt for the first time that he had been actually talking "prose." This excessive facility with which the etching point slides over the plate renders it almost impossible to draw a perfectly accurate line; and, as errors cannot be rectified, Mr. Ruskin is justified in calling etching "a blundering art." The line is here a little within and there a little without the true medial line, and although this may produce a charming suggestiveness, it is incapable of affording sculpturesque severity of outline, and is therefore ill adapted for drawing the nude figure. Nor can legitimate etching do more than render conventional indications of flat breadths of gradation—or delicate modelling—it cannot perfectly realise them like line engraving. It is the last method of drawing a student should attempt; and we think the recent introduction of its teaching into the school at South Kensington is ill-advised.

The mind of the architectural world has been much exercised lately by the question whether the present and comparatively modern low-pitched roof of St. Albans Cathedral should be retained and restored or whether a new high-pitched roof should be added. The restoration committee, after hearing a paper by Mr. J. O. Scott on Mr. Street's report to the Society of Antiquaries, have at length finally resolved to replace the present ruinous low roof by a new roof on the visible Early English lines, for which a considerable length of parapet has been rebuilt already. The committee were convinced that Mr. Street was wrong in saying there had been no parapet in Early English and Decorated and Perpendicular times, and had overlooked several indications of the levels both of walls and roof having been altered when the Norman roof with eaves was replaced by the Early English one with parapets, which were almost universal in great church roofs of all periods after the Norman. A further question as to the material for the roof has been raised. Several writers have recommended copper, on account of, among other merits, its lightness, and the agreeable greenish hue which it acquires with the "patina" of age—an effect which may also be obtained by the use of greenish slates. The buildings with copper roofs which have been cited in illustration are, however, generally those which are seen in combination with other buildings, or in countries where there is little foliage, at least of the fresher green kinds. The greenish hue of copper is obviously less desirable where the buildings group with masses of English foliage (which to some extent is the case at St. Albans); and the greater the mass presented by the pitch of the roof the less is it desirable.

SKETCH PLAN OF THE ATTACK ON ALI MUSJID.

Mr. Henry Stacy Marks has been elected from the grade of Associate to that of full Member of the Royal Academy.

Mr. Seymour Haden will deliver a series of lectures on etching at the Royal Institution, on Saturdays, from March 22 to April 5 next.

Sir Frederick Leighton, President of the Royal Academy, was on Monday elected an honorary member of the Royal Scottish Academy, and Professor Turner honorary professor of anatomy.

Mr. Krabbe, of Brussels, has bought the picture, by Meissonier, "Une Halte de Cuirassiers," which was in the recent Great Exhibition, for 375,000f. A countryman of his, M. Vanvenheym, has purchased a landscape by Théodore Rousseau, "La Hutte du Charbonnier," for 100,000f.

An engraved bust vignette portrait of Dr. Maclagan, Bishop of Lichfield, has been published by Messrs. Hogarth, of Mount-street. The likeness, which is good, is from a drawing by Miss Lilian Dickinson; and the engraving, in stipple, by Mr. F. Holl, is very careful and elaborate.

A subscription is on foot to purchase a marble bust of the late Mr. Thomas Wright, the property of Mrs. Wright, executed by Mr. Joseph Durham, R.A., and to place it in some public hall or library. Subscriptions may be sent to Mr. Dillon Croker, F.S.A., treasurer, 9, Pelham-place, Brompton; or Mr. C. Roach Smith, F.S.A., Temple Place, Strood.

We have received the first part of a republication by Messrs. Trübner and Co., with English text, of a series of sixty-eight "fadeless phototypes" from standard engravings after the chefs-d'œuvre by the Early Italian and Renaissance Masters. The series is entitled "The Classics of Painting," and will form a most valuable gallery of reproductions of the greatest works of art of modern times at a comparatively small cost.

An "Exhibition of Japanese and Chinese Art" has been opened at the Burlington Fine-Arts Club—admission by introduction of a member. The collection is not, of course, so extensive as that recently brought together in Paris at the Trocadéro; yet it is, perhaps, not less instructive, owing to the variety and judicious selection of the objects exhibited. The weakest portion of the collection is that of ceramics; but to adequately illustrate Chinese and Japanese porcelain and pottery would require an exhibition—and a much larger one—to itself. Enough, and more than enough, is shown to fill the mind with new and increased wonder at the skill of those great colourists, draughtsmen, and artificers of the Far East.

The National Provincial Bank directors have decided to take over the business of the West of England Bank at Plymouth, under its late manager, Mr. H. Cross.

The fixtures of the Royal London Yacht Club for the season of 1879 have been made as follows:—Opening cruise, May 17; first match (large cutters), May 30; second (schooners and yawls), June 17; third (tall cutters), July 1.

The polling for the election of a member for Londonderry county took place on Thursday week, and the result was made known on the following evening as follows:—Sir Thomas M'Clure (Liberal), 2479; Mr. Alexander (Conservative), 1878. There is no change in the political representation of the county.

MUSIC.

The close of the winter opera season at Her Majesty's Theatre on Saturday (with a repetition of "Oberon") and the usual suspension of the serial concerts during the Christmas recess, although temporarily diminishing the number of musical performances, still leave something for present record.

The concert given at St. James's Hall last Saturday evening, under the title of "Gems from the Oratorios," included various familiar solo and choral pieces by eminent composers. Among the most effective of the latter were the choruses from "The Messiah," "And the glory of the Lord" and "Hallelujah," and the concluding "Christmas Hymn," finely sung by Mr. Henry Leslie's choir, Mr. Leslie having conducted the performances, which included some excellent solo singing by Mrs. Osgood, Miss Annie Butterworth, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Thurley Beale. Miss Bessie Richards gave two pianoforte solos with great success, and Mr. Howard Reynolds was encored in a solo on the cornet. Between the parts of the concert Handel's Dead March in "Saul" was well played on the organ by Mr. J. C. Ward.

The usual Christmas performances of "The Messiah" have taken place, that of the Sacred Harmonic Society yesterday (Friday) week, having been the forty-seventh annual occasion by that institution. The soloists were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Enrique, Mr. Shakspeare, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Before the oratorio the Dead March in "Saul" was played, in memory of the late Princess Alice. Sir M. Costa conducted, and Mr. Willing was the organist.

On Thursday evening last the same oratorio was given by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, the solo singers announced having been Mesdames Lemmens Sherrington and Antoinette Sterling, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Shakspeare, and Thurley Beale.

The sacred music of last week likewise included an effective selection of airs and choruses from oratorios and other works, given at the Royal Albert Hall, under the direction of Mr. W. Carter, whose excellent choir contributed to the programme, as did Mesdames Edith Wynne, Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Hollins, Signor Brocolini, and other solo vocalists.

An extra Saturday afternoon concert took place at the Crystal Palace last week, when Miss Helen Hopekirk made her first appearance there. As previously mentioned by us, Miss Hopekirk is from Edinburgh, and has studied in Germany, where she has lately played with great success. Her chief performance on Saturday was in Grieg's pianoforte concerto, the difficulties of which were executed by her with admirable style and mechanism. Her touch is elastic, powerful, and sure, and her phrasing is that of a thoughtful and cultivated musician. The lady also gave, with great effect, two unaccompanied solos by Chopin and Schumann, in which she also produced so marked an impression that she will doubtless soon again be heard in public. The programme of Saturday's concert was of a miscellaneous nature, and included the successful first appearances at the Crystal Palace of two vocalists, Madame Louisa Mills (soprano) and Mr. Charles White (tenor). Orchestral pieces were also given, and the performances were ably conducted by Mr. Manns.

A National Holiday Festival Concert took place at the Royal Albert Hall, in the afternoon of Boxing Day, the programme having consisted chiefly of old songs and ballads rendered by some of our most eminent singers. Of the performances of the juvenile Italian opera troupe—announced to appear at the Criterion Theatre on the same day—we must speak next week.

The earliest performance of the new year will be that of "The Messiah," under the direction of Mr. W. Carter, at the Royal Albert Hall, on Thursday next. This will be followed by a special "London Ballad Concert" at St. James's Hall on Jan. 4. The Monday Popular Concerts will be resumed on Jan. 6; on Jan. 11 an extra (morning) performance of Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" will be given by the Sacred Harmonic Society at Exeter Hall; and general musical activity will follow soon afterwards—among the important approaching events being the commencement of Mr. Carl Rosa's new season of performances of operas in English, on Jan. 25, at Her Majesty's Theatre.

Readers will be glad to learn that the operation recently performed on Sir Julius Benedict for cataract has been successful.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Sonata for Piano and Violoncello. M. W. Balfe. (Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co.) Not long since we noticed a very effective and well-written pianoforte trio by the late Mr. Balfe, and we have here another posthumous instrumental work by the same composer. The sonata consists of three movements—"Allegro," "Adagio," and "Allegro vivace"—each containing some very clever writing, with melodious and brilliant passages, in which the two instruments are alternately contrasted and combined in a way to exhibit each to advantage. The "Adagio" has the peculiarity of being in five-four time, thus deriving a marked peculiarity of rhythmical phrasing. The work is altogether very pleasing, and serves—with the trio just referred to—to prove that Balfe might have succeeded as much in instrumental as in vocal composition had he cultivated the former as much as he did the latter branch of his art.

Messrs. Lucas, Weber, and Co. have also published a set of eight songs for three female voices, by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, with the original German words and an English version by Julia Goddard. This work of the veteran composer is classed as op. 178, and is one of the many proofs he has given that age has not dimmed his powers of imagination. Each piece has a distinctive character, and the effect of the three voices in combination, and occasional contrast, is extremely good.

The same firm has likewise issued a pleasing setting, by Carl Hause, of Longfellow's lines, "It is not always May," in the form of a duet, in which the voices are blended and alternated very effectively. Another graceful vocal piece is Herr Henschel's "Lullaby," a setting of Scott's "O hush thee my babie." By the same composer (the eminent singer) is the vocal duet, "Kein Feuer, keine Kohle," in which the voice parts are written in canon form with much facility. An English version is given in addition to the German text.

"Five Pictures on a Journey" are characteristic pianoforte pieces by Francis Davenport (from the same publishers), are extremely well written movements, well contrasted in style, and evidencing both the composer's thorough knowledge of the instrument and his sound musical training.

"Ballade," and "Marche Hongroise," by Sydney Smith (Ashdown and Parry), are effective pianoforte pieces; the first including a graceful melody surrounded with florid passages (chiefly for the left hand)—the second a characteristic and brilliant imitation of the national style indicated by the title. "Tannhäuser" and the "Flying Dutchman" are well-written fantasias, based on themes from Wagner's operas, the first for pianoforte solo, the other a pianoforte duet. These are also published by Messrs. Ashdown and Parry, as is "Le Bivouac," another telling piece by Mr. Sydney Smith—in the military style, for two performers on the pianoforte.
